As soon as Pierre Monteux, maestro pro tem of the visiting band, had made his first entrance, suppressed excitement found vent in a prolonged demonstration. But the real tumult came after a majestic initial performance of the "Star Spangled Banner." Then the crowd, carried away by the fever of the surging streets outside, clamored for the national songs of the Allies and wrung from the musicians the "Marseillaise," "God Save the King" and the "Italian Royal March." Happily Mr. Monteux and his disciples, prepared for the emergency, were able to answer the popular demand on the instant, and they did so with a vim.

After the introductory celebration the concert proceeded along normal lines. There was much applause after each movement of the Franck symphony, which opened the programme, and at the close of that beautiful work of the great Belgian composer the whole orchestra rose to a man in acknowledgement of well-merited enthusiasm. But the noise of approval at no time passed beyond the bounds of decorum. In fact, the welcome extended to the distinguished visitors was of the kind we have been accustomed to on such occasions for years.

It may be admitted at the outset that both the orchestra and its temporary leader made a stronger impression than many of us had anticipated. Various changes in the personnel of the famous association of virtuosi, and familiarity with Monsieur Monteux's record in New York as a conductor of ballet, opera and symphonic music, had aroused considerable scepticism among the cognoscenti.

At the same time it does seem that the fanfares of Boston's critics, who perhaps were carried away by municipal pride, sounded a note of triumph somewhat too blatant. The blasts of approval sent heavenward from the Hub cannot be re-echoed in New York with quite as much vehemence.

Undoubtedly the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the talented young violinist, F. Fradkin, as its new concertmaster, still holds its pre-eminent position in America. Yet the group of second violins is not quite equal to that of former years, and detracts somewhat from the mellow richness and noble eloquence of the string choir. The brass, on the other hand, still retains its opulence and the woodwind has lost none of its old-time euphony and delicacy.

What really caused occasional misgivings last night, however, were the extraordinary vigorous methods employed by Mr. Monteux, who apparently was anxious to prove himself a man of power and temperament. His reading of the Franck symphony steered clear of all sentimentalism. And that was most refreshing. It was a robust, healthy, warm-blooded, thrilling reading, absolutely and agreeably different from that of the polite Monsieur Messager. But the conductor was prone to force the tone of his orchestra and to stirr up the instrumental waters to such a degree that they became clouded, even muddy.

Lack of transparency and clarity, of delicate dynamic adjustment and balance, were even more evident in Dukas's "La Peri," which "Poeme Danse," so labored in its clever elaborations, does not improve on closer acquaintance. This detracted also from the enjoyment of Debussy's "Iberia" images No. 2.

Just why Monsieur Monteux had chosen Schumann's "Manfred" Overture as his other contribution was not fully apparent. His interpretation of this music was vigorous to a degree, and had little poetic finesse.

That Mr. Monteux had rehearsed his men most carefully was evident from the beginning to the end of the evening. He has never given as good an account of himself as he did on this occasion when he wielded the baton a la Toscanini without a score to re-enforce his memory.

n

ress

e

SYMPHONY MUSIC DISCUSSED

The program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play tomorrow evening for the first concert of the season at the Academy of Music, with Pierre Monteux as conductor, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, was considered in detail in a lecture recital given yesterday afternoon in the Academy lecture hall, by Professor Walter R. Spalding of Harvard University. Professor Spalding gave an exhaustive exposition of the symphony, Cesar Franck's D minor composition, and played the chief motives of the three movements. He also devoted some time to the study of D'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar," and played portions of Schumann's Manfred Overture and Debussy's "Iberia," analyzing the dis-

34

HERALD NOV. 1 8

SPEAKERS LAUD GREAT VICTORY

Mayor Peters Presides at Notable Celebration in Symphony Hall

Boston's municipal victory celebration was given a fitting setting last evening at Symphony Hall where, with Mayor Peters presiding, representatives of the army and the navy and the church vied in giving expression to a feeling of thankfulness that the long period of bloody strife had been ended and prolonged peace appears on the horizon of nations.

Not alone that, but the Boston Symphony orchestra was also present to perform in a most impressive way the national anthems of the allies and to lead in the singing of the various camp songs which the audience sang with a will, under the leadership of Herbert W. Smith, camp song leader, and the singing of "La Marseillaise," which was demanded by the audience as a tribute to France and to the new leader of the orchestra, Henri Rabaud, who was accorded an enthusiastic reception.

Distinguished Speakers

Addresses were made by Maj.-Gen. William Crozier, commandant of the department of the northeast; Rear Admiral Spencer S. Wood, commandant of the 1st naval district; Brig.-Gen. John A. Ruckman, in charge of the coast fortifications; Chaplain Henry E. Van Dyke, and the Rt. Rev. William Lawrence, bishop of Massachusetts. The closing number was the singing of "America" by the audience, led by the orchestra.

Mayor Peters, in opening, declared that it was eminently proper to celebrate such a day, and that he knew of no city in the country where the glad tidings came with greater joy than right here. "We may feel proud that we have taken part in these great things," he said; "that we have stood shoulder to shoulder with a nation struggling against the autocratic rule of Germany. And today we may grasp in a way the great things that have made the world safe for democracy. Let us remember today that we have much to be grateful for, for our security, progress and peace. We owe the deepest debt of gratitude to those who risked all to cross the waters and fight the battles of democracy on the fields of France."

Maj.-Gen. Crozier said the signing of the armistice had come somewhat suddenly. "The Kaiser rather took us by surprise," he added. "Not that we did not expect it, but what we were thinking of was of making it sure rather than speedy." The speaker referred to a talk he had with Marshal Joffre and of a question he asked regarding the probability of the Germans breaking through the French line, and of the conclusion he reached that if an American army could be got across the success of the allied arms was assured. "Since the middle of August it has come our time to turn in and fight," he continued.

"We have reached the point of surrender on his part and we have done it without breaking through the centre or enveloping the flanks. But we have done it very completely. The Germans knew enough to give in and avoid the inevitable. We have the right to assemble here and say to ourselves we are not a warlike nation, but we can congratulate ourselves that we have reached a stage in the history of the world where we have made ourselves felt. We are grateful for the self-content and great satisfaction that has come to us and which is going to last."

Rear Admiral Wood paid a compliment to the people of Boston who have so nobly helped the navy and he urged all to "be not weary in well doing." "Further aid, comfort and the right hand of fellowship are needed and all these things take money," he said. "It is your privilege and duty to help out the war work drive and so help every individual who is fighting your battles for you and this dear city of ours," he declared.

Brig.-Gen. Ruckman declared that he had been in various parts of the country since the war began but his experience in Boston led him to believe that Boston is a good place to receive such news as came during the day. The speaker referred at some length to the great part this country is to take in the future and the great problems to be met. "All the little nations and even Germany want to be republics and they all need instruction. It seems to me that we are going to set up a kindergarten to teach small nations to become republics. All our standards have been very high, but we may have to raise them if we are to become the big brother of all these little nations."

"It has been a fine day," said Chaplain Van Dyke, "and it has been one of the most splendid 'falls' the world has ever seen. It is evident that we will have plenty of Turkey and very likely Strassburgh goose for Thanksgiving." He made a strong plea for the war work drive support and declared "we must do more in the hours of grateful victory for our boys who have won it than we did in the hours of peril."

Bishop Lawrence was the closing speaker and declared that all should be grateful for our men and our leaders. He paid a strong tribute to King Albert of Belgium, to Lord Kitchener, to the fleets and army of Great Britain, to King George and to Lloyd George, to Gen. Joffre and to Marshal Foch and [illegible] leaders of the other allied na- [illegible] and closed by thanking God for [illegible]adership of President Wilson, who [illegible] sent such men as Pershing and [illegible] to lead our forces across the [illegible]ers. "And thank God for all those [illegible] men, from the cabin and the [illegible]tation, from the homes of the rich [illegible] from the hovels of the poor, some [illegible] rest beneath the sod of a [illegible]

TRIBUNE

New York City

NOV 1 1918

Music

The Second Concert of the Boston Orchestra—Assyriology and Music

By H. E. Krehbiel

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of M. Monteux, which took place in Carnegie Hall, was a more enjoyable entertainment than that which had preceded it on Thursday evening. This was because of its programme, for it offered no revelation touching the constitution of the band calculated to cause a change of the opinion expressed in the first review, though the Concerto grosso in D by Handel which opened the programme enabled the hearers to form a better judgment of the quality of the strings.

That judgment is highly favorable to the organization, as well as to the excellence of the training which it has received at the hands of M. Monteux, who now surrenders it to M. Rabaud in order to take up his duties at the opera. The strings are good in quality, precise, sonorous and responsive to their leader. Their work in the last movement of the concerto was distinctly brilliant, as was that of Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster, whose boyhood was spent in New York, where he received his early training. Following the concerto came music of the modern type, Mr. Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and D'Indy's "Istar."

Mr. Loeffler's piece is a musical transcription or paraphrase of Verlaine's dainty poem, beginning "Avant que tu ne t'en Allies," which it follows as closely as highly idealized music can follow verses which appeal to a sweet and gentle fancy, with their invocation of the fading morning star, the matin call of birds, the upward circling lark, the spreading benediction of azure light, the glistening dew, the quickening of a lover's thoughts under the urge of the rising sun. There is much that is correspondingly exquisite in the iridescent web of tone which the composer has woven, but fortunately the beauty is not all of orchestral vesture and adornment, but also of musical thought. The composition differed from M. D'Indy's, in that it aroused delicate fancies while it charmed the sense, while "Istar" was chiefly an irritant of curiosity.

It was pleasant to have Verlaine's gentle images in mind while listening to Loeffler, but it was not necessary to enjoyment; understanding of D'Indy's purposes and devices depended upon knowledge of its literary motive. When the work was first performed by the Boston Orchestra, in February, 1899, even the erudite Mr. Apthorp was at a loss to explain its singular structure, which is that of a theme and variations played wrong and foremost, the variations coming first and the theme last, a disquisition before announcement of its topic, a sermon with the text at the conclusion.

There are no programme books to be had in Carnegie Hall for the Boston concerts, and those who failed to get one in the street yesterday were as much puzzled as the accomplished annotator of former years, unless they chanced to be familiar with Deltzsch's translation of tht old Babylonia poem, which the German professor calls "Höllenfahrt der Istar," or the chapter in George Smith's "Chaldean Genesis," which tells how Istar, an Oriental love-goddess of unspeakable divinity, descended into the underworld in search of her husband-lover Tammuz.

On this subterranean visit she was compelled by seven warders of as many portals to divest herself of an article of ornament or dess until she passed through the last gate entirely nude. To illustrate this series of adventures the composer (who, by the way, conducted a performance of the work here in 1905) conceived the ingenious scheme of writing seven variations on a theme and playing the variations first and the theme last. Only a fragment of the theme is heard at the outset, and this is tricked out with much scintillant ornament (the tiara of the goddess). As the music goes on the melodic formation is augmented and this investiture simplified, until at the last the theme stalks forth in its whole stature, nude of even harmony.

The mere title might enable an Assyriologist familiar with musical devices to comprehend M. D'Indy's scheme. It is expecting too much of an ordinary mortal unprovided even with an English translation of the French lines which are printed in the score. We might at least have the text in cuneiform characters thrown on a screen. Debussy might also have found for us an Assyrian or Chaldean scale.

The concert ended with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which was just music and asked no toleration of the hearer, though it was the third performance of the work here within nine days, and there were things admirable as well as things questionable in its reading and performance. To expound them would call for technical analysis, which, of course, is not tolerable.

Music.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Victory Concert.

While the city was frantically celebrating victory, if not yet peace, Carnegie Hall housed last evening the first local concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last season this orchestra of great renown was notoriously not identified with patriotism—that is, American patriotism—nor, it must in justice be said, were the highly decorous audiences it habitually commands here by any means so vigorous in their greetings of our National Anthem as in the applause they bestowed on Dr. Muck, though already under suspicion of the conduct that soon compelled him to quit his Boston habitat for a residence in Fort Oglethorpe. Yesterday, however, much had been changed.

The orchestra returns to us cleansed of enemy-members, whose places have been filled by men of Allied citizenship. Instead of a German conductor, Henri Rabaud, immediately from the Paris Opéra, is now the official conductor of the band, though last evening, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, Pierre Monteux, the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, led in the place of Mr. Rabaud, who, reaching Boston after the beginning of the season, takes up his new duties only on Monday next. As for the audience, in appearance quite the decorous Boston Symphony audience to which we are accustomed, it exploded with enthusiasm when Mr. Monteux entered, and the majestic playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner" wrought it to such a frenzy that nothing short of the "Marseillaise," "God Save the King," and the Italian "Marcia Reale," to an obbligato of hand-clapping broken by cheers, served to still its ebullitions of emotion so that the orchestra could begin the programme of the evening.

This programme consisted of César Franck's symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, a "danced poem" by Dukas, being the score of his ballet "La Péri," and Debussy's "Ibéria." Probably to most of those present the concert itself, after such a strenuous prelude, made an anticlimax. Possibly the orchestra shared in this feeling. At any rate, a fairer judgment can be passed on the reconstituted orchestra from the concert it will give in the same hall to-morrow afternoon than from its victory concert last night. Nevertheless, it was evident yesterday that, though the new band did not always play with the clarity or the finish that characterized its performance in former years, it is still the unmatched band of America, one of the premier orchestras of the world.

Mr. Monteux is, of course, no stranger to New York audiences as a symphonic conductor. He won local distinction in that field through his leadership of the Civic concerts in the summer of 1917. In Paris, despite his association with the Diaghileff ballet and opera company, he is best known as a conductor of symphony concerts. There was, therefore, nothing of the experimental in his taking up the baton Dr. Muck had laid down, and no one who recalled his conducting at the Civic concerts felt the slightest surprise that once more he followed the growing custom of conducting everything without a score before him. His reading of the great symphony of Franck emphasized the contrasts of substance and of treatment in the composition, and he whipped out the strenuous pages of the two allegros with greater speed and thrust than has been the habit of Teutonic conductors. He also led a broad and richly sonorous performance of the "Manfred" overture, though neither he nor any other conductor can disguise the fact that all but the concluding measures of this work are now hopelessly aged. The overture might with profit have been omitted from a programme that was too long even without the patriotic prelude.

The Dukas and the Debussy pieces were in a sense the royal dishes of the feast—the Debussy because the composer's evocation of Spain is a major enchantment, and because no conductor surpasses, if any indeed equals, Mr. Monteux as a conductor of Debussy; the Dukas because it was new. Doubtless this "danced poem" would gain greatly in effect with the dancers and the stage decorations before one's eyes. Last night it seemed chiefly notable for the glittering sumptuousness of the instrumental dress. The music itself is surprisingly flowing, even a little old-fashioned, for the composer of "Ariane et Barbe-Bleue" in 1910. However, it was good to hear it, both for the unfamiliarity of it and for the stirring performance. But the real feature of the concert proper was Debussy's wondrous "Ibéria" as led with sympathy and imagination by Mr. Monteux.

PITTS SANBORN.

SUN

ss: New York City.

The Week End's Music.

This Saturday brings forth much orchestral music. The Boston Symphony will give its second concert—the first of the Saturday afternoons—at Carnegie Hall, for which programme Mr. Monteux has selected the Seventh Symphony as the great piece. Before that will come Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 5, D major, for string orchestra; Loeffler's Poeme, "La Bonne Chanson," and D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar," op. 42, which is the musical epic of all historic travail.

NEWS

: Baltimore, Md.

NOV 4 - 1918

BALTIMORE'S season of orchestral concerts, which is decidedly rich in promise, will open, so to speak, tout de suite.

From the standpoint of the musician the phrase, "the tooter the sweeter," which they say the American lads at the front are using as one means of adapting themselves to the French language, is certainly applicable. In fact, there have been so many postponements that one hardly dare assume the risk of tying oneself down to any fixed date.

But as things now stand, the prospects are bright for the resumption of the regular round of musical events, and there is every reason to believe that the different concerts and recitals will take place as scheduled.

The week's list is an alluring one. On Wednesday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra will fill its first local engagement since the United States entered the war; on Thursday night the postponed concert by the Paris Symphony Orchestra will take place, and the next night the Casals recital, also deferred, will be given—all at the Lyric. Friday afternoon will mark the Baltimore debut of Alfred Butler, the new pianist at the Peabody Conservatory.

Boston Symphony.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra has lost nothing of its finesse and its musical prestige by reason of the departure of Herr Muck and the extensive reorganization of the musicians by which aliens were eliminated was quite apparent by the critical reports of its first concert of the season.

It would seem that the predominating nationality of the players is now French, rather than German which, Heaven knows, is an infinitely preferable condition.

Those who have the musical interests of the United States a heart—and they should be more a heart now than ever before—have cause to be thankful that the difficulties into which the Boston Symphony was plunged by the Muck denouement did not bring about the disintegration of the orchestra that for a time seemed imminent.

"Fortunately," a Boston writer says, "it has not only survived the storm that raged about it but it has emerged stronger and finer than it has ever been in the past. It has a new management, a new conductor and many changes have been made affecting 35 per cent. of the personnel. But what has endured is the splendid tradition and fine discipline established by 41 years of honest and sincere artistic effort."

The Wednesday night program at the Lyric is a beautiful one, with Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor as the principal number. This is a work that is inspired from start to finish, that carries the soul high above the strife, the suffering and disappointment that afflict humanity. Franck was always more or less of a mystic and his compositions abound in spiritual significance. None are more profund, more elevating, than the D-minor Symphony.

Florence Easton, the soloist, will sing two widely contrasted numbers—the "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Figaro," and the Recitative et Aria de Lia, from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." Pierre Monteux, temporary director, will conduct.

Tricolor Day.

In honor of the visit of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, next Thursday will be known as Tricolor Day. The occasion will be one of genuine musical and fashionable brilliance and it will have in addition an element of patriotism that will further tend to make it distinctive.

The list of patrons and patronesses for the concert reads like a roster of the fashionable life of the city, and if any names are missed they can most likely be found by glancing over the various committees that are assisting Miss Elizabeth Ellen Starr, chairman of the executive committee, and her associates in the arrangements that have been made to assure the success of the concert.

I have referred several times to the work Miss Starr has done in planning for an appropriately imposing reception for the Paris Symphony, the sort of a reception which, in view of the official nature of its appearances in American cities, is due it.

I am happy to take advantage of another opportunity of speaking a word in her praise. I do not think there is anybody else in the city who could have handled this particular undertaking more effectively, more untiringly or with greater enthusiasm.

m AMERICAN

dress: New York City.

te NOV

Boston Symphony with Its New Conductor at Carnegie Hall

By MAX SMITH.

IN the midst of the wildest turmoil this city has experienced in many a day, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reorganized and under the direction of a new conductor, quietly slipped into Carnegie Hall last night and took an audience of dignified music lovers by storm.

As soon as Pierre Monteux, maestro pro tem of the visiting band, had made his first entrance, suppressed excitement found vent in a prolonged demonstration. But the real tumult came after a majestic initial performance of the "Star Spangled Banner." Then the crowd, carried away by the fever of the surging streets outside, clamored for the national songs of the Allies and wrung from the musicians the "Marseillaise," "God Save the King" and the "Italian Royal March." Happily Mr. Monteux and his disciples, prepared for the emergency, were able to answer the popular demand on the instant, and they did so with a vim.

After the introductory celebration the concert proceeded along normal lines. There was much applause after each movement of the Franck symphony, which opened the programme, and at the close of that beautiful work of the great Belgian composer the whole orchestra rose to a man in acknowledgement of well-merited enthusiasm. But the noise of approval at no time passed beyond the bounds of decorum. In fact, the welcome extended to the distinguished visitors was of the kind we have been accustomed to on such occasions for years.

It may be admitted at the outset that both the orchestra and its temporary leader made a stronger impression than many of us had anticipated. Various changes in the personnel of the famous association of virtuosi, and familiarity with Monsieur Monteux's record in New York as a conductor of ballet, opera and symphonic music, had aroused considerable scepticism among the cognoscenti.

At the same time it does seem that the fanfares of Boston's critics, who perhaps were carried away by municipal pride, sounded a note of triumph somewhat too blatant. The blasts of approval sent heavenward from the Hub cannot be re-echoed in New York with quite as much vehemence.

Undoubtedly the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the talented young violinist, F. Fradkin, as its new concertmaster, still holds its pre-eminent position in America. Yet the group of second violins is not quite equal to that of former years, and detracts somewhat from the mellow richness and noble eloquence of the string choir. The brass, on the other hand, still retains its opulence and the wood-[illegible]nd has lost none of its old-time [illegible]phony and delicacy.

What really caused occasional [illegible]sgivings last night, however, [illegible]ere the extraordinary vigorous [illegible]ethods employed by Mr. Mon-[illegible]ux, who apparently was anxious [illegible] prove himself a man of power [illegible]d temperament. His reading of [illegible]e Franck symphony steered clear [illegible] all sentimentalism. And that [illegible] as most refreshing. It was a [illegible]bust, healthy, warm-blooded, [illegible]rilling reading, absolutely and [illegible]greeably different from that of the [illegible]olite Monsieur Messager. But the [illegible]onductor was prone to force the [illegible]one of his orchestra and to stir [illegible]p the instrumental waters to such [illegible] degree that they became clouded, [illegible]ven muddy.

Lack of transparency and clarity, [illegible]f delicate dynamic adjustment and [illegible]alance, were even more evident in [illegible]Dukas's "La Peri," which "Poeme [illegible]Danse," so labored in its clever [illegible]laborations, does not improve on [illegible]loser acquaintance. This detracted [illegible]also from the enjoyment of De-[illegible]bussy's "Iberia" images No. 2.

Just why Monsieur Monteux had [illegible]hosen Schumann's "Manfred" over-[illegible]ture as his other contribution was not fully apparent. His interpreta-[illegible]tion of this music was vigorous to [illegible] degree, and had little poetic [illegible]finesse.

That Mr. Monteux had rehearsed his men most carefully was evident, from the beginning to the end of the evening. He has never given as good an account of himself as he did on this occasion when he wielded the baton a la Toscanini without a score to re-enforce his memory.

[illegible]

[illegible]n

[illegible]ress

[illegible]e

SYMPHONY MUSIC DISCUSSED

The program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play tomorrow evening for the first concert of the season at the Academy of Music, with Pierre Monteux as conductor, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, was considered in detail in a lecture recital given yesterday afternoon in the Academy lecture hall, by Professor Walter R. Spalding of Harvard University. Professor Spalding gave an exhaustive exposition of the symphony, Cesar Franck's D minor composition, and played the chief motives of the three movements. He also devoted some time to the study of D'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar," and played portions of Schumann's Manfred Overture and Debussy's "Iberia," analyzing the dis-ballet tells how a young monarch eyed to the ends of the earth in ch of the lotus flower which was symbol and badge of immortality, at last found it in the hands of a i. He snatched it from her, and she ove to regain it so that she might ian approach the light which went t from Ormuzd, on the steps of whose ll Iskender had found her sleeping. the face of the peri ravished the of the young King, which so l with longing that the lotus ned purple, whereby he knew that he flower of life was not for him. And he peri danced the dance of the peris, hile the prince was torn between deire for her and life everlasting, until t last he gave back the flower, which ow became as snow and gold comingled, as sunset upon a mountain. hen she faded away in the light which treamed from the calix of the lotus and vanished from his sight like a hand uplifting a flower of flame. An inviting theme, reminding one of the legend of "The blue flower which Brahmins say Blooms nowhere but in Paradise," but we should have had picture and action to stir the fancy and prevent the weariness which came from listening to multitudinous voices commingling short breathed phrases, over-persistent pedal points and tiresomely reiterated figures. It is decorative music, and we should have had before our [illegible] pictures which it professed to decorate. Then, possibly, we should have found pretty associations between kaledioscopic mixtures of tones, golden mountains, crimson valleys and silver-fruited trees. A so perhaps with purple cows and blue moons.

SUN
ss: New York City. NOV 10 1918

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT MATINEE

Monteux Presents Programme Combining Old Favorites With the New.

DAMROSCH ALSO PLAYS

Evening Concert Presents Mischa Levitzki as Soloist in Saint-Saens Number.

There was a time when he who proceeded from a matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to an evening contribution by the Symphony Society of New York carried a broken heart and a humble spirit. But the temper of the time is different and, as they say in "the Street," confidence has been restored. The Bostonians gave their first matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall and the New Yorkers their second evening concert.

M. Monteux presented a programme of the old and the new, with the elders sitting on guard at the front and the rear. Handel ushered in the feast with his concerto grosso in D, No. 5, and Beethoven finished it with his symphony in A, No. 7. Betwixt and between them were Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations.

A word about Loeffler, about whom too few are written. This composition was written in 1901, and since has been remodelled, at least as to its instrumentation. It is not one of the best works of this genuinely important American composer. He is American only by naturalization, like so many other things musical; but he is not American in the fashion of imtating the Teutonic lords of sound.

He writes like the modern Frenchmen, but with a clearly distinguishable individuality. "La Bonne Chanson," which pursues the elusive shadow of a Verlaine fancy, is skilfully made, and its orchestral textures are gorgeous, but its imagination halts at times and there is too much method in its fantasy.

Dance of the Seven Veils.

THE SUN'S musical recorder confesses to an ancient and somewhat shamefaced weakness for d'Indy's delineation of the entry of Istar into the lower regions. Of course there is something ludicrous in the attempt to compose the disrobing dance of the seven veils by clothing a theme in variations, stripping them off one at a time and exposing the theme unadorned at the end.

But how beautiful the naked theme when you get down to it! One remembers Herod's cry, "Dance for me, Salome. Ah, thou art to dance with naked feet. 'Tis well. Thy little feet will be like white doves. They will be like little white flowers that dance upon the trees." Yes, there come memories. But what have they to do with the Boston Symphony concert?

The orchestra was very luscious in certain parts of these two modern lyrics of sense. But, alas, there was much dryness in the ingenious and delectable concerto of Mr. Handel. The solo instruments were particularly professorial in tone and style and the tutti were rectangular. The first movement of the Beethoven symphony had little of the joyous spirit of the composer's fancy except speed and impetuosity. It had enough and to spare of both.

The slow movement cannot easily be spoiled, but it was well done and the scherzo was played admirably. There was more clarity and there was a finer adjustment of tonal balance in the middle movements of the symphony than in anything else the orchestra has done here under the baton of M. Monteux. He seems to be happier in the heavier lights and shadows of opera, where he will relax his beat and his soul to-morrow night.

SUN
ss: New York City. NOV 8 1918

Music

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony, on its native heath, is something between an enjoined privilege and a very fashionable religion. Here in New York it is taken, along with the rest of life, a little more lightly, although its perfections are no less appreciated. Certainly it is the king of all the golden orchestral rivers, but with the gods showering so many streams of artistic magic upon fortunate Manhattan its worldly and unregenerate inhabitants cannot be expected to worship, in pure Bostonese style, at one and only one altar. The return of that orchestra, however, to Carnegie Hall each autumn is always the big event of the orchestral season; the cognoscenti are out and the lowbrows are for once happily forgotten. Last night's first concert of this season, however, was a more than doubly significant event, because the orchestra which played upon the stage of Carnegie was not the Muckian ensemble that in the past few years, under the leadership of the most famous interned of them all, carved for that orchestra, with all its glowing past, an indestructible present. The remorseless—perhaps too much for some—perfection of the Boston Symphony had become a byword; it was a matchless, if perhaps a little coldly remote, instrument of beauty that came from Boston every fortnight.

The new Boston Symphony, new considering the extensive changes in its membership, and the new directors, has laid out for itself as no light obligation the living up to and the revivification under the protective coloration of patriotism of the high artistic ideals of its past. Last night's concert showed that the reorganization in the name of the Allies has shaken more than the mere membership; the threads of the fabric cannot be ripped here and there without spoiling the pattern. On the other hand, these are early days for a last judgment; if Kabaud has a hard task before him Monteux has had a still harder one in the last few weeks of preparation for an over critical public and a disorganized orchestra, which for years has been an absolute unity.

Mr. Monteux conducted his orchestra last night on a significant night; an audience which had with the rest of New York madly welcomed an unverified peace, found a Boston programme a far call from a paper tearing day. The paper tearing spirit had its outlet, at the beginning of the performance, when the orchestra played first "The Star Spangled Banner" set to the dignified and stately orchestral background supplied by Mr. Converse. After which the audience had to have the "Marseillaise," the Italian national anthem and "God Save the King." There were still some who apparently wanted the Brabanconne, or the air of Siam, but the orchestra settled down with a fine renunciation to the Franck Symphony in D minor.

This particular symphony seems to have been seized upon by all the orchestral leaders from Chicago east for their first concerts this fall.

It was perhaps unfortunate for M. Ronteux' aggregation that the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory under M. Messager had antedated its playing here, for the perfectly tempered Parisian orchestra at its first concert gave to the symphony a richer, deftere reading than it received last night. There is no lack of warmth or fire in Mr. Monteux' reading, but there was too much noise, too much encouragement to the brass, too little delicacy at times to the solo singing of the woodwinds, by which the themes one by one are written down. These are irregularities that practice and time may pare down; it would require much bungling to impair for the hearer the almost unearthly beauties of the Franck symphonies. They belong not quite to this sinful world.

New York City
0 1918

TWO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS PLAY

Pierre Monteux Again Conducts the Boston at Matinee in Carnegie Hall.

A TRIUMPH FOR LEVITZKI

Young American Displays His Pianistic Prowess at Concert of the New York Society.

The first matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon before a large audience, which enthusiastically demanded the "Marseillaise" after Pierre Monteux had conducted the national anthem. It was delivered with accustomed Gallic gusto. Whether he be considered as a temporary conductor or as a skilled and versatile musician, M. Monteux deserves the gratitude of our musical public. Yesterday his brief connection with the band from Boston came to a close, and tomorrow evening we hope to see him in his familiar place at the head of the Metropolitan Opera forces. The music at the matinée went with more precision and spirit than at the opening concert last Thursday evening. And the musical scheme was more interesting. Handel, Loeffler, D'Indy and Beethoven. Two old-time Germans, one American and one Frenchman.

The tonality D major began and ended the matinée Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, for string orchestra, was, no doubt, selected to show the paces of that particular department. It must be confessed that neither the reading nor the performance was distinguished. The Introduction and Allegro were rather wiry in tone, nor was the Largo ingratiating to the ear. The various solos were played by Frederick Fradkin, the new concert master; his colleague, S. Noack; C. Barrier, viola, and J. Malkin, violoncello.

The absence of elasticity in the strings did not cease with the Handel number, for "La Bonne Chanson," by Charles Martin Loeffler, which followed, lacked an eloquent interpretation for patent reasons. This orchestral poem has not been heard here for years. Since then the composer has revised the score and reorchestrated it. He has employed as his motto the fifth poem in the Paul Verlaine's delicate and tender "La Bonne Chanson." Loeffler is a tone painter doubled by a poet; even if he were not a musician he could not have escaped the temptation to drop into verse, like Silas Wegg. His score is rich in sentiment and shifting moods, its coloring ranging from sombre purple to the violet rays. The Loeffler palette is mixed with brains and lovely hues. This work was originally presented in company with the composer's "Villanelle du Diable."

The Symphonic Variations, by Vincent D'Indy, "Istar," the Oriental young woman who is divested of her harmonic lingerie coram publico, had the proper atmospheric quality. It is cerebral music at the best, and it reveals the frigidity of an Academic nude by Jules Lefebvre. But enormously clever. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony closed a pleasant afternoon, though there was nothing of note in the performance except that the Allegretto was the high-water mark of the program, while a word is not amiss concerning the dash of the finale. As a whole, there were rough spots and tonal dryness. M. Monteux was warmly received and, considering the task he essayed at such short notice he admirably succeeded. The rôle of a stop-gap is ever thankless.

WORLD
ss: New York City

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS GIVE MUSICAL TREATS.

Boston Organization's Beethoven Work Pleases, as Does New York Orchestra's Programme

Two symphony concerts and one of mixed character represented the serious musical achievements here yesterday. In the afternoon in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony men played their first matinee programme, Beethoven's seventh symphony being the most important work.

Temporary Conductor Monteux led with much fervor and obtained abundant contrasts, especially in Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and the "Istar" variations of d'Indy; but his fortes also were so much overdone that the desired melodic and harmonic definitions were blurred. Handel's great D major concerto for strings opened the performance, which was heavily attended.

A splendid programme was given in the evening by the New York Symphony Orchestra, also in Carnegie Hall. Bordin's B minor symphony, which pulsates with life and color, was the most interesting composition. Paul Vidal's "Danses Tanagreevines" received its New York premiere, and Mischa Levitzki played the Saint-Saens G minor concerto.

A large audience heard a concert of Swedish music in Aeolian Hall last night, the performers being Greta Torpadie, soprano; Edna Gunnar Peterson, pianist, and Samul Ljung Kvist, tenor. There were some commendable compositions offered and others of no pronounced musical worth.

TRIBUNE
New York City
NOV 8 1918

44

Music

Visit From the Boston Orchestra With a French Conductor

By H. E. Krehbiel

The Boston Orchestra, which departed from us last spring amid recriminations and heartburnings, and followed by regrets as well as imprecations because of its German conductor, returned to us at Carnegie Hall last night with a French leader of good local repute at its head. It was sped with contumely, it was welcomed with rejoicings. In the interim it has undergone constitutional changes as well as dynastic, but since in its home town its temporary conductor was received metaphorically with shouts of "The king is dead! Long live the king!" there is danger that we should be called unpatriotic did we not echo the cry. The organization comes back to us "as chastened and not killed" as Paul remarked to the Corinthians. It brings with it on this visit M. Pierre Monteux, of whose excellence as an operatic conductor the local public was well advised. Nevertheless it is a pleasure to say of him that in his new capacity he seemed as admirable as in that in which he had already won our admiration. It was a happy dispensation which brought him to us on a night when we could think of the gentleman interned at Oglethorpe with some of the goodwill which filled all hearts and yet with no regret that he was not at the head of the purged and purified organization. Purged and purified, but neither bettered nor worsened as much as was hoped and feared. The wind-choirs have suffered, both wood and brass, but that they are still capable is incontestable, and that M. Monteux has worked something like a miracle with the band is incontestable. Last night's audience, a fine one in number and character, was not in a captious mood, however. It rejoiced in the opportunity to hear the organization whose stiff-necked, short-sighted manager withheld "The Star-Spangled Banner" play not only that patriotic air, but also because insistent applause commanded also the national airs of France, England and Italy, and settled down to the conventional business of the evening only because it was a duty enforced by artistic propriety.

The programme was made up of César Franck's D minor symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," a "danced poem" entitled "La Péri," by Dukas, and the second of Debussy's "Images" entitled "Iberia." The performance of the symphony might under ordinary circumstances have tempted a comparison of reading and execution with the work done recently under M. Messager by the orchestra of the Conservatory. But we forbear beyond saying that while there was not finesse in the performance of the Frenchmen there was less academic rigidity and more virility in that of the band from Boston. The Debussy piece has been played here before by the Boston Orchestra as well as our own Philharmonic. By a coincidence, when Mr Fiedler brought it forward some seven years ago, he also associated it with Franck's symphony. This circumstance was edifying for those who were able and willing to take note of the divergent trends of French music during the last generation, assuming that César Franck is to be taken as a representative of French and not Franco-Flemish music. The D minor symphony has been played so often in this city within the last few years that its defect of reiteration of theme and mood has been so forced upon attention as to militate a little unduly, perhaps, against the lofty beauty of the work. Its monotony has grown almost oppressive. But it is honest music, logical, consistent with the materials, purposes and capacities of the art, never straying outside its boundaries. Debussy's "Iberia" is in a vastly different case. As music it is chiefly concerned with an exploitation of devices in orchestral combinations and an attempt to appeal to the fancy and ear by extra musical means. It professes not only to depict such scenes as the streets and bypaths of Spain and suggest the spirit of a Spanish festival, but also to give an impression of the night air burdened with odors.

That there may be some association between sounds, colors and odors is an ancient notion, and simultaneous appeals to optical, aural and olfactory nerves date back at least as far as Apuleius's sojourn in Alexandria. We know that when the intellect first gives an impetus to the fancy much can be done in the way of juggling with the senses in music. Fantastic as it may sound, we know that in the idyllic scene in "Siegfried" Wagner almost makes the eyes hear and the ears see; but he first puts the picture and a dramatic situation before us. It is also something more than mere fancy when after the storm scene in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony the Ranz des Vaches, which introduces the final movement, seems to make us feel freshened and reinvigorated atmosphere. And this magic is accomplished by purely musical means, aided but slightly by the verbal programme. But can even a programmatic title make the ear smell? A Viennese critic once professed that such a dreadful thing as a stench in the ear had been suggested to him when listening for the first time to Tschaikowsky's violin concerto; but that was only a literary trick caught from a German æsthetician who had said that some pictures had a bad odor in the eye. Here criticism has gone as far astray as the performances which it is endeavoring to reprobate. We see no struts, and we smell no odors in Debussy's so-called "image." All that we do is to recognize that Spanish rhythms and melodies of a Spanish type have been put together fragmentarily in a manner so ingenious as to fascinate a sophisticated listener. Musical themes based on exotic scales are no more redolent of sweet perfumes than would be themes frankly conceived in the familiar diatonic modes; nor can they be made odorous by ingenious and novel combinations of orchestral voices.

A novel in our concert rooms was the ballet music by Dukas, which was first heard in Paris five years ago, when the composition had its proper adjuncts of stage picture and pantomime. It might have made a different impression last night had the listeners been permitted to see and not merely imagine the scene showing, as Mr. Hale tells us it did at the Châtelet Theatre, "gold mountains, crimson valleys and trees bearing silver fruit," and also to witness the choreographic acting ("miming" is the word since the Russian dancers brought revelations to young reviewers) of Mademoiselle Trouhanowa, whose figure, we hope, is better for the eye than her name. The story

EVENING MAIL
s: New York City

CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Florence Easton Appears as Soloist.

The reconstructed Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Brooklyn at the Academy of Music last night, with Pierre Monteux as the temporary leader of the Boston forces. The orchestra was greeted by an unusually large audience, which showed patriotic enthusiasm after the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner."

The programme opened with Cesar Frank's Symphony in D minor, which was played in a noteworthy fashion; then Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Symphonic Variations "Istar" of d'Indy and three "Images" for orchestra of Debussy. In all of these the orchestra played with its old-time finesse and finish, with color and contrast in execution. There were moments when the strings were celestial and the woodwind euphonious.

Conductor Monteux was a very insistent leader and dug out dynamic effects by the roots, producing a mystic color and subtle charm.

Florence Easton, a soprano of the Metropolitan Opera forces, was the soloist, and the recitatives, "How Susanna Delays," and "Flown Forever" (Mozart), Debussy's recitative and air of Lia from "The Prodigal Son," were sung with great power and beauty of voice.

NOV 9 - 1918

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

IT may have been a significant coincidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should return to Carnegie Hall on the day that New York was celebrating German's reported surrender. Certainly the memories of Dr. Muck have been quite "spurlos versenkt," and the sounds produced by the revised band under the baton of Pierre Monteux were fittingly echoed by the distant but triumphant horns and cowbells of Fifty-seventh street.

Backed by a huge spread of stars and stripes, doubled in octaves, as it were, the orchestra last evening made its big hit right at the start by reeling off the national anthems of America, France, England and Italy in rapid succession, responding to the vociferous demands of an audience which for the first time in the history of Boston's exclusive music makers was personally conducting a patriotic request programme.

What came afterward mattered very little. Slight disagreements of pitch between woodwind and strings, and an occasional wabble of the brass in the Franck symphony could easily be forgiven, for in every note the Bostonians were protesting their purity.

Schumann's "Manfred" was Byronically acceptable, and the unfamiliar "Peri" of Dukas emphasized the affinity of modern France and modern Russia. Debussy's "Iberia" completed a concert which had a real historical value, for it marked the final elimination of what once threatened to become an international issue.

K. L.

SUN
ss: New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT MATINEE

Monteux Presents Programme Combining Old Favorites With the New.

DAMROSCH ALSO PLAYS

Evening Concert Presents Mischa Levitzki as Soloist in Saint-Saens Number.

There was a time when he who proceeded from a matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to an evening contribution by the Symphony Society of New York carried a broken heart and a humble spirit. But the temper of the time is different and, as they say in "the Street," confidence has been restored. The Bostonians gave their first matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall and the New Yorkers their second evening concert.

M. Monteux presented a programme of the old and the new, with the elders sitting on guard at the front and the rear. Handel ushered in the feast with his concerto grosso in D, No. 5, and Beethoven finished it with his symphony in A, No. 7. Betwixt and between them were Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations.

A word about Loeffler, about whom too few are written. This composition was written in 1901, and since has been remodelled, at least as to its instrumentation. It is not one of the best works of this genuinely important American composer. He is American only by naturalization, like so many other things musical; but he is not American in the fashion of imtating the Teutonic lords of sound.

He writes like the modern Frenchmen, but with a clearly distinguishable individuality. "La Bonne Chanson," which pursues the elusive shadow of a Verlaine fancy, is skilfully made, and its orchestral textures are gorgeous, but its imagination halts at times and there is too much method in its fantasy.

Dance of the Seven Veils.

THE SUN'S musical recorder confesses to an ancient and somewhat shamefaced weakness for d'Indy's delineation of the entry of Istar into the lower regions. Of course there is something ludicrous in the attempt to compose the disrobing dance of the seven veils by clothing a theme in variations, stripping them off one at a time and exposing the theme unadorned at the end.

But how beautiful the naked theme when you get down to it! One remembers Herod's cry, "Dance for me, Salome. Ah, thou art to dance with naked feet. 'Tis well. Thy little feet will be like white doves. They will be like little white flowers that dance upon the trees." Yes, there come memories. But what have they to do with the Boston Symphony concert?

The orchestra was very luscious in certain parts of these two modern lyrics of sense. But, alas, there was much dryness in the ingenious and delectable concerto of Mr. Handel. The solo instruments were particularly professorial in tone and style and the tutti were rectangular. The first movement of the Beethoven symphony had little of the joyous spirit of the composer's fancy except speed and impetuosity. It had enough and to spare of both.

The slow movement cannot easily be spoiled, but it was well done and the scherzo was played admirably. There was more clarity and there was a finer adjustment of tonal balance in the middle movements of the symphony than in anything else the orchestra has done here under the baton of M. Monteux. He seems to be happier in the heavier lights and shadows of opera, where he will relax his beat and his soul to-morrow night.

SUN
s: New York City.

Music

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony, on its native heath, is something between an enjoined privilege and a very fashionable religion. Here in New York it is taken, along with the rest of life, a little more lightly, although its perfections are no less appreciated. Certainly it is the king of all the golden orchestral rivers, but with the gods showering so many streams of artistic magic upon fortunate Manhattan its worldly and unregenerate inhabitants cannot be expected to worship, in pure Bostonese style, at one and only one altar. The return of that orchestra, however, to Carnegie Hall each autumn is always the big event of the orchestral season; the cognoscenti are out and the lowbrows are for once happily forgotten. Last night's first concert of this season, however, was a more than doubly significant event, because the orchestra which played upon the stage of Carnegie was not the Muckian ensemble that in the past few years, under the leadership of the most famous interned of them all, carved for that orchestra, with all its glowing past, an indestructible present. The remorseless—perhaps too much for some—perfection of the Boston Symphony had become a byword; it was a matchless, if perhaps a little coldly remote, instrument of beauty that came from Boston every fortnight.

The new Boston Symphony, new considering the extensive changes in its membership, and the new directors, has laid out for itself as no light obligation the living up to and the revivification under the protective coloration of patriotism of the high artistic ideals of its past. Last night's concert showed that the reorganization in the name of the Allies has shaken more than the mere membership; the threads of the fabric cannot be ripped here and there without spoiling the pattern. On the other hand, these are early days for a last judgment; if Labaud has a hard task before him Monteux has had a still harder one in the last few weeks of preparation for an over critical public and a disorganized orchestra, which for years has been an absolute unity.

Mr. Monteux conducted his orchestra last night on a significant night; an audience which had with the rest of New York madly welcomed an unverified peace, found a Boston programme a far call from a paper tearing day. The paper tearing spirit had its outlet, at the beginning of the performance, when the orchestra played first "The Star Spangled Banner" set to the dignified and stately orchestral background supplied by Mr. Converse. After which the audience had to have the "Marseillaise," the Italian national anthem and "God Save the King." There were still some who apparently wanted the Brabanconne, or the anthem of Siam, but the orchestra settled down with a fine renunciation to the Franck Symphony in D minor.

This particular symphony seems to have been seized upon by all the orchestral leaders from Chicago east for their first concerts this fall.

It was perhaps unfortunate for M. Monteux' aggregation that the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory under M. Messager had antedated its playing here, for the perfectly tempered Parisian orchestra at its first concert gave to the symphony a richer, defter reading than it received last night. There is no lack of warmth or fire in Mr. Monteux' reading, but there was too much noise, too much encouragement to the brass, too little delicacy at times to the solo singing of the woodwinds, by which the themes one by one are written down. These are irregularities that practice and time may pare down; it would require much bungling to impair for the hearer the almost unearthly beauties of the Franck symphonies. They belong not quite to this sinful world.

TIMES
New York City

TWO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS PLAY

Pierre Monteux Again Conducts the Boston at Matinee in Carnegie Hall.

A TRIUMPH FOR LEVITZKI

Young American Displays His Pianistic Prowess at Concert of the New York Society.

The first matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon before a large audience, which enthusiastically demanded the "Marseillaise" after Pierre Monteux had conducted the national anthem. It was delivered with accustomed Gallic gusto. Whether he be considered as a temporary conductor or as a skilled and versatile musician, M. Monteux deserves the gratitude of our musical public. Yesterday his brief connection with the band from Boston came to a close, and tomorrow evening we hope to see him in his familiar place at the head of the Metropolitan Opera forces. The music at the matinée went with more precision and spirit than at the opening concert last Thursday evening. And the musical scheme was more interesting. Handel, Loeffler, D'Indy and Beethoven. Two old-time Germans, one American and one Frenchman.

The tonality D major began and ended the matinée Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, for string orchestra, was, no doubt, selected to show the paces of that particular department. It must be confessed that neither the reading nor the performance was distinguished. The Introduction and Allegro were rather wiry in tone, nor was the Largo ingratiating to the ear. The various solos were played by Frederick Fradkin, the new concert master; his colleague, S. Noack; C. Barrier, viola, and J. Malkin, violoncello.

The absence of elasticity in the strings did not cease with the Handel number, for "La Bonne Chanson," by Charles Martin Loeffler, which followed, lacked an eloquent interpretation for patent reasons. This orchestral poem has not been heard here for years. Since then the composer has revised the score and reorchestrated it. He has employed as his motto the fifth poem in the Paul Verlaine's delicate and tender "La Bonne Chanson." Loeffler is a tone painter doubled by a poet; even if he were not a musician he could not have escaped the temptation to drop into verse, like Silas Wegg. His score is rich in sentiment and shifting moods, its coloring ranging from sombre purple to the violet rays. The Loeffler palette is mixed with brains and lovely hues. This work was originally presented in company with the composer's "Villanelle du Diable."

The Symphonic Variations, by Vincent D'Indy, "Istar," the Oriental young woman who is divested of her harmonic lingerie coram publico, had the proper atmospheric quality. It is cerebral music at the best, and it reveals the frigidity of an Academic nude by Jules Lefebvre. But enormously clever. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony closed a pleasant afternoon, though there was nothing of note in the performance except that the Allegretto was the high-water mark of the program, while a word is not amiss concerning the dash of the finale. As a whole, there were much spots and tonal dryness. M. Monteux was warmly received and, considering the task he essayed at such short notice he admirably succeeded. The rôle of a stop-gap is ever thankless.

WORLD
ss: New York City

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS GIVE MUSICAL TREATS.

Boston Organization's Beethoven Work Pleases, as Does New York Orchestra's Programme

Two symphony concerts and one of mixed character represented the serious musical achievements here yesterday. In the afternoon in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony men played their first matinee programme, Beethoven's seventh symphony being the most important work.

Temporary Conductor Monteux led with much fervor and obtained abundant contrasts, especially in Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and the "Istar" variations of d'Indy; but his fortes also were so much overdone that the desired melodic and harmonic definitions were blurred. Handel's great D major concerto for strings opened the performance, which was heavily attended.

A splendid programme was given in the evening by the New York Symphony Orchestra, also in Carnegie Hall. Borodin's B minor symphony, which pulsates with life and color, was the most interesting composition. Paul Vidal's "Danses Tanagreevines" received its New York premiere, and Mischa Levitzki played the Saint-Saens G minor concerto.

A large audience heard a concert of Swedish music in Aeolian Hall last night, the performers being Greta Torpadie, soprano; Edna Gunnar Peterson, pianist, and Samul Ljung Kvist, tenor. There were some commendable compositions offered and others of no pronounced musical worth.

TRIBUNE
New York City
NOV 8 1919

Music

Visit From the Boston Orchestra With a French Conductor

By H. E. Krehbiel

The Boston Orchestra, which departed from us last spring amid recriminations and heartburnings, and followed by regrets as well as imprecations because of its German conductor, returned to us at Carnegie Hall last night with a French leader of good local repute at its head. It was sped with contumely, it was welcomed with rejoicings. In the interim it has undergone constitutional changes as well as dynastic, but since in its home town its temporary conductor was received metaphorically with shouts of "The king is dead! Long live the king!" there is danger that we should be called unpatriotic did we not echo the cry. The organization comes back to us "as chastened and not killed" as Paul remarked to the Corinthians. It brings with it on this visit M. Pierre Monteux, of whose excellence as an operatic conductor the local public was well advised. Nevertheless it is a pleasure to say of him that in his new capacity he seemed as admirable as in that in which he had already won our admiration. It was a happy dispensation which brought him to us on a night when we could think of the gentleman interned at Oglethorpe with some of the goodwill which filled all hearts and yet with no regret that he was not at the head of the purged and purified organization. Purged and purified, but neither bettered nor worsened as much as was hoped and feared. The wind-choirs have suffered, both wood and brass, but that they are still capable is incontestable, and that M. Monteux has worked something like a miracle with the band is incontestable. Last night's audience, a fine one in number and character, was not in a captious mood, however. It rejoiced in the opportunity to hear the organization whose stiff-necked, short-sighted manager withheld "The Star-Spangled Banner" play not only that patriotic air, but also because insistent applause commanded also the national airs of France, England and Italy, and settled down to the conventional business of the evening only because it was a duty enforced by artistic propriety.

The programme was made up of César Franck's D minor symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," a "danced poem" entitled "La Péri," by Dukas, and the second of Debussy's "Images" entitled "Iberia." The performance of the symphony might under ordinary circumstances have tempted a comparison of reading and execution with the work done recently under M. Messager by the orchestra of the Conservatory. But we forbear beyond saying that while there was not finesse in the performance of the Frenchmen there was less academic rigidity and more virility in that of the band from Boston. The Debussy piece has been played here before by the Boston Orchestra as well as our own Philharmonic. By a coincidence, when Mr Fiedler brought it fo ward some seven years ago, he also associated it with Franck's symphony. This circumstance was edifying for those who were able and willing to take note of the divergent trends of French music during the last generation, assuming that César Franck is to be taken as a representative of French and not Franco-Flemish music. The D minor symphony has been played so often in this city within the last few years that its defect of reiteration of theme and mood has been so forced upon attention as to militate a little unduly, perhaps, against the lofty beauty of the work. Its monotony has grown almost oppressive. But it is honest music, logical, consistent with the materials, purposes and capacities of the art, never straying outside its boundaries. Debussy's "Iberia" is in a vastly different case. As music it is chiefly concerned with an exploitation of devices in orchestral combinations and an attempt to appeal to the fancy and ear by extra musical means. It professes not only to depict such scenes as the streets and bypaths of Spain and suggest the spirit of a Spanish festival, but also to give an impression of the night air burdened with odors.

That there may be some association between sounds, colors and odors is an ancient notion, and simultaneous appeals to optical, aural and olfactory nerves date back at least as far as Apuleius's sojourn in Alexandria. We know that when the intellect first gives an impetus to the fancy much can be done in the way of juggling with the senses in music. Fantastic as it may sound, we know that in the idyllic scene in "Siegfried" Wagner almost makes the eyes hear and the ears see; but he first puts the picture and a dramatic situation before as. It is also something more than mere fancy when after the storm scene in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony the Ranz des Vaches, which introduces the final movement, seems to make us feel a freshened and reinvigorated atmosphere. And this magic is accomplished by purely musical means, aided but slightly by the verbal programme. But can even a programmatic title make the ear smell? A Viennese critic once professed that such a dreadful thing as a stench in the ear had been suggested to him when listening for the first time to Tschaikowsky's violin concerto; but that was only a literary trick caught from a German æsthetician who had said that some pictures had a bad odor in the eye. Here criticism has gone as far astray as the performances which it is endeavoring to reprobate. We see no struts, and we smell no odors in Debussy's so-called "image." All that we do is to recognize that Spanish rhythms and melodies of a Spanish type have been put together fragmentarily in a manner so ingenious as to fascinate a sophisticated listener. Musical themes based on exotic scales are no more redolent of sweet perfumes than would be themes frankly conceived in the familiar diatonic modes; nor can they be made odorous by ingenious and novel combinations of orchestral voices.

A novel in our concert rooms was the ballet music by Dukas, which was first heard in Paris five years ago, when the composition had its proper adjuncts of stage picture and pantomime. It might have made a different impression last night had the listeners been permitted to see and not merely imagine the scene showing, as Mr. Hale tells us it did at the Châtelet Theatre, "gold mountains, crimson valleys and trees bearing silver fruit," and also to witness the choreographic acting ("miming" is the word since the Russian dancers brought revelations to young reviewers) of Mademoiselle Trouhanowa, whose figure, we hope, is better for the eye than her name. The story

EVENING MAIL
s: New York City

CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Florence Easton Appears as Soloist.

The reconstructed Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Brooklyn at the Academy of Music last night, with Pierre Monteux as the temporary leader of the Boston forces. The orchestra was greeted by an unusually large audience, which showed patriotic enthusiasm after the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner."

The programme opened with Cesar Frank's Symphony in D minor, which was played in a noteworthy fashion; then Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Symphonic Variations "Istar" of d'Indy and three "Images" for orchestra of Debussy. In all of these the orchestra played with its old-time finesse and finish, with color and contrast in execution. There were moments when the strings were celestial and the woodwind euphonious.

Conductor Monteux was a very insistent leader and dug out dynamic effects by the roots, producing a mystic color and subtle charm.

Florence Easton, a soprano of the Metropolitan Opera forces, was the soloist, and the recitatives, "How Susanna Delays," and "Flown Forever" (Mozart), Debussy's recitative and air of Lia from "The Prodigal Son," were sung with great power and beauty of voice.

NOV 9 - 1919

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

IT may have been a significant coincidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should return to Carnegie Hall on the day that New York was celebrating German's reported surrender. Certainly the memories of Dr. Muck have been quite "spurlos versenkt," and the sounds produced by the revised band under the baton of Pierre Monteux were fittingly echoed by the distant but triumphant horns and cowbells of Fifty-seventh street.

Backed by a huge spread of stars and stripes, doubled in octaves, as it were, the orchestra last evening made its big hit right at the start by reeling off the national anthems of America, France, England and Italy in rapid succession, responding to the vociferous demands of an audience which for the first time in the history of Boston's exclusive music makers was personally conducting a patriotic request programme.

What came afterward mattered very little. Slight disagreements of pitch between woodwind and strings, and an occasional wabble of the brass in the Franck symphony could easily be forgiven, for in every note the Bostonians were protesting their purity.

Schumann's "Manfred" was Byronically acceptable, and the unfamiliar "Peri" of Dukas emphasized the affinity of modern France and modern Russia. Debussy's "Iberia" completed a concert which had a real historical value, for it marked the final elimination of what once threatened to become an international issue.

K. L.

SUN

ss: New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT MATINEE

Monteux Presents Programme Combining Old Favorites With the New.

DAMROSCH ALSO PLAYS

Evening Concert Presents Mischa Levitzki as Soloist in Saint-Saens Number.

There was a time when he who proceeded from a matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to an evening contribution by the Symphony Society of New York carried a broken heart and a humble spirit. But the temper of the time is different and, as they say in "the Street," confidence has been restored. The Bostonians gave their first matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall and the New Yorkers their second evening concert.

M. Monteux presented a programme of the old and the new, with the elders sitting on guard at the front and the rear. Handel ushered in the feast with his concerto grosso in D, No. 5, and Beethoven finished it with his symphony in A, No. 7. Betwixt and between them were Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations.

A word about Loeffler, about whom too few are written. This composition was written in 1901, and since has been remodelled, at least as to its instrumentation. It is not one of the best works of this genuinely important American composer. He is American only by naturalization, like so many other things musical; but he is not American in the fashion of imtating the Teutonic lords of sound.

He writes like the modern Frenchmen, but with a clearly distinguishable individuality. "La Bonne Chanson," which pursues the elusive shadow of a Verlaine fancy, is skilfully made, and its orchestral textures are gorgeous, but its imagination halts at times and there is too much method in its fantasy.

Dance of the Seven Veils.

THE SUN'S musical recorder confesses to an ancient and somewhat shamefaced weakness for d'Indy's delineation of the entry of Istar into the lower regions. Of course there is something ludicrous in the attempt to compose the disrobing dance of the seven veils by clothing a theme in variations, stripping them off one at a time and exposing the theme unadorned at the end.

But how beautiful the naked theme when you get down to it! One remembers Herod's cry, "Dance for me, Salome. Ah, thou art to dance with naked feet. 'Tis well. Thy little feet will be like white doves. They will be like little white flowers that dance upon the trees." Yes, there come memories. But what have they to do with the Boston Symphony concert?

The orchestra was very luscious in certain parts of these two modern lyrics of sense. But, alas, there was much dryness in the ingenious and delectable concerto of Mr. Handel. The solo instruments were particularly professorial in tone and style and the tutti were rectangular. The first movement of the Beethoven symphony had little of the joyous spirit of the composer's fancy except speed and impetuosity. It had enough and to spare of both.

The slow movement cannot easily be spoiled, but it was well done and the scherzo was played admirably. There was more clarity and there was a finer adjustment of tonal balance in the middle movements of the symphony than in anything else the orchestra has done here under the baton of M. Monteux. He seems to be happier in the heavier lights and shadows of opera, where he will relax his beat and his soul to-morrow night.

SUN

ss: New York City.

Music

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony, on its native heath, is something between an enjoined privilege and a very fashionable religion. Here in New York it is taken, along with the rest of life, a little more lightly, although its perfections are no less appreciated. Certainly it is the king of all the golden orchestral rivers, but with the gods showering so many streams of artistic magic upon fortunate Manhattan its worldly and unregenerate inhabitants cannot be expected to worship, in pure Bostonese style, at one and only one altar. The return of that orchestra, however, to Carnegie Hall each autumn is always the big event of the orchestral season; the cognoscenti are out and the lowbrows are for once happily forgotten. Last night's first concert of this season, however, was a more than doubly significant event, because the orchestra which played upon the stage of Carnegie was not the Muckian ensemble that in the past few years, under the leadership of the most famous interned of them all, carved for that orchestra, with all its glowing past, an indestructible present. The remorseless—perhaps too much for some—perfection of the Boston Symphony had become a byword; it was a matchless, if perhaps a little coldly remote, instrument of beauty that came from Boston every fortnight.

The new Boston Symphony, new considering the extensive changes in its membership, and the new directors, has laid out for itself as no light obligation the living up to and the revivification under the protective coloration of patriotism of the high artistic ideals of its past. Last night's concert showed that the reorganization in the name of the Allies has shaken more than the mere membership; the threads of the fabric cannot be ripped here and there without spoiling the pattern. On the other hand, these are early days for a last judgment; if Rabaud has a hard task before him Monteux has had a still harder one in the last few weeks of preparation for an over critical public and a disorganized orchestra, which for years has been an absolute unity.

Mr. Monteux conducted his orchestra last night on a significant night; an audience which had with the rest of New York madly welcomed an unverified peace, found a Boston programme a far call from a paper 'earing day. The paper tearing spirit had its outlet, at the beginning of the performance, when the orchestra played first "The Star Spangled Banner" set to the dignified and stately orchestral background supplied by Mr. Converse. After which the audience had to have the "Marseillaise," the Italian national anthem and "God Save the King." There were still some who apparently wanted the Brabanconne, or the air of Siam, but the orchestra settled down with a fine renunciation to the Franck Symphony in D minor.

This particular symphony seems to have been seized upon by all the orchestral leaders from Chicago east for their first concerts this fall.

It was perhaps unfortunate for Mr. Ronteux' aggregation that the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory under M. Messager had antedated its playing here, for the perfectly tempered Parisian orchestra at its first concert gave to the symphony a richer, defter reading than it received last night There is no lack of warmth or fire in Mr. Monteux' reading, but there was too much noise, too much encouragement to the brass, too little delicacy at times to the solo singing of the woodwinds, by which the themes one by one are written down. These are irregularities that practice and time may pare down; it would require much bungling to impair for the hearer the almost unearthly beauties of the Franck symphonies. They belong not quite to this sinful world.

TIMES

New York City

TWO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS PLAY

Pierre Monteux Again Conducts the Boston at Matinee in Carnegie Hall.

A TRIUMPH FOR LEVITZKI

Young American Displays His Pianistic Prowess at Concert of the New York Society.

The first matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon before a large audience, which enthusiastically demanded the "Marseillaise" after Pierre Monteux had conducted the national anthem. It was delivered with accustomed Gallic gusto. Whether he be considered as a temporary conductor or as a skilled and versatile musician, M. Monteux deserves the gratitude of our musical public. Yesterday his brief connection with the band from Boston came to a close, and tomorrow evening we hope to see him in his familiar place at the head of the Metropolitan Opera forces. The music at the matinée went with more precision and spirit than at the opening concert last Thursday evening. And the musical scheme was more interesting. Handel, Loeffler, D'Indy and Beethoven. Two old-time Germans, one American and one Frenchman.

The tonality D major began and ended the matinée Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, for string orchestra, was, no doubt, selected to show the paces of that particular department. It must be confessed that neither the reading nor the performance was distinguished. The Introduction and Allegro were rather wiry in tone, nor was the Largo ingratiating to the ear. The various solos were played by Frederick Fradkin, the new concert master; his colleague, S. Noack; C. Barrier, viola, and J. Malkin, violoncello.

The absence of elasticity in the strings did not cease with the Handel number, for "La Bonne Chanson," by Charles Martin Loeffler, which followed, lacked an eloquent interpretation for patent reasons. This orchestral poem has not been heard here for years. Since then the composer has revised the score and orchestrated it. He has employed as his motto the fifth poem in the Paul Verlaine's delicate and tender "La Bonne Chanson." Loeffler is a tone painter doubled by a poet; even if he were not a musician he could not have escaped the temptation to drop into verse, like Silas Wegg. His score is rich in sentiment and shifting moods, its coloring ranging from sombre purple to the violet rays. The Loeffler palette is mixed with brains and lovely hues. This work was originally presented in company with the composer's "Villanelle du Diable."

The Symphonic Variations, by Vincent d'Indy, "Istar," the Oriental young woman who is divested of her harmonic degrees coram publico, had the proper atmospheric quality. It is cerebral music at the best, and it reveals the frigidity of an Academic nude by Mr. Lefebvre. But enormously clever. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony closed the pleasant afternoon, though there was nothing of note in the performance except that the Allegretto was the high-water mark of the program, while a word is not amiss concerning the dash of the finale. As a whole, there were flat spots and tonal dryness. M. Monteux was warmly received and, during the task he essayed at such short notice he admirably succeeded. Work of a stop-gap is ever thankless.

WORLD

ss: New York City

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS GIVE MUSICAL TREATS.

Boston Organization's Beethoven Work Pleases, as Does New York Orchestra's Programme

Two symphony concerts and one of mixed character represented the serious musical achievements here yesterday. In the afternoon in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony men played their first matinee programme, Beethoven's seventh symphony being the most important work.

Temporary Conductor Monteux led with much fervor and obtained abundant contrasts, especially in Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and the "Istar" variations of d'Indy; but his fortes also were so much overdone that the desired melodic and harmonic definitions were blurred. Handel's great D major concerto for strings opened the performance, which was heavily attended.

A splendid programme was given in the evening by the New York Symphony Orchestra, also in Carnegie Hall. Borodin's B minor symphony, which pulsates with life and color, was the most interesting composition. Paul Vidal's "Danses Tanagreevines" received its New York premiere, and Mischa Levitzki played the Saint-Saens G minor concerto.

A large audience heard a concert of Swedish music in Aeolian Hall last night, the performers being Greta Torpadie, soprano; Edna Gunnar Peterson, pianist, and Samul Ljung Kvist, tenor. There were some commendable compositions offered and others of no pronounced musical worth.

TRIBUNE

New York City

NOV 8 1919

Music

Visit From the Boston Orchestra With a French Conductor

By H. E. Krehbiel

The Boston Orchestra, which departed from us last spring amid recriminations and heartburnings, and followed by regrets as well as imprecations because of its German conductor, returned to us at Carnegie Hall last night with a French leader of good local repute at its head. It was sped with contumely, it was welcomed with rejoicings. In the interim it has undergone constitutional changes as well as dynastic, but since in its home town its temporary conductor was received metaphorically with shouts of "The king is dead! Long live the king!" there is danger that we should be called unpatriotic did we not echo the cry. The organization comes back to us "as chastened and not killed" as Paul remarked to the Corinthians. It brings with it on this visit M. Pierre Monteux, of whose excellence as an operatic conductor the local public was well advised. Nevertheless it is a pleasure to say of him that in his new capacity he seemed as admirable as in that in which he had already won our admiration. It was a happy dispensation which brought him to us on a night when we could think of the gentleman interned at Oglethorpe with some of the goodwill which filled all hearts and yet with no regret that he was not at the head of the purged and purified organization. Purged and purified, but neither bettered nor worsened as much as was hoped and feared. The wind-choirs have suffered, both wood and brass, but that they are still capable is incontestable, and that M. Monteux has worked something like a miracle with the band is incontestable. Last night's audience, a fine one in number and character, was not in a captious mood, however. It rejoiced in the opportunity to hear the organization whose stiff-necked, short-sighted manager withheld "The Star-Spangled Banner" play not only that patriotic air, but also because insistent applause commanded also the national airs of France, England and Italy, and settled down to the conventional business of the evening only because it was a duty enforced by artistic propriety.

The programme was made up of César Franck's D minor symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," a "danced poem" entitled "La Péri," by Dukas, and the second of Debussy's "Images" entitled "Iberia." The performance of the symphony might under ordinary circumstances have tempted a comparison of reading and execution with the work done recently under M. Messager by the orchestra of the Conservatory. But we forbear beyond saying that while there was not finesse in the performance of the Frenchmen there was less academic rigidity and more virility in that of the band from Boston. The Debussy piece has been played here before by the Boston Orchestra as well as our own Philharmonic. By a coincidence, when Mr Fiedler brought it fo ward some seven years ago, he also associated it with Franck's symphony. This circumstance was edifying for those who were able and willing to take note of the divergent trends of French music during the last generation, assuming that César Franck is to be taken as a representative of French and not Franco-Flemish music. The D minor symphony has been played so often in this city within the last few years that its defect of reiteration of theme and mood has been so forced upon attention as to militate a little unduly, perhaps, against the lofty beauty of the work. Its monotony has grown almost oppressive. But it is honest music, logical, consistent with the materials, purposes and capacities of the art, never straying outside its boundaries. Debussy's "Iberia" is in a vastly different case. As music it is chiefly concerned with an exploitation of devices in orchestral combinations and an attempt to appeal to the fancy and ear by extra musical means. It professes not only to depict such scenes as the streets and bypaths of Spain and suggest the spirit of a Spanish festival, but also to give an impression of the night air burdened with odors.

That there may be some association between sounds, colors and odors is an ancient notion, and simultaneous appeals to optical, aural and olfactory nerves date back at least as far as Apuleius's sojourn in Alexandria. We know that when the intellect first gives an impetus to the fancy much can be done in the way of juggling with the senses in music. Fantastic as it may sound, we know that in the idyllic scene in "Siegfried" Wagner almost makes the eyes hear and the ears see; but he first puts the picture and a dramatic situation before us. It is also something more than mere fancy when after the storm scene in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony the Ranz des Vaches, which introduces the final movement, seems to make us feel a freshened and reinvigorated atmosphere. And this magic is accomplished by purely musical means, aided but slightly by the verbal programme. But can even a programmatic title make the ear smell? A Viennese critic once professed that such a dreadful thing as a stench in the ear had been suggested to him when listening for the first time to Tschaikowsky's violin concerto; but that was only a literary trick caught from a German æsthetician who had said that some pictures had a bad odor in the eye. Here criticism has gone as far astray as the performances which it is endeavoring to reprobate. We see no struts, and we smell no odors in Debussy's so-called "image." All that we do is to recognize that Spanish rhythms and melodies of a Spanish type have been put together fragmentarily in a manner so ingenious as to fascinate a sophisticated listener. Musical themes based on exotic scales are no more redolent of sweet perfumes than would be themes frankly conceived in the familiar diatonic modes; nor can they be made odorous by ingenious and novel combinations of orchestral voices.

A novel in our concert rooms was the ballet music by Dukas, which was first heard in Paris five years ago, when the composition had its proper adjuncts of stage picture and pantomime. It might have made a different impression last night had the listeners been permitted to see and not merely imagine the scene showing, as Mr. Hale tells us it did at the Châtelet Theatre, "gold mountains, crimson valleys and trees bearing silver fruit," and also to witness the choreographic acting ("miming" is the word since the Russian dancers brought revelations to young reviewers) of Mademoiselle Trouhanowa, whose figure, we hope, is better for the eye than her name. The story

CITIZEN

ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Florence Easton Appears as Soloist.

The reconstructed Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Brooklyn at the Academy of Music last night, with Pierre Monteux as the temporary leader of the Boston forces. The orchestra was greeted by an unusually large audience, which showed patriotic enthusiasm after the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner."

The programme opened with Cesar Frank's Symphony in D minor, which was played in a noteworthy fashion; then Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Symphonic Variations "Istar" of d'Indy and three "Images" for orchestra of Debussy. In all of these the orchestra played with its old-time finesse and finish, with color and contrast in execution. There were moments when the strings were celestial and the woodwind euphonious.

Conductor Monteux was a very insistent leader and dug out dynamic effects by the roots, producing a mystic color and subtle charm.

Florence Easton, a soprano of the Metropolitan Opera forces, was the soloist, and the recitatives, "How Susanna Delays," and "Flown Forever" (Mozart), Debussy's recitative and air of Lia from "The Prodigal Son," were sung with great power and beauty of voice.

EVENING MAIL

ss: New York City

NOV 9 - 1919

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

IT may have been a significant coincidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should return to Carnegie Hall on the day that New York was celebrating German's reported surrender. Certainly the memories of Dr. Muck have been quite "spurlos versenkt," and the sounds produced by the revised band under the baton of Pierre Monteux were fittingly echoed by the distant but triumphant horns and cowbells of Fifty-seventh street.

Backed by a huge spread of stars and stripes, doubled in octaves, as it were, the orchestra last evening made its big hit right at the start by reeling off the national anthems of America, France, England and Italy in rapid succession, responding to the vociferous demands of an audience which for the first time in the history of Boston's exclusive music makers was personally conducting a patriotic request programme.

What came afterward mattered very little. Slight disagreements of pitch between woodwind and strings, and an occasional wabble of the brass in the Franck symphony could easily be forgiven, for in every note the Bostonians were protesting their purity.

Schumann's "Manfred" was Byronically acceptable, and the unfamiliar "Peri" of Dukas emphasized the affinity of modern France and modern Russia. Debussy's "Iberia" completed a concert which had a real historical value, for it marked the final elimination of what once threatened to become an international issue.

K. L.

EVENING TELEGRAM
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 2 - 18

MUSIC SUFFERS FROM THE WAR

Outlook for Season Here a Present Time Chaotic—Profession Hard Hit

BATTERED by the war, buffeted by the "flu," the Philadelphia musical season of 1918-19 made its belated appearance at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon, when the Philadelphia Orchestra gave the first important concert; in fact, it might almost be said to have been the first concert of the year.

The war has made itself felt in every walk of life and music has not escaped the lot of the other professions. Indeed, as the active cultivation of the art in the form of learning to play or sing might be considered somewhat of a luxury, there is little doubt that financially the musical profession has been harder hit than most others. At the same time, the value of hearing good music, with its tremendous, if silent, effect upon the public morale, is recognized by those who are directing the destiny of the nation. Therefore there is little doubt that music will be considered as an "essential," as it really is, in the last analysis.

* * *

THE outlook for the season at this time, outside of the regular orchestra concerts and operatic performances, is somewhat chaotic. Comparatively few concerts have been postponed, because condition caused by the war were so uncertain that few soloists cared to announce recitals until the season began with the concerts of the big orchestras and the musical atmosphere clarified. The most important of the postponed recitals was that of Jascha Heifetz, scheduled for last Wednesday at the Metropolitan, which concert was torn from its moorings by the gale of influenza and swept away to a date to be announced later.

The attitude of America towards music in wartime is still more or less of an unanswered question. There are many whose sons or husbands have made the supreme sacrifice for universal liberty, and into the souls of whom the iron has entered deep, but as a nation we have not had the real horrors of war brought home to us. Therefore, it remains to be seen whether we as a people will turn to music for solace in the same sense as have the burdened, weary people of France and England; whether the problems of the world strife will merely distract our attention from music, or whether the world's burden of grief will drive us to it for the solace it unquestionably gives. Upon the answer to this hangs the fate of the coming season.

* * *

THE concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra have begun and, together with the series by the Boston Symphony and three concerts of the New York Symphony Society, form the basis of the local season.

The orchestra has unquestionably been strengthened in personnel by the changes which Mr. Stokowski has made. Andre Maquarre, for many years first flutist of the Boston Orchestra, takes the same position in our orchestra, succeeding his brother, Daniel Maquarre, who left at the close of last season. Emile Ferir, solo viola of the Boston Orchestra, takes the same position here, succeeding Alfred Lorenz, who returns to the first violins, from which choir he was originally selected by Mr. Stokowski to become first viola. There are a number of other changes in the personnel which have tended to strengthen the organization.

In one way the influenza epidemic helped the orchestra, even if its effect upon the general musical season was not so good. It gave them three weeks of daily rehearsal, which in a season when a great many new or at least unfamiliar works will be performed, will prove to be a decided advantage. As there were no concerts during this time, the orchestra was able to give its undivided time and attention to the rehearsal of these compositions, and much was gained which will be apparent to the regular concertgoer later in the season.

* * *

MUCH interest, not to say curiosity, attends upon the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Philadelphia musicians are eager to see how the organization came through the famous "Muck" raking episode of last spring, an episode which not only deprived the orchestra of its leader, but also caused sweeping changes in the personnel. And not all of those who left were of the enemy countries, as witness the coming of Maquarre and Ferir, both of the French musical school, if not of actual French citizenship.

However, the chief interest centers in the new conductors. Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, will conduct the concert next Monday evening and the new permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud, will conduct the second concert in December.

Monteux's work as an operatic conductor is well known, but as a symphonic director he is an unknown quantity in Philadelphia. His work will be of especial interest because it is not given to every one to conduct opera and symphonic works with equal skill. Philadelphians will have an unusually good chance to judge because he will interpret the D-minor Symphony of Cesar Franck, which Mr. Stokowski has made familiar to Philadelphia audiences.

* * *

THE advent of Rabaud next month will also be of great interest. He has never been in this country, and so his conductorship is unknown here, but Mr. Stokowski has played a symphony of his, a work of much charm though not of great depth. As the writer remembers it, the work was not aggressively modern in harmony and was built along classical lines as to form, the scherzo, with a very original and brilliant harp part at the close, being the most attractive movement. An opera of his, "Marouf," was given in New York, but was not performed in this city. Like Monteux, Rabaud has proved his proficiency in a branch of the art other than conducting—but here again it is given to few musicians both to compose and conduct and do both well.

EVENING POST
ess: New York City

A Note on Music.

This is the greatest day in the history of the world, but it is not a day for musical criticism. President Wilson has truly said that "there is no better way to express patriotism than through music." Throughout the world—even in Germany, where there are millions who now want peace at any price—voices and instruments will unite in pæans of exultation over the end of the war. But who wants to read about any other kind of music on such a day?

For the record's sake a few lines may be penned about musical happenings on Saturday and Sunday. Included in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert was a novelty by Charles Martin Loeffler, an Alsatian by birth, who has lived in Boston since 1881. Though he studied in Berlin he never became an imitator of German models. Nor is his music American. It is purely Parisian, some of it being more Debussyan than Debussy's. His "La Bonne Chanson," which was heard in Carnegie Hall on Saturday, is along similar lines, though less imitative than some of his other works, such as "The Death of Tintagiles." To this, on the other hand, it is inferior in thematic invention, as well as in shimmering richness of orchestral coloring. It is beautifully orchestrated, but apart from that it seemed to have no special raison d'être.

HERALD
New York City
NOV

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S PLAYING SHOWS NEED OF LEADERSHIP TO RESTORE ITS SUPREMACY

Herald's Critic Reviews Second Concert and Looks for Gradual Assimilation of New Artists in Reorganized Orchestra Under M. Ribaud.

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

After more than a quarter of a century of personal opinion that the Boston Symphony was one of the best, if not the best, orchestras in the world one listened almost aghast in half convinced wonderment to the playing of the orchestra last Thursday night. Critical promptings to exclaim "Eheu Fugaces," "Ichabod, Ichabod" and other comminatory comments were too insistent to be allowed expression, because no constructive critic aims or wishes to overturn idols or subvert ideals. For the Boston orchestra has been an undisturbed orchestral ideal to the American public for years.

Neither would any likeminded critic desire to support Colonel Higginson's dictum that none but a German conductor can conduct a symphony, or in any way indorse the notion that without German musicians no orchestra could continue to exist in this country.

The wonderful unison voice of this orchestra, in effect a magnificent single instrument, was a definite characteristic which made it almost unique. The playing together in personal contact, as it were, of so many men and so many instruments for so many years produced a unity of intent, impulse and actual tonal values unattainable in any other way.

Granting this, it is evident that any considerable change in the personnel of the orchestra, due to war requirements, would inevitably disturb for the time being at any rate previously existent orchestral conditions. I cannot but feel that the previous spirit and purpose of this great orchestra is still dominant—for nearly forty years of great tradition must mean something—and that all that is needed now is a gradual assimilation of and adaptation to new conditions under such a conductor as I hope Mr. Henri Rabaud may prove to easily restore the Boston orchestra to the former high and acknowledged orchestral supremacy to which its great traditions and lofty purposes entitle it.

Heard in New Programme.

The orchestra for so many years has been so supreme that slight technical imperfections, which might be passed over with any other organization, in this instance cannot remain unnoticed. The playing of the orchestra in the second concert of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was not such as to lead me to revise my former impression of Thursday. The classical definiteness of Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 5, in D major, which opened the programme after the vague and elusive meandering of the modern French school of late, was positively refreshing in its old time formality. The strings played with accuracy and precision, if without any suave roundness or nobility of tone, but it struck me that the solo part, as rendered by Messrs. Fradkin—the new concert master—and Noak, sounded both thin and unimportant—Mr. Malkin's 'cello and Mr. Barrere's viola were much more impressive. The last movement allegro was by far the best played of the five movements of the work, as it possessed a life, finish, tone and vocal quality seemingly lacking in the other four.

The Loeffler number, "La Bonne Chanson," already familiar to us, with its "Tristan" references was played with distinction, good balance and contrast of sonority, and marked, perhaps, the best work done by the orchestra thus far. Mr. Monteux, too, for once content to let things take their own way, did not fume and insist too far.

D'Indy's "Istar" Played.

Vincent d'Indy, whose symphonic variations, "Istar," followed, has always represented to me the maximum of self-conscious empiricism, froth and harmonic extravagance of the modern French school at its worst, as well as the minimum of melodic invention or spontaniety. The straightforwardness of musical thought in conception and expression d'Indy is, however, at his best in this work, as in the interpretation of its strongly insistent dramatic suggestion, which approaches the operatic, was also Mr. Monteux, who conducted with picturesque appreciation and effect. The breadth and sonority of the strings was really imposing.

Mr. Monteau's interpretation of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which closed the programme, was somewhat perfunctorily and badly classical, a trifle blatant in the fortissimo and crudely unfinished in the softer passages; rather forcibly rythmic, but decidedly lacking in plasticity and charm. The two first movements were decidedly perfunctory, the lovely allegretto almost wholly without sentiment. The scherzo, read conventionally, was nevertheless played with spirit and rhythm, and the last movement was brilliant in a sort of rough and ready fashion. All honor to Mr. Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, who played this symphony at its last previous hearing. I look for important and welcome changes in the playing of Boston Orchestra before its next concert after Mr. Rabaud takes hold.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
NOV 8 1918

MONTEUX LEADS REORGANIZED BOSTON BAND

Metropolitan OperaConductor at Orchestra's First New York Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, completely expurgated but un-Bowdlerized, played its first New York concert of the season last evening in Carnegie Hall. The conductor, as every one had been apprised, was Pierre Monteux, loaned for the band's preliminary rehearsals and concerts by the Metropolitan Opera, where he is the director of the French repertoire. The permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud, from the Paris Opera, will have charge of the Boston Orchestra at the other eight concerts here, following that of to-morrow afternoon.

It was a singular and an opportune coincidence that the Boston Orchestra should have had its first appearance here fall on the evening that marked the celebration of the end of the war—for any doubt of this that there may have been in the mind of the audience that filled the hall quite as aforetime, was submerged in the realization of Germany's military collapse. A singular and happy coincidence, the thought of which took immediate shape in a roar of applause as Mr. Monteux led his men in "The Star Spangled Banner." The cloud of awkwardness and constraint and the seething of bile that attended performances of the national anthem last Spring became only a memory in contrast. Shouts for "The Marseillaise" and "God Save the King," following "The Star Spangled Banner," were answered by the orchestra's playing of the French and British national airs and Mr. Monteux then added the "Garibaldi Hymn" of Italy. And thereupon the now genuinely American band proceeded to set forth its quality in the announced program of the evening.

The orchestra has experienced a very radical transformation, and one that affects what one may call the internals rather than the externals of its tradition. The kernel of this tradition was its absorbedly German outlook upon the universe of music. Its deteutonization has changed all that. The externals of the band's tradition—the consummate smoothness and beauty of its playing—remain considerably, if not quite, the same.

What must have struck even the most casual among last night's audience—not observably different in quality from the usual Boston Symphony gathering—was the change in character from Dr. Karl Muck's polygonal programs. That of last evening was the most attractive, both as to content and inter-relationship, that a Boston Orchestra evening has been concerned with for a matter of years. The Cesar Franck symphony formed its first section, whilst the latter portion consisted of the Schumann overture, "Manfred"; Paul Dukas's "dance poem," "La Peri," and Debussy's second suite of "images" for orchestra, "Iberia."

Here was both contrast and progression in the development of French orchestral style from that of the Belgian, Franck, of the last quarter of the last century, to the latest Debussy and a revelation of Dukas' [illegible] was quite as intelligible as program music customarily is. It employs the Stravinsky idiom and the Ravel orchestral manner. It called up in one's mind as simile the ancient, criss-cross, collapsible hat-rack, for one continually imagined that, were it to be suddenly kicked back into a transposition of closed diatonics, it would emerge as utterly commonplace. But extended and flung wide along its modernistic tricks with the orchestral instruments, its indefinite tonalities and eerie harmonization, it served Mr. Monteux well with pegs from which to depend his virtuosity.

As a symphonic conductor he more than ever revealed his fondness for vigorous and massive contrasts. This was particularly the case in the Cesar Franck symphony, which he successfully converted from the mysteriously spiritual into the dramatically obvious. Not improbably, the monastic Belgian would have had some difficulty in recognizing his music, but the audience had none, and the dramatically obvious thus proved its advantages. In any case, Mr. Monteux made the symphony refreshingly interesting in his own fashion.

LEON SAMPAIN PLAYS

ENQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the first of its five visits to Philadelphia tomorrow evening, November 4, in the Academy of Music. As is generally known, Pierre Monteux conductor of French opera at the New York Metropolitan Opera House, took charge of the orchestra on the 1st of October to conduct the October concerts in Boston, and when it became evident that Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, could not arrive from Paris in time properly to prepare for the orchestra's first Southern trip, Giulio Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, released Mr. Monteux from his duties at the Metropolitan in order that he might conduct these concerts.

The programme of this first concert presents many points of interest. The soloist will be Florence Easton, the English soprano, who had such a brilliant success during the brief season of grand opera in the Academy of Music last spring. Mr. Monteux devotes his programme chiefly to French composers, but at the same time he is not overlooking the classics. The symphony will be that of Cesar Franck in D minor. The other orchestral numbers will be Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Paul Dukas's "La Peri" and Claude Debussy's "Iberia." Schumann's "Manfred" and Debussy's "Iberia" are familiar to the Philadelphia musical public, but the Dukas number will be a novelty. Its first performance in America was several years ago in San Francisco and its second was in Boston last week. It is called a "poeme danse," and was written by Dukas for performance by the Ballet Russe in Paris in 1911. It is in ultra-modern form. Madame Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the familiar "Dove Song" sung by the Countess in Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number will be the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
NOV 3 - 1918

And it is isn't only the churches that are opening up, glory be! It's the theaters and the movies, and a whole lot of the pleasant things of life. The President will be able to go to Keith's again. He must have missed it horribly, poor man! It's hard to be denied one's pet rest cure, in times of such grave responsibility and feverish correspondence. And there are two or three restfully frivolous shows on at the several theaters.

Moreover there's all sorts of good music promised. The week is simply crowded with goods things from the musical point of view—the first of the Boston Symphony concerts on Tuesday, the postponed "French" concert on Wednesday, and the Casals' recital, also postponed, on Friday. Three such musical treats in one week, is wealth indeed.

The French concert—the concert of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, to be given at Poli's on Friday afternoon, is not merely a musical event—it is also a great social event. It will mean about the first big turning out of the season of the cream of diplomatic, official and residential society. Mrs. Wilson, wife of the President, and Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, are boxholders, and the French High Commissioner, M. Andre Tardieu, who returned on Friday, will also entertain a party at the concert. The orchestra is under the direction of M. Andre Messager, and is composed only of Frenchmen. It is a national organization and their visit to this country, the first time they have played in foreign lands, is to stimulate an interest in French music by Frenchmen. The other boxholders for the Washington concert include the French Deputy High Commissioner M. Edouardo de Billy; M. Aubert and M. Simon, of the French High Commission, Mrs. Thomas F. Logan, Mrs. F. B. Moran, and Mr. Charles W. Wetmore. The orchestra is making a tour of sixty of the large cities in this country at the request of the French government, and with the co-operation of the government of the United States and the French High Commission. The tour is under the direction of the French-American Association of Musical Art.

The complete list of patronesses for the Washington concert includes Mrs. Wilson, Mrs. Marshall, Mrs. Lansing, Mme. Jusserand, Mrs. McAdoo, Mrs. Baker, Mrs. Willard Saulsbury, Miss Margaret Woodrow Wilson, Mrs. Frank Lyon Polk, Mme. Collardet, Mme. de Blanpre, Mme. Louis Aubert, Mrs. Perry Belmont, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. Henry F. Dimock, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. John Hays Hammond, Mme. Christian Hauge, Mrs. Henry Rea and the members of the French High Commission.

The Casals recital at the National on Friday was originally set for Friday of last week, but the authorities would not lift the ban. It is making no great appeal to mere "society," as such, but rather to music lovers and connoisseurs, by whom Casals is hailed as the greatest living 'cellist. Those who heard him last season in the benefit concert at Mrs. Gaff's, in which he shared honors with Mary Garden, will not soon forget him—a little man to handle such a big instrument, and a great artist! Fairly bristling with personality, under the control of a marvelous technique, all fire and all emotion, and all wonderful mastery of his instrument. That—and many things besides—is Casals. His program, printed in this column last Sunday, is in itself an invitation to all music lovers, and the invitation should not need to be repeated.

TELEGRAM
: New York City.

PIERRE MONTEUX, of the Metropolitan Opera House, conducted the first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening. The audience which filled the hall gave him a demonstration upon his entrance and generously applauded him after each number.

Two large American flags were draped at the back of the stage, and with a French conductor wielding the baton the Boston players were thoroughly emancipated from the mockery of the interned Dr. Karl Muck.

"The Star Spangled Banner" was played and the audience cheered; the director gave them the "Marseillaise," and more cheers; "God Save the King" followed, and there were shouts, and before all in the audience had resumed their seats the orchestra began the "Marche Royale," which was received with the same spontaneous outburst of enthusiasm.

It was a big night outside and an enjoyable one inside, for the programme had Franck's "Symphony in D Minor," Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," "La Peri: Poeme Danse," by Dukas, and "Iberia: Images," by Debussy.

On the whole the playing of the orchestra was excellent. The audience was perfectly satisfied and enjoyed every moment of the concert.

To-morrow afternoon the orchestra [illegible] will give another concert in Carnegie Hall [illegible] at a quarter-past [illegible]

EVENING TELEGRAM
Philadelphia, Pa.

MUSIC SUFFERS FROM THE WAR

Outlook for Season Here a Present Time Chaotic—Profession Hard Hit

BATTERED by the war, buffeted by the "flu," the Philadelphia musical season of 1918-19 made its belated appearance at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon, when the Philadelphia Orchestra gave the first important concert; in fact, it might almost be said to have been the first concert of the year.

The war has made itself felt in every walk of life and music has not escaped the lot of the other professions. Indeed, as the active cultivation of the art in the form of learning to play or sing might be considered somewhat of a luxury, there is little doubt that financially the musical profession has been harder hit than most others. At the same time, the value of hearing good music, with its tremendous, if silent, effect upon the public morale, is recognized by those who are directing the destiny of the nation. Therefore there is little doubt that music will be considered as an "essential," as it really is, in the last analysis.

* * *

THE outlook for the season at this time, outside of the regular orchestra concerts and operatic performances, is somewhat chaotic. Comparatively few concerts have been postponed, because condition caused by the war were so uncertain that few soloists cared to announce recitals until the season began with the concerts of the big orchestras and the musical atmosphere clarified. The most important of the postponed recitals was that of Jascha Heifetz, scheduled for last Wednesday at the Metropolitan, which concert was torn from its moorings by the gale of influenza and swept away to a date to be announced later.

The attitude of America towards music in wartime is still more or less of an unanswered question. There are many whose sons or husbands have made the supreme sacrifice for universal liberty, and into the souls of whom the iron has entered deep, but as a nation we have not had the real horrors of war brought home to us. Therefore, it remains to be seen whether we as a people will turn to music for solace in the same sense as have the burdened, weary people of France and England; whether the problems of the world strife will merely distract our attention from music, or whether the world's burden of grief will drive us to it for the solace it unqustionably gives. Upon the answer to this hangs the fate of the coming season.

* * *

THE concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra have begun and, together with the series by the Boston Symphony and three concerts of the New York Symphony Society, form the basis of the local season.

The orchestra has unquestionably been strengthened in personnel by the changes which Mr. Stokowski has made. Andre Maquarre, for many years first flutist of the Boston Orchestra, takes the same position in our orchestra, succeeding his brother, Daniel Maquarre, who left at the close of last season. Emile Ferir, solo viola of the Boston Orchestra, takes the same position here, succeeding Alfred Lorenz, who returns to the first violins, from which choir he was originally selected by Mr. Stokowski to become first viola. There are a number of other changes in the personnel which have tended to strengthen the organization.

In one way the influenza epidemic helped the orchestra, even if its effect upon the general musical season was not so good. It gave them three weeks of daily rehearsal, which in a season when a great many new or at least unfamiliar works will be performed, will prove to be a decided advantage. As there were no concerts during this time, the orchestra was able to give its undivided time and attention to the rehearsal of these compositions, and much was gained which will be apparent to the regular concertgoer later in the season.

* * *

MUCH interest, not to say curiosity, attends upon the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Philadelphia musicians are eager to see how the organization came through the famous "Muck" raking episode of last spring, an episode which not only deprived the orchestra of its leader, but also caused sweeping changes in the personnel. And not all of those who left were of the enemy countries, as witness the coming of Maquarre and Ferir, both of the French musical school, if not of actual French citizenship.

However, the chief interest centers in the new conductors. Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, will conduct the concert next Monday evening and the new permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud, will conduct the second concert in December.

Monteux's work as an operatic conductor is well known, but as a symphonic director he is an unknown quantity in Philadelphia. His work will be of especial interest because it is not given to every one to conduct opera and symphonic works with equal skill. Philadelphians will have an unusually good chance to judge because he will interpret the D-minor Symphony of Cesar Franck, which Mr. Stokowski has made familiar to Philadelphia audiences.

* * *

THE advent of Rabaud next month will also be of great interest. He has never been in this country, and so his conductorship is unknown here, but Mr. Stokowski has played a symphony of his, a work of much charm though not of great depth. As the writer remembers it, the work was not aggressively modern in harmony and was built along classical lines as to form, the scherzo, with a very original and brilliant harp part at the close, being the most attractive movement. An opera of his, "Marouf," was given in New York, but was not performed in this city. Like Monteux, Rabaud has proved his proficiency in a branch of the art other than conducting—but here again it is given to few musicians both to compose and conduct and do both well.

EVENING POST
ess: New York City

A Note on Music.

This is the greatest day in the history of the world, but it is not a day for musical criticism. President Wilson has truly said that "there is no better way to express patriotism than through music." Throughout the world—even in Germany, where there are millions who now want peace at any price—voices and instruments will unite in pæans of exultation over the end of the war. But who wants to read about any other kind of music on such a day?

For the record's sake a few lines may be penned about musical happenings on Saturday and Sunday. Included in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert was a novelty by Charles Martin Loeffler, an Alsatian by birth, who has lived in Boston since 1881. Though he studied in Berlin he never became an imitator of German models. Nor is his music American. It is purely Parisian, some of it being more Debussyan than Debussy's. His "La Bonne Chanson," which was heard in Carnegie Hall on Saturday, is along similar lines, though less imitative than some of his other works, such as "The Death of Tintagiles." To this, on the other hand, it is inferior in thematic invention, as well as in shimmering richness of orchestral coloring. It is beautifully orchestrated, but apart from that it seemed to have no special raison d'être.

HERALD
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S PLAYING SHOWS NEED OF LEADERSHIP TO RESTORE ITS SUPREMACY

Herald's Critic Reviews Second Concert and Looks for Gradual Assimilation of New Artists in Reorganized Orchestra Under M. Ribaud.

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

After more than a quarter of a century of personal opinion that the Boston Symphony was one of the best, if not the best, orchestras in the world one listened almost aghast in half convinced wonderment to the playing of the orchestra last Thursday night. Critical promptings to exclaim "Eheu Fugaces," "Ichabod, Ichabod" and other comminatory comments were too insistent to be allowed expression, because no constructive critic aims or wishes to overturn idols or subvert ideals. For the Boston orchestra has been an undisturbed orchestral ideal to the American public for years.

Neither would any likeminded critic desire to support Colonel Higginson's dictum that none but a German conductor can conduct a symphony, or in any way indorse the notion that without German musicians no orchestra could continue to exist in this country.

The wonderful unison voice of this orchestra, in effect a magnificent single instrument, was a definite characteristic which made it almost unique. The playing together in personal contact, as it were, of so many men and so many instruments for so many years produced a unity of intent, impulse and actual tonal values unattainable in any other way.

Granting this, it is evident that any considerable change in the personnel of the orchestra, due to war requirements, would inevitably disturb for the time being at any rate previously existent orchestral conditions. I cannot but feel that the previous spirit and purpose of this great orchestra is still dominant—for nearly forty years of great tradition must mean something—and that all that is needed now is a gradual assimilation of and adaptation to new conditions under such a conductor as I hope Mr. Henri Rabaud may prove to easily restore the Boston orchestra to the former high and acknowledged orchestral supremacy to which its great traditions and lofty purposes entitle it.

Heard in New Programme.

The orchestra for so many years has been so supreme that slight technical imperfections, which might be passed over with any other organization, in this instance cannot remain unnoticed. The playing of the orchestra in the second concert of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was not such as to lead me to revise my former impression of Thursday. The classical definiteness of Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 5, in D major, which opened the programme after the vague and elusive meandering of the modern French school of late, was positively refreshing in its old time formality. The strings played with accuracy and precision, if without any suave roundness or nobility of tone, but it struck me that the solo part, as rendered by Messrs. Fradkin—the new concert master—and Noak, sounded both thin and unimportant—Mr. Malkin's 'cello and Mr. Barrere's viola were much more impressive. The last movement allegro was by far the best played of the five movements of the work, as it possessed a life, finish, tone and vocal quality seemingly lacking in the other four.

The Loeffler number, "La Bonne Chanson," already familiar to us, with its "Tristan" references was played with distinction, good balance and contrast of sonority, and marked, perhaps, the best work done by the orchestra thus far. Mr. Monteux, too, for once content to let things take their own way, did not fume and insist too far.

D'Indy's "Istar" Played.

Vincent d'Indy, whose symphonic variations, "Istar," followed, has always represented to me the maximum of self-conscious empiricism, froth and harmonic extravagance of the modern French school at its worst, as well as the minimum of melodic invention or spontaniety. The straightforwardness of musical thought in conception and expression d'Indy is, however, at his best in this work, as in the interpretation of its strongly insistent dramatic suggestion, which approaches the operatic, was also Mr. Monteux, who conducted with picturesque appreciation and effect. The breadth and sonority of the strings was really imposing.

Mr. Monteau's interpretation of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which closed the programme, was somewhat perfunctorily and badly classical, a trifle blatant in the fortissimo and crudely unfinished in the softer passages; rather forcibly rythmic but decidedly lacking in plasticity and charm. The two first movements were decidedly perfunctory, the lovely allegretto almost wholly without sentiment. The scherzo, read conventionally, was nevertheless played with spirit and rhythm, and the last movement was brilliant in a sort of rough and ready fashion. All honor to Mr. Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, who played this symphony at its last previous hearing. I look for important and welcome changes in the playing of Boston Orchestra before its next concert after Mr. Rabaud takes hold.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
1918

MONTEUX LEADS REORGANIZED BOSTON BAND

Metropolitan Opera Conductor at Orchestra's First New York Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, completely expurgated but un-Bowdlerized, played its first New York concert of the season last evening in Carnegie Hall. The conductor, as every one had been apprised, was Pierre Monteux, loaned for the band's preliminary rehearsals and concerts by the Metropolitan Opera, where he is the director of the French repertoire. The permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud, from the Paris Opera, will have charge of the Boston Orchestra at the other eight concerts here, following that of to-morrow afternoon.

It was a singular and an opportune coincidence that the Boston Orchestra should have had its first appearance here fall on the evening that marked the celebration of the end of the war—for any doubt of this that there may have been in the mind of the audience that filled the hall quite as aforetime, was submerged in the realization of Germany's military collapse. A singular and happy coincidence, the thought of which took immediate shape in a roar of applause as Mr. Monteux led his men in "The Star Spangled Banner." The cloud of awkwardness and constraint and the seething of bile that attended performances of the national anthem last Spring became only a memory in contrast. Shouts for "The Marseillaise" and "God Save the King," following "The Star Spangled Banner," were answered by the orchestra's playing of the French and British national airs and Mr. Monteux then added the "Garibaldi Hymn" of Italy. And thereupon the now genuinely American band proceeded to set forth its quality in the announced program of the evening.

The orchestra has experienced a very radical transformation, and one that affects what one may call the internals rather than the externals of its tradition. The kernel of this tradition was its absorbedly German outlook upon the universe of music. Its deteutonization has changed all that. The externals of the band's tradition—the consummate smoothness and beauty of its playing—remain considerably, if not quite, the same.

What must have struck even the most casual among last night's audience—not observably different in quality from the usual Boston Symphony gathering—was the change in character from Dr. Karl Muck's polygonal programs. That of last evening was the most attractive, both as to content and inter-relationship, that a Boston Orchestra evening has been concerned with for a matter of years. The Cesar Franck symphony formed its first section, whilst the latter portion consisted of the Schumann overture, "Manfred"; Paul Dukas's "dance poem," "La Peri," and Debussy's second suite of "images" for orchestra, "Iberia."

Here was both contrast and progression in the development of French orchestral style from that of the Belgian, Franck, of the last quarter of the last century, to the latest Debussy and a revelation of Dukas' [illegible] was quite as intelligible as program music customarily is. It employs the Stravinsky idiom and the Ravel orchestral manner. It called up in one's mind as simile the ancient, criss-cross, collapsible hat-rack, for one continually imagined that, were it to be suddenly kicked back into a transposition of closed diatonics, it would emerge as utterly commonplace. But extended and flung wide along its modernistic tricks with the orchestral instruments, its indefinite tonalities and eerie harmonization, it served Mr. Monteux well with pegs from which to depend his virtuosity.

As a symphonic conductor he more than ever revealed his fondness for vigorous and massive contrasts. This was particularly the case in the Cesar Franck symphony, which he successfully converted from the mysteriously spiritual into the dramatically obvious. Not improbably, the monastic Belgian would have had some difficulty in recognizing his music, but the audience had none, and the dramatically obvious thus proved its advantages. In any case, Mr. Monteux made the symphony refreshingly interesting in his own fashion.

LEON SAMPAIX PLAYS

ENQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the first of its five visits to Philadelphia tomorrow evening, November 4, in the Academy of Music. As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, conductor of French opera at the New York Metropolitan Opera House, took charge of the orchestra on the 1st of October to conduct the October concerts in Boston, and when it became evident that Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, could not arrive from Paris in time properly to prepare for the orchestra's first Southern trip, Giulio Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, released Mr. Monteux from his duties at the Metropolitan in order that he might conduct these concerts.

The programme of this first concert presents many points of interest. The soloist will be Florence Easton, the English soprano, who had such a brilliant success during the brief season of grand opera in the Academy of Music last spring. Mr. Monteux devotes his programme chiefly to French composers, but at the same time he is not overlooking the classics. The symphony will be that of Cesar Franck in D minor. The other orchestral numbers will be Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Paul Dukas's "La Peri" and Claude Debussy's "Iberia." Schumann's "Manfred" and Debussy's "Iberia" are familiar to the Philadelphia musical public, but the Dukas number will be a novelty. Its first performance in America was several years ago in San Francisco and its second was in Boston last week. It is called a "poeme danse," and was written by Dukas for performance by the Ballet Russe in Paris in 1911. It is in ultra-modern form. Madame Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the familiar "Dove Song" sung by the Countess in Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number will be the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

m HERALD
dress Washington, D. C.
te 3-9-19

And it is isn't only the churches that are opening up, glory be! It's the theaters and the movies, and a whole lot of the pleasant things of life. The President will be able to go to Keith's again. He must have missed it horribly, poor man! It's hard to be denied one's pet rest cure, in times of such grave responsibility and feverish correspondence. And there are two or three restfully frivolous shows on at the several theaters.

Moreover there's all sorts of good music promised. The week is simply crowded with goods things from the musical point of view—the first of the Boston Symphony concerts on Tuesday, the postponed "French" concert on Wednesday, and the Casals' recital, also postponed, on Friday. Three such musical treats in one week, is wealth indeed.

The French concert—the concert of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, to be given at Poli's on Friday afternoon, is not merely a musical event—it is also a great social event. It will mean about the first big turning out of the season of the cream of diplomatic, official and residential society. Mrs. Wilson, wife of the President, and Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, are boxholders, and the French High Commissioner, M. Andre Tardieu, who returned on Friday, will also entertain a party at the concert. The orchestra is under the direction of M. Andre Messager, and is composed only of Frenchmen. It is a national organization and their visit to this country, the first time they have played in foreign lands, is to stimulate an interest in French music by Frenchmen. The other boxholders for the Washington concert include the French Deputy High Commissioner M. Edouardo de Billy; M. Aubert and M. Simon, of the French High Commission, Mrs. Thomas F. Logan, Mrs. F. B. Moran, and Mr. Charles W. Wetmore. The orchestra is making a tour of sixty of the large cities in this country at the request of the French government, and with the co-operation of the government of the United States and the French High Commission. The tour is under the direction of the French-American Association of Musical Art.

The complete list of patronesses for the Washington concert includes Mrs. Wilson, Mrs. Marshall, Mrs. Lansing, Mme. Jusserand, Mrs. McAdoo, Mrs. Baker, Mrs. Willard Saulsbury, Miss Margaret Woodrow Wilson, Mrs. Frank Lyon Polk, Mme. Collardet, Mme. de Blanpre, Mme. Louis Aubert, Mrs. Perry Belmont, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. Henry F. Dimock, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. John Hays Hammond, Mme. Christian Hauge, Mrs. Henry Rea and the members of the French High Commission.

The Casals recital at the National on Friday was originally set for Friday of last week, but the authorities would not lift the ban. It is making no great appeal to mere "society," as such, but rather to music lovers and connoisseurs, by whom Casals is hailed as the greatest living 'cellist. Those who heard him last season in the benefit concert at Mrs. Gaff's, in which he shared honors with Mary Garden, will not soon forget him—a little man to handle such a big instrument, and a great artist! Fairly bristling with personality, under the control of a marvelous technique, all fire and all emotion, and all wonderful mastery of his instrument. That—and many things besides—is Casals. His program, printed in this column last Sunday, is in itself an invitation to all music lovers, and the invitation should not need to be repeated.

TELEGRAM
: New York City.

PIERRE MONTEUX, of the Metropolitan Opera House, conducted the first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening. The audience which filled the hall gave him a demonstration upon his entrance and generously applauded him after each number.

Two large American flags were draped at the back of the stage, and with a French conductor wielding the baton the Boston players were thoroughly emancipated from the mockery of the interned Dr. Karl Muck.

"The Star Spangled Banner" was played and the audience cheered; the director gave them the "Marseillaise," and more cheers; "God Save the King" followed, and there were shouts, and before all in the audience had resumed their seats the orchestra began the "Marche Royale," which was received with the same spontaneous outburst of enthusiasm.

It was a big night outside and an enjoyable one inside, for the programme had Franck's "Symphony in D Minor," Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," "La Peri: Poeme Dansé," by Dukas, and "Iberia: Images," by Debussy.

On the whole the playing of the orchestra was excellent. The audience was perfectly satisfied and enjoyed every moment of the concert.

To-morrow afternoon the orchestra [illegible] will give another concert in Carnegie Hall, two evening at a quarter [illegible]

D.C.
3 - 1918

urches that t's the the-
a whole lot f life. The o to Keith's
ssed it hor-

d to be dein times of and fever-there are rolous shows
s. rts of good k is simply s from the first of the s on Tues-
ch" concert
Casals' re-iday. Three e week, is concert of u Conserva-

s on Friday
a musical social event.
rst big turn-he cream of sidential so-of the Pres-nd, wife of are boxhold-gh Commis-eu, who relso entertain
The orchestra
of M. Andre osed only of tional organ-this country, played in forte an interest enchmen. The e Washington rench Deputy Edouardo de
M. Simon, of mission, Mrs.
F. B. Moran,
Wetmore. The tour of sixty his country at ch government, ion of the gov-States and the sion. The tour of the French-
of Musical Art.
patronesses for
rt includes Mrs.
l, Mrs. Lansing,
. McAdoo, Mrs.
Saulsbury, Miss
Wilson, Mrs.
Mme. Collardet,
me. Louis Aubert,
t, Mrs. Calderon
F. Dimock, Mrs.
s, Mrs. Gibson
ugene Hale, Mrs. ond, Mme. Chris-enry Rea and the rench High Com-

l at the National
inally set for Fri-
but the authorities
ban. It is making mere "society," as o music lovers and hom Casals is hailed ving 'cellist. Those t season in the ben-
rs. Gaff's, in which
with Mary Garden, et him—a little man
big instrument, and Fairly bristling with r the control of a que, all fire and all wonderful mastery
nt. That—and many
is Casals. His pro-
in this column last itself an invitation to rs, and the invitation to be repeated.

AM
York City.
NOV 8 1918

IERRE MONTEUX, of the Metropolitan Opera House, conducted the first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening.
which filled the hall gave stration upon his entrance
y applauded him after each

American flags were draped of the stage, and with a ctor wielding the baton the rs were thoroughly eman-the mockery of the interned uck.
r Spangled Banner" was the audience cheered; the e them the "Marseillaise," heers; "God Save the King" d there were shouts, and be-he audience had resumed their orchestra began the "Marche which was received with the taneous outburst of enthusia big night outside and an one inside, for the prod Franck's "Symphony in D chumann's overture to Byron's

" "La Peri: Poeme Danse," by "Iberia: Images," by Debussy the playing of the or cellent. The audienc enjoyed ever

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
V 5 1918

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

First Concert, Under Pierre Monteux Brings Forward Florence Easton as the Soloist

Program

Franck.....D Minor Symphony
Schumann.....“Manfred” Overture
Mozart,
Recitative and Aria from Mozart’s “Figaro”
Dukas.....“Le Peri”
Debussy.....Recitative and Aria of Lia from “L’Infant Prodigue”
Debussy.....“Iberia”

The reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a very fine initial concert of a series of five at the Academy last night. The audience was somewhat smaller than usual. There were seats vacant in the parquet and the boxes. The disposition of those present was manifestly cordial toward conductor, players, soloist and all the music played, and it was apparent at once that the present and the future of a great American orchestra rest in safe and wholly competent hands.

Pierre Monteux, spared for the purpose by the Metropolitan Opera management, led in a way that showed he is no mere locum tenens until Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, appears. Merely as a feat of memory, his achievement of last night was extraordinary. His railed-off dais did not hold a stand, and even for the accompaniments of the soloists he had no score. The chop-and-change of Debussy's complex and varying rhythms in "Iberia" were the same open book to his photographic mind that Mozart's recitative and aria in their simpler form presented. He earned the appreciation of loyal Americans at the start by a version of the national air that was innocent of tricks, of ornament and orchestration. He showed himself a leader of grace coupled with force, of suavity in union with authority, of equipoise and temperance not wanting in temperament. He forbore to pose as a god in the musical machine and he put the music ahead of himself, where it should be.

The new concertmeister, Frederic Fradkin, plays with easy-going yet scrupulously accurate refinement, producing a full, round tone without agony. It was pleasant to recognize the veteran Alwin Schroeder once more with the cellos. At the celesta sat Carl Lamson, who was formerly Mr. Kreisler's accompanist.

The orchestra stood after the Franck symphony, at the bidding of an audience moved to admiration. Mr. Monteux had put his harpists (young Theodore Cella, of Philadelphia, one of the pair) at the rear of the cellos, and the effect in the allegretto movement was to make them members of the family. The English horn (whose inclusion ellcited the protest of the conventional symphonists when the work was first played) descanted luscious sounds. In the Schumann overture the beautifully pure and fluent tone of the strings issued to especial advantage.

Madam Easton has already won her loyal public here by her admirable work as an opera singer, and her rare gifts were all in evidence last evening. A certain radiant, buoyant freshness of presence in red-flowered white satin gave itself with aptness to the lovely lyricism of Mozart—and nobody cared to remember to the mellifluous Italian text that the music was German. The words of Lia from Debussy (aged twenty-two, and in his early, unsophisticated method) were likewise declaimed with purity of voice and a sympathetic sincerity of manner. Madam Easton is a singer who rests her appeal on the straightforward technics and not the artificial strategics of her metier. She knows how to sing, and so she does not have to display meretricious bravura.

The "dance poem" of Dukas, "Le Peri," and the atmospheric, exotic tissue of vague weird sounds denominated "Iberia" by Debussy rounded out the program. Both works are of the sort the orchestralist loves, for they individualize the instruments and give every player his own puzzle-problem in fingering or breathing. An audience that a third of a century ago (when this orchestra first came here) would have had no patience with such music heard it and liked it very much last night. "Iberia" was first performed nearly nine years ago. It seems almost old-fashioned in this futurist era.

F. L. W.

n TIMES
dress: Washington, D. C.
NOV 3 - 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its series of concerts in Washington next Tuesday afternoon, November 5, in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock.

This will be the first of the five subscription concerts.

Owing to the delayed arrival in America of Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the orchestra, as already announced, this first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, principal conductor of French opera of the Metropolitan Opera Company, new York, who was courteously lent to the Boston Symphony by Mr. Gatti-Casazza for this Southern trip.

The orchestra brings to Washington as soloist Florence Easton, a singer of unusual quality of voice and unusual musical talent, who is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The program which Mr. Monteux has made opens with one of the concerto grossos of Handel, for strings alone. The other orchestra numbers will be a symphonic poem entitled "La Bonne Chanson," by Charles Martin Loeffler, Claude Debussy's Spanish suite, "Iberia," and the noble symphony of Franck in D minor.

Madame Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the Countess' aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"—"Dove Sono," and her second will be the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's little opera "L'Enfant Prodigue."

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 5 - 1918

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Reorganized Musical Body Gives Season's First Concert.

In the thirty-eighth year of its existence, the Boston Orchestra, under a different form of management, a French conductor, with an American concertmaster and with a widely changed personnel, has taken a new lease of life. With the enforced retirement of Conductor Karl Muck, and the subsequent withdrawal of Major Higginson, who had financed the orchestra and was its virtual ruler, there was threatened a collapse of the famous combination of musicians. Happily, however, that disaster was averted, and with the creation of a board of trustees, the engagement of the French composer and conductor Henri Rabaud, and the opportunity of securing some members of the French Military Band touring in this country, together with the many fine American musicians available, the Boston Orchestra is able to continue with every evidence of being as popular as in seasons past.

At the Academy of Music last night in the initial concert of a series of five Philadelphians were not given an opportunity of judging the work of Henri Rabaud, who arrived in this country too late to undertake the first tour with his new charge. Rabaud, however, is one of the leading men in France, a distinguished composer as well as a conductor of experience and versatility, and there can be no question of his musicianship and ability. For the first concert Rabaud was replaced by Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, a conductor well known to Philadelphia, where he has directed the Russian Ballet and also various operas, principally French, of the Metropolitan repertoire. Monteux arranged an exceptionally interesting program, beginning with the Franck D minor symphony and including the Schumann Overture to Byron's "Manfred;" "Le Peri, Poeme Danse," by Paul Dukas and the entrancing "Iberia Images," of Debussy. The soloist was Florence Easton, who was especially happy in her interpretation of the Lia aria from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," although she was also interesting in the Mozart Recitative and aria from "The Marriage of Figaro." The Mozart music, however, was not as well within Miss Easton's grasp vocally as the Debussy.

Her lyric voice does not lend itself with sufficient limpidity to the Mozart demands. She was much more effective in the Debussy, where the unevenness of quality so noticeable in her range was less observed. She made an effective orchestral singer and was warmly applauded.

Monteux was much more interesting and successful in the color and variety of Dukas and Debussy than with Francko. His instinct for contrast and vividness had full sweep in the "Iberia Images," which closed the program and brought him well-earned applause. The symphony was done in traditional style, and served to show that the Boston Orchestra tone has not suffered by the musical upheaval. The string choir is still sonorous and flexible, while the ensemble, generally speaking, was smooth and reliable. It is interesting to note the presence of Schroeder, one of the finest 'cellists. The new concertmaster exhibited a good tone and fine rhythm, and will probably show his metal as the season progresses.

n TIMES
dress: Washington, D. C.

There was no necessity for postponing the first of the Boston symphony concerts, which will be given on Tuesday, as the ban on amusements was lifted in time for arrangements to go through as per schedule. After all, the new conductor, Henri Rabaud did reach this country in time for the opening of the season, and I understand he is to conduct.

n EVENING MAIL
ress: New York City
NO 1 1918

JUST why did Mr. Pierre Monteux need the iron railing which surrounded the conductor's stand at the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra? Perhaps it was to confine what Beethoven would have called his "unbuttoned joy" in the finale of that composer's Seventh symphony. Certainly Mr. Monteux unloosed an exuberance in conducting this venerated work which might have forced him off the little platform if the railing had not put forth a kindly resistance.

Altogether, the Saturday afternoon performance by the made-over Boston Orchestra was much more satisfying than the Thursday evening programme had permitted. Handel's concerto for string orchestra gave Messrs. Fradkin, Noack, Barrier and Malkin a chance as soloists for brief intervals, and in Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" there were moments of exquisite beauty. This musical paraphrase of Paul Verlaine's lovely poem also gave the strings, so long praised as the note of one intensified violin, an opportunity to sound, for those moments, the strings of the old orchestra. Mr. Monteux admirably caught the spirit of the "Poeme" and of D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar." This composition, suggested by the Babylonian poem, leads Istar, daughter of Sin, to the seven gates, where each warder removes a jewel or two, until at the seventh gate a warder takes the last veil that covers her body. And D'Indy clothes Istar with his variations and strips them off so amiably that even a devoutly attentive Boston Orchestra audience, listening to programme music not too spi[illegible] variety, seemed [illegible] satis[illegible]

from PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 5 1918

46

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS ITS FIRST CONCERT HERE

Pierre Monteux Conducts—Florence Easton Soloist—Orchestral Novelty Is Dukas' "Le Peri."

BY BENJAMIN F. GLAZER.

The first of the five Boston Symphony concerts was heard at the Academy last evening without the new conductor, M. Rabaud, who arrived from France a few days ago. In his stead M. Pierre Monteux wielded the baton. Local audiences have grateful memories of him as conductor of French opera for the Metropolitan Opera Company.

His debut as a symphony conductor was less impressive, yet highly creditable. He read the Cesar Franck D minor symphony in a scholarly fashion and without affectation, yet it would be folly to blink at the fact that the rendition was not up to the Boston Symphony standard. It is reported that about a quarter of the orchestra's personnel is new and that the whole has had inadequate time for rehearsal owing to the delay in choosing a conductor. And, indeed, a lot of the old tonal perfection was missing—grievously so in the brasses—wherefore the fault may not be with M. Monteux at all.

The rest of his program, which was rather light in quality and markedly theatrical in its essence, revealed him at his best. His accompaniments to Florence Easton's singing were a marvel of precision and discretion, revealing his sound operatic experience, just as his interpretation of the Dukas "Le Peri" was finely evocative of the fancy, the spectacle, the drama of the ballet. Also, be it noted, he read the "Iberia" images of Debussy with consummate delicacy.

Miss Easton sang the third act recitative and aria from "The Marriage of Figaro" somewhat heavily. Her voice seemed tired, her tone production labored; and in her phrasing was lacking the vivacity one expects of those inimitable Mozartian melodies. But her recitative and aria from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," was splendily done. On the whole, Miss Easton showed remarkable improvement since her operatic appearance here.

The Dukas poeme danse was heard for the first time in Philadelphia. Its juxtaposition to the Debussy suite made an interesting comparison. Was it Debussy himself who proclaimed his artistic creed thus: "Pianissimo—delicately—win the emotion by suggestion. Reach the mind through the imagination! Take fleeting impressions—not the obvious?" And wasn't it Van Vechten whose epigram described Dukas as "a giant cutting capers?"

And yet, hearing them both together in this fashion, it is the "giant cutting capers" whose appeal is finer. "Le Peri" is music of the obviously descriptive sort, adapted to the theatre and neither very gigantic nor capricious; yet there is a virility in its orchestration, a solidity in its architecture and a profundity in its conception that make Debussy seem pallid and trivially sensuous by comparison.

M. Rabaud himself will conduct the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given on the evening of December 2.

NORTH AMERICAN
s Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN TREAT AT ACADEMY

M. Monteux Conducts Masterfully Thru a Difficult and Brilliant Program

The press agent's favorite phrase, "everything new but the name," might have been applied with almost literal truthfulness to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which last night came to the Academy of Music for its first concert of the season here. Any fears that might have been entertained about the effects of a new conductor and sweeping reorganization of personnel were changed, however, to pleasure and satisfaction as the extremely meaty and varied program progressed under the bland and gracious leadership of Pierre Monteux.

M. Monteux has been known here hitherto only as a conductor of the Metropolitan Opera. Last night's test as an orchestral conductor was particularly severe, because of the range of compositions played and the fact that his work with this organization is only temporary. But his sound musicianship was ever in evidence, and the work of his men was not only satisfactory, but frequently brilliant. M. Monteux conducted without score.

The reconstructed orchestra has gained in elasticity of phrase and delicacy of shading. The brasses in particular have improved, and the trumpets were particularly rich. The initial number was the lovely Cesar Franck Symphony in D minor, and it was not until the allegretto that it became evident that the string choirs retain their mellifluous beauty undimmed. Their brilliance in the Dukas "Peri" was amazing.

"Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan forces, was the soloist, her first number being the recitative and aria "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," which has come to be regarded as the test piece for a dramatic soprano. She has not the technique for Mozart, but her later singing of Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue" was thrilling in its loveliness and freshness.

Two ultra-modern numbers on the program were Dukas' "Le Peri," a dance poem, and Debussy's "Iberia," a suite of "images" in three sections. The "Peri" is not of the school of cacophony, but is an enchanting, ear-ravishing piece, fairly glowing with oriental color, employing full modern resources of orchestra for enriched harmonies, rather than for meretricious tone-painting.

The Debussy number is a masterpiece of polyphony; its orchestral color is of the brightest, and there is a lively sense of humor of crowds in the frank rhythms of the first movement, against which is contrasted the evanescent mistiness of the second movement.

The symphony was played with true feeling for its heroic and spiritual qualities.

Schumann's familiar "Manfred" overture was the second number on the splendid program.

m EVENING JOURNAL
dress New York City
e

TWO ORCHESTRA CONCERTS OVER THE WEEK-END

Boston and New York Bands Heard—Raoul Vidas, French Violinist, in Debut.

Orchestral furor—music Handelian-Italian, Novoanglo-Alsatian, Irano-Gallic, Teutono-Asiatic and just plain French—battered itself against the encasement of Carnegie Hall on Saturday, afternoon and evening. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Walter Damrosch, of the New York Symphony Band, loosed this single day's Niagara of sound, and one still retains the sensation of inundation.

Mr. Monteux began matters innocently enough with Handel's concerto grosso in D, largely, no doubt, to exploit to New York the abilities of Messrs. Fradkin, Barrier and Malkin, respectively the principal violin, viola and violincello of the band. It was not overweeningly persuasive Handel. del.

Subsequently Mr. Monteux occupied himself with the New England Alsatian, Charles Martin Loeffler's labored and belabored elaboration, "La Bonne Chanson." Mr. Loeffer has cast and recast, polished and repolished this hand-made music. Inspiration is foreign to its substance and even Mr. Monteux's buffetings of its effingyan integument could not lend its dead weight the camouflage of mental or manual souffle.

But Mr. Monteux's chief effort of the afternoon was the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven which, under that peculiar contagion that appears to [illegible] with as much deadly certainty as the influenza germ, from one orchestral conductor to another, has now been played three times in a young season. None of these performances has been within nodding acquaintance of perhaps the post "unbuttoned" and yet profoundly introspective utterance of the colossus of Bonn. Mr. Monteux, like Mr. Damrosch, is obsessed by the Wagnerian dictum, the Frenchman also trying to preoccupy Beethoven with a finicking dance hypothesis.

A second hearing of the Boston Orchestra, reconstituted, confirmed one's previous impression as to its playing. There is a good deal of work ahead of it to make it sound up to its previous standards, both as to the matter of string and brass tone and as to precision in attack and release, unanimity and the general balance and beauty of the full orchestral diapason.

EVENING POST
ss: New York City
OV 8 1918

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If the Boston Symphony Orchestra were as bad as a perambulating street band it would have sounded well last night to ears outraged by the horrible din in the streets, and seeking refuge in Carnegie Hall. Now that the populace has let off steam, what will happen when peace is truly announced? Will it be as with Peary, whose discovery of the North Pole created not a ripple because Dr. Cook had taken the wind out of his sails?

However that may be, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its first New York concert of the season, got the benefit of the prevailing patriotic excitement. After it had played the "Star-Spangled Banner," there were many calls for the "Marseillaise," and then for the English and Italian national hymns, all of which were played with splendid fervor and tonal beauty.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not what it was last year. Some weeks ago the present writer, misled by newspaper reports, asserted that it had been "unionized and Americanized." The article was copied by a Boston paper and brought a correction by President Kingman, of the Local 9, A. F. of M., who stated that "an effort was made to unionize the orchestra, but negotiations were broken off, owing to the fact that the cardinal principle of the American Federation of Musicians stands for American musicians first, to which the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took exception." A prominent Boston critic wrote a very insulting letter about the present writer's mistake, declaring emphatically that the orchestra had not been Americanized (except as to its concertmaster), but Gallicized, most of the Germans ousted having been replaced by Frenchmen. Well and good; but is it such an awful crime to accuse an organization in this country of being Americanized?

The orchestra could hardly have been expected to play as well last night as it used to play, for it takes time to secure so fine an ensemble as that which made this organization famous. The temporary conductor, M. Monteux, moreover, did not succeed so well as he has done at the Metropolitan Opera House in making the music interpreted by him of vital interest. The romantic bloom of Schumann's "Manfred" overture was sadly missed, and the second and third movements of the César Franck symphony were deadly dull, while the first—which owes its inspiration chiefly to Grieg and "Parsifal"—was rather disjointed. He was at his best in the number which preceded the final "Iberia" of Debussy: "La Péri: Poème Dansé," by Paul Dukas. This was read and played with the true neo-Gallic nuances and atmosphere—an atmosphere of glittering cascades of sound and sunset colors without much form or sequence. With the stage pictures and the dancing it would have doubtless been quite effective; without them it seemed too long.

m BULLETIN
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.

MUSICALLY, the calendar for next week, and subsequently in the near future, foretells some events of much interest. The musical season may be said really to have started with the delayed first pair of concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon and this evening. On the program to be presented next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening a popular soloist will be Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is to be heard in two numbers. For the orchestral portion of the program, Mr. Stokowski has selected the Capriccio Espagnol of Rimsky-Korsakow, in place of the usual symphony; the overture to the opera "Gwendoline," by Chabrier, and "Two Indian Dances" by an American composer, Charles Sanford Skilton.

The Boston Symphony will make its first appearance of the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, being conducted on this occasion by Pierre Monteux, conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, while the soloist will be Florence Easton, soprano, of the Metropolitan Company, one of the most popular singers to appear in Philadelphia in recent years. The instrumental numbers are to be the Franck Symphony, in D Minor, the overture to Schumann's "Manfred," Dukas' "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." Miss Easton will sing numbers of Schumann and Debussy. The subsequent four concerts of the Boston Orchestra series will be under the direction of Henri Rabaud, who has been engaged as permanent conductor.

Of momentous interest next Tuesday evening will be the appearance at the Metropolitan of the famous Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, which has started its first tour of this country. The orchestra, which is conducted by M. Messager, is composed largely of professors at the Conservatoire, who elect their own conductor. The soloist of the occasion, Alfred Cortet, ranked as one of the greatest pianists in France, also is a [illegible] at the famous music school.

[illegible] gram includes the Prelude to [illegible] "L'Apres midi d'un Faun," the "Fa[illegible]" overture of Bizet, the Morceau Symphonique extrait de "Redemption" of Franck, "La Carnaval Romain" overture of Berlioz, and the C minor symphony of Beethoven. Mons. Cortet will [illegible]

D. C.
3 - 1918

urches that t's the the-
a whole lot
f life. The o to Keith's
ssed it hor-

rd to be dein times of and fever-there are volous shows
s. rts of good k is simply s from the first of the s on Tues-
ch" concert
Casals' reriday. Three he week, is the concert of du Conserva-

s on Friday
a musical social event.
first big turn-the cream of residential so-of the Pres-and, wife of
are boxhold-
High Commisieu, who re-also entertain
The orchestra
of M. Andre posed only of national organ-to this country,
played in for-ate an interest renchmen. The he Washington
French Deputy Edouardo de
M. Simon, of ommission, Mrs.
F. B. Moran,
Wetmore. The
tour of sixty this country at nch government,
tion of the gov-
States and the sion. The tour
of the French-
of Musical Art. patronesses for
rt includes Mrs.
l, Mrs. Lansing,
. McAdoo, Mrs.
Saulsbury, Miss
Wilson, Mrs.
Mme. Collardet,
me. Louis Aubert,
t, Mrs. Calderon
F. Dimock, Mrs.
s, Mrs. Gibson
Eugene Hale, Mrs.
ond, Mme. Chris-
Henry Rea and the rench High Com-

l at the National
inally set for Fri-
but the authorities
ban. It is making mere "society," as o music lovers and hom Casals is hailed ving 'cellist. Those t season in the ben-
rs. Gaff's, in which
with Mary Garden,
et him—a little man
big instrument, and Fairly bristling with r the control of a que, all fire and all
l wonderful mastery
nt. That—and many
is Casals. His pro-
in this column last itself an invitation to rs, and the invitation to be repeated.

AM

York City.

NOV 5 1918

IERRE MONTEUX, of the Metropolitan Opera House, conducted the first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening. which filled the hall gave nstration upon his entrance y applauded him after each American flags were draped of the stage, and with a ctor wielding the baton the rs were thoroughly eman- the mockery of the interned uck.

r Spangled Banner" was the audience cheered; the e them the "Marseillaise," heers; "God Save the King" d there were shouts, and be- he audience had resumed their orchestra began the "Marche which was received with the taneous outburst of enthusia big night outside and an one inside, for the pro- ad Franck's "Symphony in D chumann's overture to Byron's " "La Peri: Poeme Dansé," by d "Iberia: Images," by Debussy the playing of the or cellent. The audienc enjoyed even

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

First Concert, Under Pierre Monteux, Brings Forward Florence Easton as the Soloist

Program

Franck.....D Minor Symphony
Schumann.....'Manfred' Overture
Mozart,
Recitative and Aria from Mozart's "Figaro"
Dukas.....'Le Peri'
Debussy....Recitative and Aria of Lia from "L'Infant Prodigue"
Debussy.....'Iberia'

The reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a very fine initial concert of a series of five at the Academy last night. The audience was somewhat smaller than usual. There were seats vacant in the parquet and the boxes. The disposition of those present was manifestly cordial toward conductor, players, soloist and all the music played, and it was apparent at once that the present and the future of a great American orchestra rest in safe and wholly competent hands.

Pierre Monteux, spared for the purpose by the Metropolitan Opera management, led in a way that showed he is no mere locum tenens until Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, appears. Merely as a feat of memory, his achievement of last night was extraordinary. His railed-off dais did not hold a stand, and even for the accompaniments of the soloists he had no score. The chop-and-change of Debussy's complex and varying rhythms in "Iberia" were the same open book to his photographic mind that Mozart's recitative and aria in their simpler form presented. He earned the appreciation of loyal Americans at the start by a version of the national air that was innocent of tricks, of ornament and orchestration. He showed himself a leader of grace coupled with force, of suavity in union with authority, of equipoise and temperance not wanting in temperament. He forbore to pose as a god in the musical machine and he put the music ahead of himself, where it should be.

The new concertmeister, Frederic Fradkin, plays with easy-going yet scrupulously accurate refinement, producing a full, round tone without agony. It was pleasant to recognize the veteran Alwin Schroeder once more with the cellos. At the celesta sat Carl Lamson, who was formerly Mr. Kreisler's accompanist.

The orchestra stood after the Franck symphony, at the bidding of an audience moved to admiration. Mr. Monteux had put his harpists (young Theodore Cella, of Philadelphia, one of the pair) at the rear of the cellos, and the effect in the allegretto movement was to make them members of the family. The English horn (whose inclusion ellcited the protest of the conventional symphonists when the work was first played) descanted luscious sounds. In the Schumann overture the beautifully pure and fluent tone of the strings issued to especial advantage.

Madam Easton has already won her loyal public here by her admirable work as an opera singer, and her rare gifts were all in evidence last evening. A certain radiant, buoyant freshness of presence in red-flowered white satin gave itself with aptness to the lovely lyricism of Mozart—and nobody cared to remember to the mellifluous Italian text that the music was German. The words of Lia from Debussy (aged twenty-two, and in his early, unsophisticated method) were likewise declaimed with purity of voice and a sympathetic sincerity of manner. Madam Easton is a singer who rests her appeal on the straightforward technics and not the artificial strategies of her metier. She knows how to sing, and so she does not have to display meretricious bravura.

The "dance poem" of Dukas, "Le Peri," and the atmospheric, exotic tissue of vague weird sounds denominated "Iberia" by Debussy rounded out the program. Both works are of the sort the orchestralist loves, for they individualize the instruments and give every player his own puzzle-problem in fingering or breathing. An audience that a third of a century ago (when this orchestra first came here) would have had no patience with such music heard it and liked it very much last night. "Iberia" was first performed nearly nine years ago. It seems almost old-fashioned in this futurist era.

F. L. W.

n TIMES
dress: Washington, D. C.

e.....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its series of concerts in Washington next Tuesday afternoon, November 5, in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock.

This will be the first of the five subscription concerts.

Owing to the delayed arrival in America of Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the orchestra, as already announced, this first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, principal conductor of French opera of the Metropolitan Opera Company, new York, who was courteously lent to the Boston Symphony by Mr. Gatti-Casazza for this Southern trip.

The orchestra brings to Washington as soloist Florence Easton, a singer of unusual quality of voice and unusual musical talent, who is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The program which Mr. Monteux has made opens with one of the concerto grossos of Handel, for strings alone. The other orchestra numbers will be a symphonic poem entitled "La Bonne Chanson," by Charles Martin Loeffler, Claude Debussy's Spanish suite, "Iberia," and the noble symphony of César Franck in D minor.

Madame Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the Countess' aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"—"Dove Sono," and her second will be the recitative and air of from Debussy's little opera "L'Enfant Prodigue."

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 5 - 1918

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Reorganized Musical Body Gives Season's First Concert.

In the thirty-eighth year of its existence, the Boston Orchestra, under a different form of management, a French conductor, with an American concertmaster and with a widely changed personnel, has taken a new lease of life. With the enforced retirement of Conductor Karl Muck, and the subsequent withdrawal of Major Higginson, who had financed the orchestra and was its virtual ruler, there was threatened a collapse of the famous combination of musicians. Happily, however, that disaster was averted, and with the creation of a board of trustees, the engagement of the French composer and conductor Henri Rabaud, and the opportunity of securing some members of the French Military Band touring in this country, together with the many fine American musicians available, the Boston Orchestra is able to continue with every evidence of being as popular as in seasons past.

At the Academy of Music last night in the initial concert of a series of five Philadelphians were not given an opportunity of judging the work of Henri Rabaud, who arrived in this country too late to undertake the first tour with his new charge. Rabaud, however, is one of the leading men in France, a distinguished composer as well as a conductor of experience and versatility, and there can be no question of his musicianship and ability. For the first concert Rabaud was replaced by Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, a conductor well known to Philadelphia, where he has directed the Russian Ballet and also various operas, principally French, of the Metropolitan repertoire. Monteux arranged an exceptionally interesting program, beginning with the Franck D minor symphony and including the Schumann Overture to Byron's "Manfred;" "Le Peri, Poeme Danse," by Paul Dukas and the entrancing "Iberia Images," of Debussy. The soloist was Florence Easton, who was especially happy in her interpretation of the Lia aria from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," although she was also interesting in the Mozart Recitative and aria from "The Marriage of Figaro." The Mozart music, however, was not as well within Miss Easton's grasp vocally as the Debussy.

Her lyric voice does not lend itself with sufficient limpidity to the Mozart demands. She was much more effective in the Debussy, where the unevenness of quality so noticeable in her range was less observed. She made an effective orchestral singer and was warmly applauded.

Monteux was much more interesting and successful in the color and variety of Dukas and Debussy than with Francke. His instinct for contrast and vividness had full sweep in the "Iberia Images," which closed the program and brought him well-earned applause. The symphony was done in traditional style, and seered to show that the Boston Orchestra tone has not suffered by the musical upheaval. The string choir is still sonorous and flexible, while the ensemble, generally speaking, was smooth and reliable. It is interesting to note the presence of Schroeder, one of the finest 'cellists. The new concertmaster exhibited a good tone and fine rhythm, and will probably show his metal as the season progresses.

n TIMES
dress: Washington, D. C.

There was no necessity for postponing the first of the Boston symphony concerts, which will be given on Tuesday, as the ban on amusements was lifted in time for arrangements to go through as per schedule. After all, the new conductor, Henri Rabaud did reach this country in time for the opening of the season, and I understand he is to conduct

n EVENING MAIL
ress: New York City

NOV 1 1918

JUST why did Mr. Pierre Monteux need the iron railing which surrounded the conductor's stand at the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra? Perhaps it was to confine what Beethoven would have called his "unbuttoned joy" in the finale of that composer's Seventh symphony. Certainly Mr. Monteux unloosed an exuberance in conducting this venerated work which might have forced him off the little platform if the railing had not put forth a kindly resistance.

Altogether, the Saturday afternoon performance by the made-over Boston Orchestra was much more satisfying than the Thursday evening programme had permitted. Handel's concerto for string orchestra gave Messrs. Fradkin, Noack, Barrier and Malkin a chance as soloists for brief intervals, and in Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" there were moments of exquisite beauty. This musical paraphrase of Paul Verlaine's lovely poem also gave the strings, so long praised as the note of one intensified violin, an opportunity to sound, for those moments, the strings of the old orchestra. Mr. Monteux admirably caught the spirit of the "Poeme" and of D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar." This composition, suggested by the Babylonian poem, leads Istar, daughter of Sin, to the seven gates, where each warder removes a jewel or two, until at the seventh gate a warder takes the last veil that covers her body. And D'Indy clothes Istar with his variations and strips them off so amiably that even a devoutly attentive Boston Orchestra audience liking programme music not too spi[illegible] ciety, seemed [illegible]ly satis[illegible]

rom PRESS
ddress Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 5 1918
Date

46

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS ITS FIRST CONCERT HERE

Pierre Monteux Conducts—Florence Easton Soloist—Orchestral Novelty Is Dukas' "Le Peri."

BY BENJAMIN F. GLAZER.

The first of the five Boston Symphony concerts was heard at the Academy last evening without the new conductor, M. Rabaud, who arrived from France a few days ago. In his stead M. Pierre Monteux wielded the baton. Local audiences have grateful memories of him as conductor of French opera for the Metropolitan Opera Company.

His debut as a symphony conductor was less impressive, yet highly creditable. He read the César Franck D minor symphony in a scholarly fashion and without affectation, yet it would be folly to blink at the fact that the condition was not up to the Boston Symphony standard. It is reported that about a quarter of the orchestra's personnel is new and that the whole has had inadequate time for rehearsal owing to the delay in choosing a conductor. And indeed, a lot of the old tonal perfection was missing—grievously so in the brasses—wherefore the fault may not be with M. Monteux at all.

The rest of his program, which was rather light in quality and markedly theatrical in its essence, revealed him at his best. His accompaniments to Florence Easton's singing were a marvel of precision and discretion, revealing his sound operatic experience, just as his interpretation of the Dukas "Le Peri" was finely evocative of the fancy, the spectacle, the drama of the ballet. Also, be it noted, he read the "Iberia" images of Debussy with consummate delicacy.

Miss Easton sang the third act recitative and aria from "The Marriage of Figaro" somewhat heavily. Her voice seemed tired, her tone production labored; and in her phrasing was lacking the vivacity one expects of those inimitable Mozartian melodies. But her recitative and aria from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," was splendidly done. On the whole, Miss Easton showed remarkable improvement since her operatic appearance here.

The Dukas poeme danse was heard for the first time in Philadelphia. Its juxtaposition to the Debussy suite made an interesting comparison. Was it Debussy himself who proclaimed his artistic creed thus: "Pianissimo—delicately—win the emotion by suggestion. Reach the mind through the imagination! Take fleeting impressions—not the obvious?" And wasn't it Van Vechten whose epigram described Dukas as "a giant cutting capers?"

And yet, hearing them both together in this fashion, it is the "giant cutting capers" whose appeal is finer. "Le Peri" is music of the obviously descriptive sort, adapted to the theatre and neither very gigantic nor capricious; yet there is a virility in its orchestration, a solidity in its architecture and a profundity in its conception that make Debussy seem pallid and trivially sensuous by comparison.

M. Rabaud himself will conduct the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given on the evening of December 2.

NORTH AMERICAN
s Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN TREAT AT ACADEMY

M. Monteux Conducts Masterfully Thru a Difficult and Brilliant Program

The press agent's favorite phrase, "everything new but the name," might have been applied with almost literal truthfulness to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which last night came to the Academy of Music for its first concert of the season here. Any fears that might have been entertained about the effects of a new conductor and sweeping reorganization of personnel were changed, however, to pleasure and satisfaction as the extremely meaty and varied program progressed under the bland and gracious leadership of Pierre Monteux.

M. Monteux has been known here hitherto only as a conductor of the Metropolitan Opera. Last night's test as an orchestral conductor was particularly severe, because of the range of compositions played and the fact that his work with this organization is only temporary. But his sound musicianship was ever in evidence, and the work of his men was not only satisfactory, but frequently brilliant. M. Monteux conducted without score.

The reconstructed orchestra has gained in elasticity of phrase and delicacy of shading. The brasses in particular have improved, and the trumpets were particularly rich. The initial number was the lovely Cesar Franck Symphony in D minor, and it was not until the allegretto that it became evident that the string choirs retain their melifluous beauty undimmed. Their brilliance in the Dukas "Peri" was amazing.

"Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan forces, was the soloist, her first number being the recitative and aria "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," which has come to be regarded as the test piece for a dramatic soprano. She has not the technique for Mozart, but her later singing of Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue" was thrilling in its loveliness and freshness.

Two ultra-modern numbers on the program were Dukas' "Le Peri," a dance poem, and Debussy's "Iberia," a suite of "images" in three sections. The "Peri" is not of the school of cacophony, but is an enchanting, ear-ravishing piece, fairly glowing with oriental color, employing full modern resources of orchestra for enriched harmonies, rather than for meretricious tone-painting.

The Debussy number is a masterpiece of polyphony; its orchestral color is of the brightest, and there is a lively sense of humor of crowds in the frank rhythms of the first movement, against which is contrasted the evanescent mistiness of the second movement.

The symphony was played with true feeling for its heroic and spiritual qualities.

Schumann's familiar "Manfred" overture was the second number on the splendid program.

m EVENING JOURNAL
dress New York City

TWO ORCHESTRA CONCERTS OVER THE WEEK-END

Boston and New York Bands Heard—Raoul Vidas, French Violinist, in Debut.

Orchestral furor—music Handelian-Italian, Novoanglo-Alsatian, Irano-Gallic, Teutono-Asiatic and just plain French—battered itself against the encasement of Carnegie Hall on Saturday, afternoon and evening. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Walter Damrosch, of the New York Symphony Band, loosed this single day's Niagara of sound, and one still retains the sensation of inundation.

Mr. Monteux began matters innocently enough with Handel's concerto grosso in D, largely, no doubt, to exploit to New York the abilities of Messrs. Fradkin, Barrier and Malkin, respectively the principal violin, viola and violincello of the band. It was not overweeningly persuasive Handel.

Subsequently Mr. Monteux occupied himself with the New England Alsatian, Charles Martin Loeffler's labored and belabored elaboration, "La Bonne Chanson." Mr. Loeffer has cast and recast, polished and repolished this hand-made music. Inspiration is foreign to its substance and even Mr. Monteux's buffetings of its effingy integument could not lend its dead weight the camouflage of mental or manual souffle.

But Mr. Monteux's chief effort of the afternoon was the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven which, under that peculiar contagion that appears to [illegible] with as much deadly certainty as the influenza germ, from one orchestral conductor to another, has now been played three times in a young season. None of these performances has been within nodding acquaintance of perhaps the post "unbuttoned" and yet profoundly introspective utterance of the colossus of Bonn. Mr. Monteux, like Mr. Damrosch, is obsessed by the Wagnerian dictum, the Frenchman also trying to preoccupy Beethoven with a finicking dance hypothesis.

A second hearing of the Boston Orchestra, reconstituted, confirmed one's previous impression as to its playing. There is a good deal of work ahead of it to make it sound up to its previous standards, both as to the matter of string and brass tone and as to precision in attack and release, unanimity and the general balance and beauty of the full orchestral diapason.

EVENING POST
ss: New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If the Boston Symphony Orchestra were as bad as a perambulating street band it would have sounded well last night to ears outraged by the horrible din in the streets, and seeking refuge in Carnegie Hall. Now that the populace has let off steam, what will happen when peace is truly announced? Will it be as with Peary, whose discovery of the North Pole created not a ripple because Dr. Cook had taken the wind out of his sails?

However that may be, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its first New York concert of the season, got the benefit of the prevailing patriotic excitement. After it had played the "Star-Spangled Banner," there were many calls for the "Marseillaise," and then for the English and Italian national hymns, all of which were played with splendid fervor and tonal beauty.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not what it was last year. Some weeks ago the present writer, misled by newspaper reports, asserted that it had been "unionized and Americanized." The article was copied by a Boston paper and brought a correction by President Kingman, of the Local 9, A. F. of M., who stated that "an effort was made to unionize the orchestra, but negotiations were broken off, owing to the fact that the cardinal principle of the American Federation of Musicians stands for American musicians first, to which the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took exception." A prominent Boston critic wrote a very insulting letter about the present writer's mistake, declaring emphatically that the orchestra had not been Americanized (except as to its concertmaster), but Gallicized, most of the Germans ousted having been replaced by Frenchmen. Well and good; but is it such an awful crime to accuse an organization in this country of being Americanized?

The orchestra could hardly have been expected to play as well last night as it used to play, for it takes time to secure so fine an ensemble as that which made this organization famous. The temporary conductor, M. Monteux, moreover, did not succeed so well as he has done at the Metropolitan Opera House in making the music interpreted by him of vital interest. The romantic bloom of Schumann's "Manfred" overture was sadly missed, and the second and third movements of the César Franck symphony were deadly dull, while the first—which owes its inspiration chiefly to Grieg and "Parsifal"—was rather disjointed. He was at his best in the numbers which preceded the final "Iberia" of Debussy: "La Péri: Poème Dansé," by Paul Dukas. This was read and played with the true neo-Gallic nuances and atmosphere—an atmosphere of glittering cascades of sound and sunset colors without much form or sequence. With the stage pictures and the dancing it would have doubtless been quite effective; without them it seemed too long.

m BULLETIN
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.

MUSICALLY, the calendar for nex week, and subsequently in the nea future, foretells some events of much in terest. The musical season may be sai really to have started with the delaye first pair of concerts of the Philadel phia Orchestra at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon and this eve ning. On the program to be presented next Friday afternoon and Saturday eve ning a popular soloist will be Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, of the Metropolita Opera Company, who is to be heard in two numbers. For the orchestral portion of the program, Mr. Stokowski has se lected the Capriccio Espagnol of Rimsky Korsakow, in place of the usual sym phony; the overture to the opera "Gwendoline," by Chabrier, and "Two Int dian Dances" by an American composer Charles Sanford Skilton.

The Boston Symphony will make it first appearance of the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening being conducted on this occasion b Pierre Monteux, conductor of Frenc opera at the Metropolitan Opera Hous in New York, while the soloist will b Florence Easton, soprano, of the Metro politan Company, one of the most pop lar singers to appear in Philadelphia recent years. The instrumental number are to be the Franck Symphony, in D Minor, the overture to Schumann "Manfred," Dukas' "La Peri" and De bussy's "Iberia." Miss Easton will sing numbers of Schumann and Debussy. The subsequent four concerts of the Boston Orchestra series will be under the direc tion of Henri Rabaud, who has been en gaged as permanent conductor.

Of momentous interest next Tuesda evening will be the appearance at the Metropolitan of the famous Paris Con servatoire Orchestra, which has start its first tour of this country. The orches tra, which is conducted by M. Message is composed largely of professors at the Conservatoire, who elect their own con ductor. The soloist of the occasion, Al fred Cortet, ranked as one of the gre est pianists in France, also is a [illegible] at the famous music school.

gram includes the Prelude to [illegible] "L'Apres midi d'un Faun," the "Pari overture of Bizet, the Morceau sy phonique extrait de "Redemption" Franck, "La Carnaval Romain" overtu of Berlioz, and the C minor symphon of Beethoven. Mons. Cortet will pla [illegible] Concerto [illegible]

ENQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 5 - 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Heard at the Academy of Music Under Mr. Monteux's Direction

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its local season at the Academy of Music last evening when a varied and interesting programme, which had the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor for its leading feature, was rendered under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux in a manner which evidently afforded much pleasure to the large audience which the occasion had attracted.

Since the orchestra was heard here last extensive changes have taken place in its personnel and naturally much curiosity was felt as to the effect of this reorganization upon the character and quality of its performance. It may be said without hesitation that little effect was noticeable. The orchestra played the several numbers in which it was heard with much the same beauty and refinement of tone, the same brilliancy of execution and eloquence of expression, for which it has so long been distinguished and a better interpretation of the D minor symphony, one more intelligently appreciative or more eloquently expressive, than was given under Mr. Monteux's sympathetic and illuminative baton could with difficulty be imagined and need not be desired.

In its grace and clarity and spirituality, in the symmetry of its proportions and the unity of its design, Franck's noble masterpiece is a characteristically French creation, none the less so because its composer was a Belgian, and it was expounded with a technical skill and a perceptive delicacy which left nothing of its message undelivered nor any of its manifold beauties undisclosed. The heartiness of the applause which broke out at its conclusion showed how much the audience had been pleased, and the recalls which Mr. Monteux received were well deserved. The other purely instrumental numbers were Schumann's opaque and sombre "Manfred" overture, an intricate and impassioned reverie by Dukas, entitled "Le Peri," which had not previously been heard here, and which, although somewhat prolix, proved well worth while, and Debussy's richly colored "Iberia."

The soloist for the evening was that excellent artist and gifted soprano singer, Mme. Florence Easton, who is so well and favorably known to the opera and concert-goers of this city, whose fine voice and cultivated methods were advantageously displayed in an authoritative delivery of the "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and of Lia's aria in Debussy's "Le Enfant Prodigue." The next of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, December 24

HERALD

Washington, D. C.

CONCERTS TO OPEN TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Singers Give First Recital at National.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its series of concerts in Washington at 4:30 o'cock next Tuesday afternoon, November 5, at the New National Theater. This will be the first of five subscription concerts, and the return of Boston's famous orchestra is waited here with eagerness. Since it gave its last concert here a year ago it has undergone a radical reorganization that has affected the personnel, the management and the conductor.

Owing to the delayed arrival in America of Henri Rabaud the new conductor, this first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, principal conductor of French opera of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, who was courteously lent to the Boston Symphony by Mr. Gatti-Casazza for this Southern trip. Twenty-five per cent of the personnel is new.

Florence Easton Here.

The orchestra brings to Washington as soloist, Florence Easton, a singer of unusual quality of voice and unusual musical talent, one of the Metropolitan Opera Company sopranos. Miss Easton is not altogether a stranger in Washington. A dozen years ago in her apprentice days she appeared here with the Savage Opera Company. Since then she has made great strides and has been engaged for a half dozen appearances with the orchestra in various cities in addition to Boston.

Mr. Monteux's program is a mingling of the classic and the modern French. It opens with one of the Concerto Grossos of Handel, for strings alone. It is one of a set written by Handel while he was a resident of London and has all the aristocratic, elegant qualities that characterize his music at the best. The other orchestra numbers will be a symphonic poem entitled "La Bonne Chanson," by Charles Martin Loeffler, Claude Debussy's Spanish suite, "Iberia," and the noble symphony of Cesar Franck in D minor. Martin Loeffler is, all told, the most distinguished figure in American music today. His "La Bonne Chanson," inspired by a poem of the same name by Paul Verlaine, was written sixteen years ago, played once in Boston then withdrawn by the composer for future revision. This revision was made last summer and the work is practically new. Debussy's fascinating "Iberia" and Cesar Franck's symphony are well known to Washingtonians.

Program Announced.

Madame Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the Countess' aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," "Dove Sono," and her second will be the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's little opera, "L'Enfant Prodigue." The program in its proper form is as follows:

"Concerto Grosso No. 5," D major, for string orchestra (Messrs. Fradkin and Noack, solo violins; Mr. Barrier, solo viola; Mr. Malkin, solo violoncello (Handel); Aria "Dove Sono" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" (Mozart); poeme, "La Bonne Chanson" (Loeffler); recitative and air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue" (Debussy); symphony in D minor (Franck).

Church of the Covenant.

Mr. Sydney Lloyd Wrightson announces the engagement of a double quartet this season instead of a triple quartet for the afternoon services at the Church of the Covenant, in addition to which there will be an additional soloist, Mr. Fred East, bass. The personnel of the double quartet is as follows: Miss Netta Craig, Mrs. Jewell Downs, sopranos; Miss Mary Jacobs, Miss M. E. Allen, contraltos; Mr. Richard P. Backing, Mr. W. S Blanchard, tenors; Mr. Wheeler Wilson, Mr. Harry H. R. Helwig, basses.

This organization will sing for the first time this season at the community sing which will take the place of the regular afternoon service. It will render the following numbers during the afternoon: "I Will Sing of Thy Power (Sullivan); soprano solo, "Cast Thy Burden Upon the Lord" (Hamblen); "Yea; Though I Walk Through the Valley of the Shadow of Death" (Stevenson); incidental solo, Miss M. Culp, of Cincinnati, substituting for Miss Mary Jacobs; Supplication (Scott); incidental solo, Mr. East.

At the church in the evening at 8 o'clock the double quartet of the evening choir will render the music. Miss M. Culp will substitute for Miss Jacobs, who will arrive in Washington to take up her work on November 5. The musical numbers follow: Organ prelude [illegible] B flat (Peace); "At Thy Footstool" (Broome); contralto solo, "O, Rest in the Lord, Elijah (Mendelssohn), Miss Culp; "Thus Saith the Lord" (Hosmer), incidental solo, Mr. Wilson; "O, Father Almighty" (Koschat); organ postlude, Festival (Stark).

The evening choir of the church, which had only one rehearsal this season and was forced to close down on account of influenza, will resume its rehearsals on Wednesday evening next in the chapel of the church at 8 o'clock, and will sing for the first time this season the following Sunday night, November 10. The choir usually has the month of October to prepare for its season's work, which usually begins on the first Sunday in November, but this year it will take its place in the church with only two rehearsals. New members are earnestly and cordially invited to join this organization, the largest chorus choir in the city. Voices for all parts in this large mixed chorus are welcome, especially in the male section. Anyone can join at any of the Wednesday evening rehearsals, and there is no limit to the number of singers that will be enrolled, as there is a capacity for 250 voices in the new choir gallery.

m STAR

dress: Baltimore, Md.

At its first concert in this country in New York city the big number of its program was the symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck, the great French composer of Belgian birth. It is understood this was to have been played in Baltimore, also. Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, has announced that it will play this work in Baltimore on Wednesday night, the night before the Paris Orchestra plays here, and the Paris Orchestra may decide for this reason to substitute another composition.

If this is not done and the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not change its own program for Wednesday night here, there will be particular opportunity and additional interest, nevertheless, in comparing the renditions of the same work by the two orchestras so close together.

It will be a pity for Baltimore to lose an opportunity to hear this work played by the Paris Orchestra, which will be here only once.

As there will be interest, also, in a rendition of it by the reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra, a way out of the immediate repetition would be for the Boston Orchestra to play it at one of the four other concerts it will give in Baltimore this season.

HERALD, NOVEMBER 17

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The fourth pair of symphony concerts, in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, presents a program of unusual interest and a soloist who, a few years back, was popular here—Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist. Since her marriage to Leopold Stokowski she has done comparatively little concert work. She will play Grieg's Concerto in A minor. The opening number of the program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony; the closing number the Symphony of Saint-Saens, in C minor. The organ will be played by Albert Show.

[illegible] urday evening [illegible] certs this week.

Mme. Samaroff has not appeared in Boston with the orchestra since 1909, when she played Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor. Her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in 1906, when she played the Grieg Concerto in A minor. She will play this same work in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday.

Mme. Samaroff is the wife of Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

Madame Olga Samaroff, pianist, soloist at Boston Symphony concerts.

4000 AUTOGRAPHS ON TESTIMONIAL

Symphony Subscribers Give Book Containing Signatures to Major Higginson on His 84th Birthday

MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON'S BIRTHDAY BOOK

Picture shows the cover of a book containing 4000 signatures, presented to the veteran banker by his friends yesterday, the occasion being his 84th birthday anniversary.

A splendid tribute to Major Henry L. Higginson was prepared by his friends and presented to him yesterday on his 84th birthday. The testimonial was in the shape of a book containing the signatures of 4000 people who in the last 37 years have enjoyed the concerts and rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An earnest effort to reach all who have attended the concerts was made, but it was not possible, since their sense of the public benefits which have resulted and will result from your disinterested and patient labors on behalf of the orchestra and the community it has served. Many of the signers of this memorial are acquaintances who have long cherished high respect for you and your good works, or friends, old and young, who feel for you the sincerest affection; but most of them are strangers who gladly embrace this their first opportunity to tell you directly that you have gladdened and exalted their physical and spiritual lives.

Soil Well Prepared

employed. Your orchestra has given year by year a demonstration of the exceeding value of co-operative discipline. You have steadily insisted that the skilled musician's occupation is not a mechanical trade, but an artistic profession. You have given your public the pure, refining, exalting, inspiring music of all nations and all periods. You have enlarged and strengthened the appreciation of sweet and noble music in this community.

Value in the Future

"We shall all better appreciate the work you have done for Boston and the country if we bear in mind that good music sustains and consoles the human spirit in times of adversity, and is, next to good literature, the best expression of public prosperity, social joy and religious transport. It transcends the limits of language or race, requires no versions or translations, and ranges freely through all the civilized world and the successive generations of men. Your success in creating the Symphony Orchestra as a permanent institution will have a high educational value in the future; for common enjoyment of immortal music allied with immortal poetry will prove an exalting and binding influence among the various elements of the American population.

"On behalf of the signers of this memorial I greet you and Mrs. Higginson with heartiest congratulations on the principal work of your useful life, warmest thanks and best wishes for your enjoyment of serene content as you look backward, and still more as you look forward.

"Your old friend,

"CHARLES W. ELIOT.

"Major Henry L. Higginson."

Record Nov. 23

SAMAROFF AS SOLOIST WITH THE SYMPHONY

By J. V. CLARK

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Henri Rabaud, conductor; Mme. Olga Samaroff, soloist. Fourth concert of the Boston season, Symphony Hall. The program:—

Schubert—Unfinished Symphony, B minor.
Grieg—Concerto in A minor for pianoforte.
Saint-Saens—Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78.

This was Mr. Rabaud's second appearance with the orchestra and in this program, so familiar to patrons of these concerts, he again proved that he was a most efficient conducter, well versed in the traditions of standard music, thorough, safe and sane. The charming Unfinished Symphony, which is, possibly, best described as being most Schubertian, was very beautifully played.

Mme. Samaroff evidently has a penchant for the Grieg Concerto. She played it here with the Boston orchestra in 1906. In fact, the concerto seems to be a great favorite with women pianists. Out of six performances with the Boston orchestra five have been by women, Mme. Samaroff twice; Katherine Goodson, once; Augusta Cottlow, once, and Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, once. The last time we heard Mme. Samaroff play the concerto it was with another orchestra in a smaller hall. If memory serves us correctly, her performance yesterday was even more poetic than in other days. There was no overplaying. There were no heroics. There was no attempt to distort any of the music into a merely brilliant display of pianism, which it does not permit. The tenderness, the sadness, the touch of unhappiness that pervades the work were finely caught by Mme. Samaroff. The rondo on the five themes, that constitutes the third section of the work, were played with sufficient verve and color, but the performance, as a whole, was a finely subdued one, a performance that indicated a true appreciation of the real spirit of this concerto, which to some remains one of Grieg's most interesting works. The only criticism of Mme. Samaroff's playing yesterday was that she apparently did not always gauge the acoustics of the hall and that occasionally, as in the adagio, her tone was was too pianissimo. The concerto is not one to excite frenzied applause, but Mme. Samaroff was appreciatively applauded.

In two perofrmances Mr. Rabaud has given two Saint-Saens works, last week "The Youth of Hercules," this week the C minor Symphony. Either Saint-Saens is a favorite with the new conductor or the limits of repertoire set by war time conditions has compelled him to include Saine-Saens frequently in his list. The symphony has been played here frequently. It was played for the last time on March 22, 1918. The qualities of its music, its form, its deftness and simplicity in orchestration are well known. The music received a performance that enhanced its inherent quantities by Mr. Rabaud, the orchestra, Mr. Albert Snow, organist, and Mr. Alfred De Voto, pianist.

The program for the concerts of Nov. 29-30 will be Weber, "Euryanthe" overture; Mozart, Symphony in C Major (Jupiter); Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Borodin, Symphony in B minor, No. 2.

ENQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 5 - 1918

47

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Heard at the Academy of Music Under Mr. Monteux's Direction

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its local season at the Academy of Music last evening when a varied and interesting programme, which had the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor for its leading feature, was rendered under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux in a manner which evidently afforded much pleasure to the large audience which the occasion had attracted.

Since the orchestra was heard here last extensive changes have taken place in its personnel and naturally much curiosity was felt as to the effect of this reorganization upon the character and quality of its performance. It may be said without hesitation that little effect was noticeable. The orchestra played the several numbers in which it was heard with much the same beauty and refinement of tone, the same brilliancy of execution and eloquence of expression, for which it has so long been distinguished and a better interpretation of the D minor symphony, one more intelligently appreciative or more eloquently expressive, than was given under Mr. Monteux's sympathetic and illuminative baton could with difficulty be imagined and need not be desired.

In its grace and clarity and spirituality, in the symmetry of its proportions and the unity of its design, Franck's noble masterpiece is a characteristically French creation, none the less so because its composer was a Belgian, and it was expounded with a technical skill and a perceptive delicacy which left nothing of its message undelivered nor any of its manifold beauties undisclosed. The heartiness of the applause which broke out at its conclusion showed how much the audience had been pleased, and the recalls which Mr. Monteux received were well deserved. The other purely instrumental numbers were Schumann's opaque and sombre "Manfred" overture, an intricate and impassioned reverie by Dukas, entitled "Le Peri," which had not previously been heard here, and which, although somewhat prolix, proved well worth while, and Debussy's richly colored "Iberia."

The soloist for the evening was that excellent artist and gifted soprano singer, Mme. Florence Easton, who is so well and favorably known to the opera and concert-goers of this city, whose fine voice and cultivated methods were advantageously displayed in an authoritative delivery of the "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and of Lia's aria in Debussy's "Le Enfant Prodigue." The next of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, December 24

m STAR
dress: Baltimore, Md.

e 13

At its first concert in this country in New York city the big number of its program was the symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck, the great French composer of Belgian birth. It is understood this was to have been played in Baltimore, also. Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, has announced that it will play this work in Baltimore on Wednesday night, the night before the Paris Orchestra plays here, and the Paris Orchestra may decide for this reason to substitute another composition.

If this is not done and the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not change its own program for Wednesday night here, there will be particular opportunity and additional interest, nevertheless, in comparing the renditions of the same work by the two orchestras so close together.

It will be a pity for Baltimore to lose an opportunity to hear this work played by the Paris Orchestra, which will be here only once.

As there will be interest, also, in a rendition of it by the reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra, a way out of the immediate repetition would be for the Boston Orchestra to play it at one of the four other concerts it will give in Baltimore this season.

HERALD, NOVEMBER 17

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The fourth pair of symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, presents a program of unusual interest and a soloist who, a few years back, was popular here—Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist. Since her marriage to Leopold Stokowski she has done comparatively little concert work. She will play Grieg's Concerto in A minor. The opening number of the program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony; the closing number the Symphony of Saint-Saens in C minor. The organ will be played by Albert Snow.

ALD
Washington, D. C.

NOV 5 - 1918

CONCERTS TO OPEN TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Singers Give First Recital at National.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its series of concerts in Washington at 4:30 o'cock next Tuesday afternoon, November 5, at the New National Theater. This will be the first of five subscription concerts, and the return of Boston's famous orchestra is waited here with eagerness. Since it gave its last concert here a year ago it has undergone a radical reorganization that has affected the personnel, the management and the conductor.

Owing to the delayed arrival in America of Henri Rabaud the new conductor, this first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, principal conductor of French opera of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, who was courteously lent to the Boston Symphony by Mr. Gatti-Casazza for this Southern trip. Twenty-five per cent of the personnel is new.

Florence Easton Here.

The orchestra brings to Washington as soloist, Florence Easton, a singer of unusual quality of voice and unusual musical talent, one of the Metropolitan Opera Company sopranos. Miss Easton is not altogether a stranger in Washington. A dozen years ago in her apprentice days she appeared here with the Savage Opera Company. Since then she has made ... has been engaged (Broome); contralto solo, "O, Rest in the Lord, Elijah (Mendelssohn), Miss Culp; "Thus Saith the Lord" (Hosmer), incidental solo, Mr. Wilson; "O, Father Almighty" (Koschat); organ postlude, Festival (Stark).

The evening choir of the church, which had only one rehearsal this season and was forced to close down on account of influenza, will resume its rehearsals on Wednesday evening next in the chapel of the church at 8 o'clock, and will sing for the first time this season the following Sunday night, November 10. The choir usually has the month of October to prepare for its season's work, which usually begins on the first Sunday in November, but this year it will take its place in the church with only two rehearsals. New members are earnestly and cordially invited to join this organization, the largest chorus choir in the city. Voices for all parts in this large mixed chorus are welcome, especially in the male section. Anyone can join at any of the Wednesday evening rehearsals, and there is no limit to the number of singers that will be enrolled, as there is a capacity for 250 voices in the new choir gallery.

ne was rewarded with the command of the Callao, the first Spanish ship captured on that historic occasion.

Yet another bride who has recently come to Washington for her first winter of matrimony is Mrs. William Houghteling—oh yes, you do know her, perfectly! She was Virginia LeSeure, Speaker Cannon's attractive and original little granddaughter, who made her debut here about three seasons ago under her "Aunt Helen's" chaperonage, and was a huge success. Washington will not have to make her

BOSTON POST, TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19,

4000 AUTOGRAPHS ON TESTIMONIAL

Symphony Subscribers Give Book Containing Signatures to Major Higginson on His 84th Birthday

MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON'S BIRTHDAY BOOK

Picture shows the cover of a book containing 4000 signatures, presented to the veteran banker by his friends yesterday, the occasion being his 84th birthday anniversary.

A splendid tribute to Major Henry L. Higginson was prepared by his friends and presented to him yesterday on his 84th birthday. The testimonial was in the shape of a book containing the signatures of 4000 people who in the last 37 years have enjoyed the concerts and rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An earnest effort to reach all who have attended the concerts was made, but it was not possible, since their name is legion.

HAND-TOOLED IN GOLD

The volume is a beautiful affair, bound in full crushed brown levant, with light brown morocco lining and fly-leaves. Both the outside and the inside of the covers are tooled by hand in gold to a special design made for the volume by F. C. D. Palmer. Slips of a uniform size, bearing the autograph signatures of those testifying to their affection for Major Higginson, are mounted on leaves of Japanese vellum.

The following letter, written by Dr. Charles W. Eliot, appears on the first page of the book:

"Dear Major Higginson—Some of the thousands of persons who have had their lives made more interesting and happier by the concerts of your Symphony Orchestra in Boston and its vicinity during the past 37 years wish to declare to you on your 84th birthday their personal gratitude and their strong sense of the public benefits which have resulted and will result from your disinterested and patient labors on behalf of the orchestra and the community it has served. Many of the signers of this memorial are acquaintances who have long cherished high respect for you and your good works, or friends, old and young, who feel for you the sincerest affection; but most of them are strangers who gladly embrace this their first opportunity to tell you directly that you have gladdened and exalted their physical and spiritual lives.

Soil Well Prepared

"Boston was historically the right place in the United States to develop an orchestra of high merit. The soil in which you planted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1880-81 had been well prepared during the 40 years preceding by a series of earlier organizations for providing orchestral concerts in the community where you and I grew up. These pioneering organizations were the Boston Academy of Music, the Musical Fund Society, the Germania Orchestra, the Philharmonic Society and the Harvard Musical Association. Their resources were limited, and their achievements modest; but they made ready a supporting public for you.

"Your purpose was to create an orchestra out of the best available material in all the world competent to render to perfection the best music in the world. In this very difficult undertaking your success has been marvellous. Your plans and policies have been wise, and generous towards both your public and the artists whom you employed. Your orchestra has given year by year a demonstration of the exceeding value of co-operative discipline. You have steadily insisted that the skilled musician's occupation is not a mechanical trade, but an artistic profession. You have given your public the pure, refining, exalting, inspiring music of all nations and all periods. You have enlarged and strengthened the appreciation of sweet and noble music in this community.

Value in the Future

"We shall all better appreciate the work you have done for Boston and the country if we bear in mind that good music sustains and consoles the human spirit in times of adversity, and is, next to good literature, the best expression of public prosperity, social joy and religious transport. It transcends the limits of language or race, requires no versions or translations, and ranges freely through all the civilized world and the successive generations of men. Your success in creating the Symphony Orchestra as a permanent institution will have a high educational value in the future; for common enjoyment of immortal music allied with immortal poetry will prove an exalting and binding influence among the various elements of the American population.

"On behalf of the signers of this memorial I greet you and Mrs. Higginson with heartiest congratulations on the principal work of your useful life, warmest thanks and best wishes for your enjoyment of serene content as you look backward, and still more as you look forward.

"Your old friend,
"CHARLES W. ELIOT.

"Major Henry L. Higginson."

Record Nov. 33

SAMAROFF AS SOLOIST WITH THE SYMPHONY

By J. V. CLARK

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Henri Rabaud, conductor; Mme. Olga Samaroff, soloist. Fourth concert of the Boston season, Symphony Hall. The program:—

Schubert—Unfinished Symphony, B minor.
Gried—Concerto in A minor for pianoforte.
Saint-Saens—Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78.

This was Mr. Rabaud's second appearance with the orchestra and in this program, so familiar to patrons of these concerts, he again proved that he was a most efficient conductor, well versed in the traditions of standard music, thorough, safe and sane. The charming Unfinished Symphony, which is, possibly, best described as being most Schubertian, was very beautifully played.

Mme. Samaroff evidently has a penchant for the Grieg Concerto. She played it here with the Boston orchestra in 1906. In fact, the concerto seems to be a great favorite with women pianists. Out of six performances with the Boston orchestra five have been by women, Mme. Samaroff, twice; Katherine Goodson, once; Augusta Cottlow, once, and Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, once. The last time we heard Mme. Samaroff play the concerto it was with another orchestra in a smaller hall. If memory serves us correctly, her performance yesterday was even more poetic than in other days. There was no overplaying. There were no heroics. There was no attempt to distort any of the music into a merely brilliant display of pianism, which it does not permit. The tenderness, the sadness, the touch of unhappiness that pervades the work were finely caught by Mme. Samaroff. The rondo on the five themes, that constitutes the third section of the work, were played with sufficient verve and color, but the performance, as a whole, was a finely subdued one, a performance that indicated a true appreciation of the real spirit of this concerto, which to some remains one of Grieg's most interesting works. The only criticism of Mme. Samaroff's playing yesterday was that she apparently did not always gauge the acoustics of the hall and that occasionally, as in the adagio, her tone was was too pianissimo. The concerto is not one to excite frenzied applause, but Mme. Samaroff was appreciatively applauded.

In two perofrmances Mr. Rabaud has given two Saint-Saens works, last week "The Youth of Hercules," this week the C minor Symphony. Either Saint-Saens is a favorite with the new conductor or the limits of repetoire set by war time conditions has compelled him to include Saine-Saens frequently in his list. The symphony has been played here frequently. It was played for the last time on March 22, 1918. The qualities of its music, its form, its deftness and simplicity in orchestration are well known. The music received a performance that enhanced its inherent quantities by Mr. Rabaud, the orchestra, Mr. Albert Snow, organist, and Mr. Alfred De Voto, pianist.

The program for the concerts of Nov. 29-30 will be Weber, "Euryanthe" overture; Mozart, Symphony in C Major (Jupiter); Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Borodin, Symphony in B minor, No. 2.

TRAVELER NOVEMBER 20.

OLGA SAMAROFF TO BE SOLOIST

Plays with Symphony Orchestra Friday

Olga Samaroff, pianist, will be the soloist at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Boston Symphony concerts this week.

Mme. Samaroff has not appeared in Boston with the orchestra since 1909, when she played Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor. Her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in 1906, when she played the Grieg Concerto in A minor. She will play this same work in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday.

Mme. Samaroff is the wife of Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

RETURNS THIS WEEK TO CONCERT STAGE

Madame Olga Samaroff, pianist, soloist at Boston Symphony concerts.

ENQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 5 - 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Heard at the Academy of Music Under Mr. Monteux's Direction

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its local season at the Academy of Music last evening when a varied and interesting programme, which had the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor for its leading feature, was rendered under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux in a manner which evidently afforded much pleasure to the large audience which the occasion had attracted.

Since the orchestra was heard here last extensive changes have taken place in its personnel and naturally much curiosity was felt as to the effect of this reorganization upon the character and quality of its performance. It may be said without hesitation that little effect was noticeable. The orchestra played the several numbers in which it was heard with much the same beauty and refinement of tone, the same brilliancy of execution and eloquence of expression, for which it has so long been distinguished and a better interpretation of the D minor symphony, one more intelligently appreciative or more eloquently expressive, than was given under Mr. Monteux's sympathetic and illuminative baton could with difficulty be imagined and need not be desired.

In its grace and clarity and spirituality, in the symmetry of its proportions and the unity of its design, Franck's noble masterpiece is a characteristically French creation, none the less so because its composer was a Belgian, and it was expounded with a technical skill and a perceptive delicacy which left nothing of its message undelivered nor any of its manifold beauties undisclosed. The heartiness of the applause which broke out at its conclusion showed how much the audience had been pleased, and the recalls which Mr. Monteux received were well deserved. The other purely instrumental numbers were Schumann's opaque and sombre "Manfred" overture, an intricate and impassioned rhapsodic by Dukas, entitled "Le Peri," which had not previously been heard here, and which, although somewhat [illegible], proved well worth while, and Debussy's richly colored "Iberia."

The soloist for the evening was that excellent artist and gifted soprano singer, Mme. Florence Easton, who is so well and favorably known to the opera and concert-goers of this city, whose fine voice and cultivated methods were advantageously displayed in an authoritative delivery of the "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and of Lia's aria in Debussy's "Le Enfant Prodigne." The next of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, December 24.

m STAR

dress: Baltimore, Md.

At its first concert in this country in New York city the big number of its program was the symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck, the great French composer of Belgian birth. It is understood this was to have been played in Baltimore, also. Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, has announced that it will play this work in Baltimore on Wednesday night, the night before the Paris Orchestra plays here, and the Paris Orchestra may decide for this reason to substitute another composition.

If this is not done and the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not change its own program for Wednesday night here, there will be particular opportunity and additional interest, nevertheless, in comparing the renditions of the same work by the two orchestras so close together.

It will be a pity for Baltimore to lose an opportunity to hear this work played by the Paris Orchestra, which will be here only once.

As there will be interest, also, in a rendition of it by the reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra, a way out of the immediate repetition would be for the Boston Orchestra to play it at one of the four other concerts it will give in Baltimore this season.

HERALD, NOVEMBER 17

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The fourth pair of symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, presents a program of unusual interest and a soloist who, a few years back, was popular here—Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist. Since her marriage to Leopold Stokowski she has done comparatively little concert work. She will play Grieg's Concerto in A minor. The opening number of the program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony; the closing number the Symphony of Saint-Saens in C minor. The organ will be played by Albert Snow.

ALD

Washington, D. C.

CONCERTS TO OPEN TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Singers Give First Recital at National.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its series of concerts in Washington at 4:30 o'cock next Tuesday afternoon, November 5, at the New National Theater. This will be the first of five subscription concerts, and the return of Boston's famous orchestra is waited here with eagerness. Since it gave its last concert here a year ago it has undergone a radical reorganization that has affected the personnel, the management and the conductor.

Owing to the delayed arrival in America of Henri Rabaud the new conductor, this first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, principal conductor of French opera of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, who was courteously lent to the Boston Symphony by Mr. Gatti-Casazza for this Southern trip. Twenty-five per cent of the personnel is new.

Florence Easton Here.

The orchestra brings to Washington as soloist, Florence Easton, a singer of unusual quality of voice and unusual musical talent, one of the Metropolitan Opera Company sopranos. Miss Easton is not altogether a stranger in Washington. A dozen years ago in her apprentice days she appeared here with the Savage Opera Company. Since then she has made [illegible] has been engaged Broome); contralto solo, "O, Rest in the Lord, Elijah (Mendelssohn), Miss Culp; "Thus Saith the Lord" (Horner), incidental solo, Mr. Wilson; "O, Father Almighty" (Koschat); organ postlude, Festival (Stark).

The evening choir of the church, which had only one rehearsal this season and was forced to close down on account of influenza, will resume its rehearsals on Wednesday evening next in the chapel of the church at 8 o'clock, and will sing for the first time this season the following Sunday night, November 10. The choir usually has the month of October to prepare for its season's work, which usually begins on the first Sunday in November, but this year it will take its place in the church with only two rehearsals. New members are earnestly and cordially invited to join this organization, the largest chorus choir in the city. Voices for all parts in this large mixed chorus are welcome, especially in the male section. Anyone can join at any of the Wednesday evening rehearsals, and there is no limit to the number of singers that can be enrolled, as there is a capacity for 250 voices in the new choir gallery.

[illegible] was rewarded with the command of the Calliao, the first Spanish ship captured on that historic occasion.

Yet another bride who has recently come to Washington for her first winter of matrimony is Mrs. William Houghteling—oh yes, you do know her, perfectly! She was Virginia LeSeure, Speaker Cannon's attractive and original little granddaughter, who made her debut here about three seasons ago under her "Aunt Helen's" chaperonage, and was a huge success. Washington will not have to make her

BOSTON POST, TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19,

4000 AUTOGRAPHS ON TESTIMONIAL

Symphony Subscribers Give Book Containing Signatures to Major Higginson on His 84th Birthday

MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON'S BIRTHDAY BOOK

Picture shows the cover of a book containing 4000 signatures, presented to the veteran banker by his friends yesterday, the occasion being his 84th birthday anniversary.

A splendid tribute to Major Henry L. Higginson was prepared by his friends and presented to him yesterday on his 84th birthday. The testimonial was in the shape of a book containing the signatures of 4000 people who in the last 37 years have enjoyed the concerts and rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An earnest effort to reach all who have attended the concerts was made, but it was not possible, since their name is legion.

HAND-TOOLED IN GOLD

The volume is a beautiful affair, bound in full crushed brown levant, with light brown morocco lining and fly-leaves. Both the outside and the inside of the covers are tooled by hand in gold to a special design made for the volume by F. C. D. Palmer. Slips of a uniform size, bearing the autograph signatures of those testifying to their affection for Major Higginson, are mounted on leaves of Japanese vellum.

The following letter, written by Dr. Charles W. Eliot, appears on the first page of the book:

"Dear Major Higginson—Some of the thousands of persons who have had their lives made more interesting and happier by the concerts of your Symphony Orchestra in Boston and its vicinity during the past 37 years wish to declare to you on your 84th birthday their personal gratitude and their strong sense of the public benefits which have resulted and will result from your disinterested and patient labors on behalf of the orchestra and the community it has served. Many of the signers of this memorial are acquaintances who have long cherished high respect for you and your good works, or friends, old and young, who feel for you the sincerest affection; but most of them are strangers who gladly embrace this their first opportunity to tell you directly that you have gladdened and exalted their physical and spiritual lives.

Soil Well Prepared

"Boston was historically the right place in the United States to develop an orchestra of high merit. The soil in which you planted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1880-81 had been well prepared during the 40 years preceding by a series of earlier organizations for providing orchestral concerts in the community where you and I grew up. These pioneering organizations were the Boston Academy of Music, the Musical Fund Society, the Germania Orchestra, the Philharmonic Society and the Harvard Musical Association. Their resources were limited, and their achievements modest; but they made ready a supporting public for you.

"Your purpose was to create an orchestra out of the best available material in all the world competent to render to perfection the best music in the world. In this very difficult undertaking your success has been marvellous. Your plans and policies have been wise, and generous towards both your public and the artists whom you employed. Your orchestra has given year by year a demonstration of the exceeding value of co-operative discipline. You have steadily insisted that the skilled musician's occupation is not a mechanical trade, but an artistic profession. You have given your public the pure, refining, exalting, inspiring music of all nations and all periods. You have enlarged and strengthened the appreciation of sweet and noble music in this community.

Value in the Future

"We shall all better appreciate the work you have done for Boston and the country if we bear in mind that good music sustains and consoles the human spirit in times of adversity, and is, next to good literature, the best expression of public prosperity, social joy and religious transport. It transcends the limits of language or race, requires no versions or translations, and ranges freely through all the civilized world and the successive generations of men. Your success in creating the Symphony Orchestra as a permanent institution will have a high educational value in the future; for common enjoyment of immortal music allied with immortal poetry will prove an exalting and binding influence among the various elements of the American population.

"On behalf of the signers of this memorial I greet you and Mrs. Higginson with heartiest congratulations on the principal work of your useful life, warmest thanks and best wishes for your enjoyment of serene content as you look backward, and still more as you look forward.

"Your old friend,

"CHARLES W. ELIOT.

"Major Henry L. Higginson."

Record Nov. 33

SAMAROFF AS SOLOIST WITH THE SYMPHONY

By J. V. CLARK

Boston Symphony Orchestra; Henri Rabaud, conductor; Mme. Olga Samaroff, soloist. Fourth concert of the Boston season, Symphony Hall. The program:—

Schubert—Unfinished Symphony, B minor.
Grieg—Concerto in A minor for pianoforte.
Saint-Saens—Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78.

This was Mr. Rabaud's second appearance with the orchestra and in this program, so familiar to patrons of these concerts, he again proved that he was a most efficient conducter, well versed in the traditions of standard music, thorough, safe and sane. The charming Unfinished Symphony, which is, possibly, best described as being most Schubertian, was very beautifully played.

Mme. Samaroff evidently has a penchant for the Grieg Concerto. She played it here with the Boston orchestra in 1906. In fact, the concerto seems to be a great favorite with women pianists. Out of six performances with the Boston orchestra we have been by women, Mme. Samaroff twice; Katherine Goodson, once; Augusta Cottlow, once, and Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, once. The last time we heard Mme. Samaroff play the concerto it was with another orchestra in a smaller hall. If memory serves us correctly, her performance yesterday was even more poetic than in other days. There was no overplaying. There were no heroics. There was no attempt to distort any of the music into a merely brilliant display of pianism, which it does not permit. The tenderness, the sadness, the touch of unhappiness that pervades the work were finely caught by Mme. Samaroff. The rondo on the five themes, that constitutes the third section of the work, were played with sufficient verve and color, but the performance, as a whole, was a finely subdued one, a performance that indicated a true appreciation of the real spirit of this concerto, which to some remains one of Grieg's most interesting works. The only criticism of Mme. Samaroff's playing yesterday was that she apparently did not always gauge the acoustics of the hall and that occasionally, as in the adagio, her tone was was too pianissimo. The concerto is not one to excite frenzied applause, but Mme. Samaroff was appreciatively applauded.

In two perofrmances Mr. Rabaud has given two Saint-Saens works, last week "The Youth of Hercules," this week the C minor Symphony. Either Saint-Saens is a favorite with the new conductor or the limits of repertoire set by war time conditions has compelled him to include Saine-Saens frequently in his list. The symphony has been played here frequently. It was played for the last time on March 22, 1918. The qualities of its music, its form, its deftness and simplicity in orchestration are well known. The music received a performance that enhanced its inherent quantities by Mr. Rabaud, the orchestra, Mr. Albert Snow, organist, and Mr. Alfred De Voto, pianist.

The program for the concerts of Nov. 29-30 will be Weber "Euryanthe" overture; Mozart, Symphony in C Major (Jupiter); Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Borodin, Symphony in B minor, No. 2.

TRAVELER NOVEMBER 20.

OLGA SAMAROFF TO BE SOLOIST

Plays with Symphony Orchestra Friday

Olga Samaroff, pianist, will be the soloist at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Boston Symphony concerts this week.

Mme. Samaroff has not appeared in Boston with the orchestra since 1909, when she played Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor. Her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in 1906, when she played the Grieg Concerto in A minor. She will play this same work in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday.

Mme. Samaroff is the wife of Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

RETURNS THIS WEEK TO CONCERT STAGE

Madame Olga Samaroff, pianist, soloist at Boston Symphony concerts.

MIN G SEASON

onnet.

ned the Metropolitan. Sophie ntralto, has appeared here era and concert. The other e Emilio de Gogorza, who is the Symphony for the first igh for years he has been a Boston.

violinists from abroad are fetz and Jacques Thibaud. rious fact that Mr. Thibaud his first appearance with the in Boston.

of pianists is interesting: nann, Olga Samaroff, Harold Arthur Rubinstein. Of these, anger is Rubinstein. In the of 1906 Mr. Rubinstein gave n the Colonial Theatre, but Boston music lovers he will ger. He is a native of Lodz, oland, where he was born 31 . In childhood he was a Joachim, and his first master He did his principal study er d'Albert and spent some eschetitzky. He is called ly great pianists of the world.

The return of Josef Hofmann will be warmly welcomed. It is many years since Mme. Samaroff appeared here in Boston. In a sense she is a Boston product, for here she had her first success in America, and until her marriage she regarded this city almost as home. Harold Bauer last appeared with the orchestra three years ago.

An engagement out of the common is that of Joseph Bonnet, the French organist. Bonnet's several appearances in Boston have demonstrated that as an artist he has most unusual qualities. The organ in Symphony Hall is an admirable instrument, Mr. Bonnet having said last year that he thought it one of the most brilliant in this country.

Naturally there will be unc mmon interest in the appearance of M Fradkin, the new concert master of orchestra, and, as a matter of rse, Mr. Noack, the second concert ter, will appear as soloist, and Mr. kin, the leading cellist.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, NOVEMBER 17,

Rabaud's Debut in Symphony a Success

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven—Heroic Symphony.
St. Saens—"Youth of Hercules," Symphonic Poem.
Rimski-Korsakoff—Spanish Caprice.

NOT a very remarkable program for our orchestral series. Can it be that M. Rabaud, the new conductor, thinks us provincial compared with Paris? But each one of the new Frenchmen, Monteux, Messager and Rabaud, have played Beethoven as their trump card at each of their debuts, and, therefore, it is possible that they assume the interpretation of this master to be the touchstone of directorial ability.

And Beethoven's Heroic Symphony fits well to the present times, for it was the composer's cry for Liberty, and he pictures his hero, in the first movement, as pulling down all kinds of tyrants, and M. Rabaud demolished them with sufficient emphasis. The new conductor was received with the wildest Boston enthusiasm, and those who think the Boston audiences frigid ought to attend the orchestral concerts this season.

M. Rabaud began well. He made an excellent impression at this concert. Even "The Star Spangled Banner" went more broadly and less sentimentally than it has recently been done, and, by the way, the removal of that banner from the middle of the hall was an acoustical necessity. The resonance is better with the flag placed against a wall.

M. Rabaud read the Heroic symphony in a sensible, well-balanced and unaffected manner. This was very evident in the first movement. The Funeral March, no matter how well interpreted, is too long. Beethoven was altogether too prolix in the planting of his hero, but thanks to the conservative conductor there was no sentimentality exhibited in the movement, and the oboe playing was especially exquisite. Coleridge called this "A funeral in purple," and that best describes its earnest vein. The horns did good work in the next movement, and the final variations were given with superb ensemble. M. Rabaud was applauded to the echo after this excellent reading of a great work.

St. Saens' views about Hercules as a young man have not led to his greatest music, but we are glad to see that all of the French newcomers give this sterling composer a good place upon their programs. St. Saens is an adept at modern scoring without indulging in too much bigness, he is always intelligible, his musical architecture does not run to the crazy-quilt style and he does not discard pleasant melody. We predict that in the music of the near future tune will come back into music again, and we agree with St. Saens' own recent saying, "Music is sick"—at least at present.

We can recall performances of this work under Gericke when the music was taken too gently to portray the champion heavy-weight of Olympus. In these performances, of last Friday and yesterday, there was more of power and it fitted well to the subject. It would be easy to sketch a story to the music. Hercules is a young man, enters college and is admitted to the "Dickey" Club at Harvard because of his athletic capabilities. A lively drinking theme pictures the young hero going over the bridge to take up an extra chemistry course at the Parker house. Tinkle of triangle and cymbals picture the return (2 a. m.) heavily loaded with chemicals. In the Scherzando, which might be called "At Play," Hercules holds two horns. In the draw he gets two more and a bugle. He wins, of course, four horns against a small pair of oboes. A subsequent minor passage may portray a later interview with the dean.

Seriously, however, this symphonic poem is a portrayal of a struggle between virtue and vice, a topic which Wagner has set forth with tremendously greater power in the "Tannhaeuser Overture." M. Rabaud exhibited commendable abandon in this work and had the elasticity required by its rhapsodical character. The piccolo did some good work in the "Path of Pleasure" portion; vice and the piccolo always go hand in hand; and there were also some stirring climaxes, of which the conductor made the most.

The concert ended with Rimski-Korsakoff. By the way, a pupil of this composer once told the present writer that he always accented the next to last syllable of his name, which is against the statement of the musical dictionaries. The caprice is a good deal more truly Spanish than the recent Spanish concert of M. Laparra was. Extremes meet, and the Russians and Scandinavians seem to catch up the Spanish swing readily. Not only are the Spanish rhythms well carried out, but there is a piquancy in the scoring that gives an agreeable and fitting spiciness to the subject. The work contains some fine obbligato work for solo violin, clarinette and for harp, and these were especially well done. The reading of the caprice was commendable, and M. Rabaud caught up its spirit finely. We enjoy this caprice more thoroughly with repeated hearings. Its spicy contrasts, its rhythmic dance effects, and its theatrical climaxes are all calculated to arouse the public and certainly did so on this occasion.

Altogether then, M. Rabaud has made a very successful debut. He is graphic and decisive in his beat and gestures, has sufficient freedom in his interpretation, is by no means as operatic in orchestral work as we had feared, and evidently has correct ideas about the length of the program. A good acquisition with which musical Boston may be heartily satisfied.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The fourth pair of Symphony concerts, which will be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, presents a program of unusual beauty and interest and a soloist who ranks among the most popular artists that visited Boston. This is Madame Olga Samaroff, the pianist. Her playing is even more brilliant today than it ever has been in the past. She will play Grieg's concerto in A minor. The opening number of the program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony. The closing number will be the "Organ" symphony of Saint Saens with Alber Snow as organist.

HERALD NOVEMBER 2

The program of the Symphony concerts this week is as follows: Schubert, Unfinished Symphony; Grieg, piano concerto (Mme. Samaroff, pianist); Saint-Saens Symphony in C minor No. 3 (with organ; Mr. Snow organist.) The program for Nov. 29-30 will include these pieces: Weber, overture to "Euryanthe"; Mozart, "Jupiter" Symphony; Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Borodin, Symphony No. 2.

HERALD
New York City

HENRI RABAUD'S CAREER IN BOSTON STARTS FAVORABLY

New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Reveals Abilities and Characteristics.

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

BOSTON, Mass., Sunday.—Having come to Boston especially for that purpose, I heard Mr. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conduct his first evening concert on Saturday night and was impressed by both the man and his art.

Mr. Rabaud has distinguished and distinctive personality; at once forcible and charming. Tall and slight, looking perhaps more than his years—he was born in 1873—he is dignified even to primness in pose and gesture, looking more like a diplomatists that a conductor; not at all the man in appearance whom one might expect to have written "Marouf" until one talks to him and notes the genial half humorous twinkle in his eye; altogether a kindly man, methinks. As a conductor Mr. Rabaud has a firm, clear swinging beat, with the evident knowledge, experience and fixity of purpose to know exactly what he wants, and all the authority and energy and force necessary to obtain it.

All these qualities and characteristics were well in evidence on Saturday, as in one short week of control Mr. Rabaud has pulled the orchestra together and restored to them a noticeable measure of their former unity of tone and artistic purpose. This fact surely speaks for itself.

Three Composers Represented.

The programme I heard was commendably brief and also varied and comprised Beethoven's "Erocia" symphony, Saint-Saën's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and the "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; a programme, as I thought, giving good indications of the trend of Mr. Rabaud's musical thought and his general attitude toward the classic, the romantic and the very modern in music.

And as between the classic and the modern he draws the line pretty sharply. For after his reading of the "Eroica," sanely classic, considered and consistent; martial, vigorous, and insistently brilliant; rather brusque in climax and a little too classically dry and unplastic where the composer meant to be romantic, it was evident that to Mr. Rabaud, Beethoven was the last of the great classicists, rather than, as I firmly believe, the first of the great romantics. It is unnecessary to particularize about the interpretation of the four movements, for all were read in entire consonance with the conductor's general scheme, but I must say that martial fervor, as in the "funeral march," but poorly replaced the mournful pathos which to my thinking ought to make this wonderful bit of inspiration a wail of the dead and vanquished. On the whole a Napoleonic reading of this mighty work, and generally effective and acceptable as such.

His Saint-Saens Romance.

Mr. Rabaud, however, allowed his Saint-Saëns to be romantic at will, without let or hindrance; and read this tone poem—the least striking, as I feel, of the four—with much color and imagination. And imagination, vivid, fervid, rather intellectual perhaps, than deeply emotional or sentiment, is certainly one of Mr. Rabaud's artistic assets and characteristics.

The composer of "Marouf" fairly revelled in the modernity and orchestral color and extravagance of Rimsky-Korsakoff—I feel that much inspiration has been derived from this source—and fairly pulled along his orchestra to a rendition of this gorgeous work so efficient and so brilliant that it recalled pleasurably former orchestral days when the orchestra stood supreme.

I think that New York will understand, like and approve of Mr. Rabaud as an orchestral conductor of marked force and individuality. Boston has so far given him cordial recognition and a respectful attention which bids fair to develop, and that soon, into entire adoption and affection.

NEW YORK HERALD, NOVEMBER 18,

HENRI RABAUD'S CAREER IN BOSTON STARTS FAVORABLY

New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Reveals Abilities and Characteristics.

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

BOSTON, Mass., Sunday.—Having come to Boston especially for that purpose, I heard Mr. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conduct his first evening concert on Saturday night and was impressed by both the man and his art.

Mr. Rabaud has distinguished and distinctive personality; at once forcible and charming. Tall and slight, looking perhaps more than his years—he is dignified even to primness in pose and gesture, looking more like a diplomatists that a conductor; not at all the man in appearance whom one might expect to have written "Marouf" until one talks to him and notes the genial half humorous twinkle in his eye; altogether a kindly man, methinks. As a conductor Mr. Rabaud has a firm, clear swinging beat, with the evident knowledge, experience and fixity of purpose to know exactly what he wants, and all the authority and energy and force necessary to obtain it.

All these qualities and characteristics were well in evidence on Saturday, as in one short week of control Mr. Rabaud has pulled the orchestra together and restored to them a noticeable measure of their former unity of tone and artistic purpose. This fact surely speaks for itself.

Three Composers Represented.

The programme I heard was commendably brief and also varied and comprised Beethoven's "Erocia" symphony, Saint-Saën's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and the "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; a programme, as I thought, giving good indications of the trend of Mr. Rabaud's musical thought and his general attitude toward the classic, the romantic and the very modern in music.

And as between the classic and the modern he draws the line pretty sharply. For after his reading of the "Eroica," sanely classic, considered and consistent; martial, vigorous, and insistently brilliant; rather brusque in climax and a little too classically dry and unplastic where the composer meant to be romantic, it was evident that to Mr. Rabaud, Beethoven was the last of the great classicists, rather than, as I firmly believe, the first of the great romantics. It is unnecessary to particularize about the interpretation of the four movements, for all were read in entire consonance with the conductor's general scheme, but I must say that martial fervor, as in the "funeral march," but poorly replaced the mournful pathos which to my thinking ought to make this wonderful bit of inspiration a wail of the dead and vanquished. On the whole a Napoleonic reading of this mighty work, and generally effective and acceptable as such.

His Saint-Saens Romance.

Mr. Rabaud, however, allowed his Saint-Saëns to be romantic at will, without let or hindrance; and read this tone poem—the least striking, as I feel, of the four—with much color and imagination. And imagination, vivid, fervid, rather intellectual perhaps, than deeply emotional or sentiment, is certainly one of Mr. Rabaud's artistic assets and characteristics.

The composer of "Marouf" fairly revelled in the modernity and orchestral color and extravagance of Rimsky-Korsakoff—I feel that much inspiration has been derived from this source—and fairly pulled along his orchestra to a rendition of this gorgeous work so efficient and so brilliant that it recalled pleasurably former orchestral days when the orchestra stood supreme.

I think that New York will understand, like and approve of Mr. Rabaud as an orchestral conductor of marked force and individuality. Boston has so far given him cordial recognition and a respectful attention which bids fair to develop, and that soon, into entire adoption and affection.

From
Address Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 10 1918

POLITICS, war news, visits and anticipated visits from dignitaries from foreign lands, important but small dinner parties, weddings, engagements and intended debuts all had their place in the social melange of the past week, and gave to society its usual meed of interest. And as for music, such rare treats have seldom or never been confined to the period of a few days. The Boston Symphony, which holds its special place in the hearts of all music lovers, would ordinarily have formed a well rounded week in that line, but when added to it were La Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris and the wonderful program from Mme. Schumann-Heink on the Treasury steps, then, indeed, must Washington folk congratulate themselves on riches and blessing abundance.

Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 2 1918

48

FLORENCE EASTON,
Prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on November eighth.

Boston Symphony's First Brooklyn Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its concerts in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November eighth, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Institute of Arts and Sciences. This first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the brilliant French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is making the first autumn tour with the orchestra through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza. Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, is in America, but will not begin his work until Monday, November eleventh, when he holds his first rehearsal in Boston. The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House. Madame Easton is not unknown in Brooklyn, where her beauty of voice, soundness of musicianship and charm of personality are justly admired. Madame Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the canzona "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of "Lia" from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Mr. Monteux has arranged a most interesting list of works for the orchestra. César Franck's Symphony in D minor, one of the noblest contributions of contemporary music, will be the first and longest number. The other works to be played will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's extraordinarily brilliant and subversive variations, entitled "Istar," and Debussy's kaleidoscopic "Iberia."

Press HERALD Washington, D. C.

ENTHUSIASTIC CROWD WELCOMES ORCHESTRA

Initial Concert of Boston Symphony Success at National.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Washington concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon to an enthusiastic audience. It was made doubly enjoyable by reason of being the first musical event since the theaters were closed because of the influenza, and the first local appearance of the orchestra under the leadership of Henri Rabaud, who succeeded Dr. Karl Muck as conductor. Mr. Rabaud was unable to accompany th e orchestra to Washington, however, and Pierre Monteux, from the Metropolitan Opera House, in New York, conducted.

The opening number, Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, D minor, was well received, the first and third movements, Allegro and Largo being especially noteworthy for the solo work of the violins. Loeffler's "Une Bonne Chanson," a paraphrase of the poem by Paul Verlaine, was given a beautiful interpretation. The symphony was that of Ceasr Franck, in D minor, about which such a controversy raged at the time of its first performance in 1899. As interpreted by Mr. Monteux its status was established for all time with Washington music patrons.

The soloist was Florence Easton, soprano, who charmed by her rendition of the recitative "E Susanna non vein," and the "Aria Dove Sono," both from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and aria of Lia from Debussy's opera, "The Infant's Prodigy."

Press BULLETIN Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux Conducts Opening Concert, with Florence Easton Soloist

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-fourth season in Philadelphia took place at the Academy of Music last evening, with Pierre Monteux as a new and temporary conductor, serving until the arrival from France of Henri Rabaud, who is to assume the post as a permanent successor to Karl Muck. As the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mr. Monteux has several times appeared in Philadelphia, but last evening was the first occasion on which he has held the baton here purely as an orchestral leader.

There are many new players in the Boston organization this season, but during the weeks that he has had it in hand for rehearsals Mr. Monteux has succeeded in welding together the old men and the new into a homogeneous body which, in some respects, may be pronounced even finer than in former seasons. This fact particularly is noticeable in the elasticity and vibrant quality of the strings, always, however, a noticeable beauty of this great orchestra.

Mr. Monteux makes free use of his arms, though with no extravagance of gesture, and modesty marks a demeanor which indicates no desire for self-glorification. His work blends sympathetically and artistically into that of the orchestra, so that he seems a part of the admirable whole, rather than a conspicuous personality.

The program was opened with the Franck Symphony in D minor, a noble work, of rich tonal beauty, revealed in a wealth of instrumental detail, at once poetic and dramatic. At times the music is that of one inspired, less satisfactory, as to the manner of its interpretation, last evening, in the opening lento movement than in the allegretto, with its delightful pizzicato strains, and the closing allegro, which disclosed in brilliant style the best qualities of the orchestra.

Except for the somewhat uninteresting "Manfred" overture of Schuman, the program had a distinctly modern tinge. It included the fantastic "La Peri—Poeme Danse" ballet music of Dukas, given here the first time—and most felicitously done—and the characteristic "Iberia" of Debussy, in the well-known picturesque and impressionatic vein of the much-imitated French composer.

There was evidently much pleasure on the part of the audience in welcoming Miss Easton, whose appearances here in opera have established her as a favorite. Her clear, sympathetic soprano, of unusual beauty in quality and in its power of dramatic expression, was heard in Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and aria of Lia, from "L'Enfant Prodigue," Debussy, the latter disclosing her decidedly to the best advantage.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, NOVEMBER 17,

Rabaud's Debut in Symphony a Success

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven—Heroic Symphony.
St. Saens—"Youth of Hercules," Symphonic Poem.
Rimski-Korsakoff—Spanish Caprice.

NOT a very remarkable program for our orchestral series. Can it be that M. Rabaud, the new conductor, thinks us provincial compared with Paris? But each one of the new Frenchmen, Monteux, Messager and Rabaud, have played Beethoven as their trump card at each of their debuts, and, therefore, it is possible that they assume the interpretation of this master to be the touchstone of directorial ability.

And Beethoven's Heroic Symphony fits well to the present times, for it was the composer's cry for Liberty, and he pictures his hero, in the first movement, as pulling down all kinds of tyrants, and M. Rabaud demolished them with sufficient emphasis. The new conductor was received with the wildest Boston enthusiasm, and those who think the Boston audiences frigid ought to attend the orchestral concerts this season.

M. Rabaud began well. He made an excellent impression at this concert. Even "The Star Spangled Banner" went more broadly and less sentimentally than it has recently been done, and, by the way, the removal of that banner from the middle of the hall was an acoustical necessity. The resonance is better with the flag placed against a wall.

M. Rabaud read the Heroic symphony in a sensible, well-balanced and unaffected manner. This was very evident in the first movement. The Funeral March, no matter how well interpreted, is too long. Beethoven was altogether too prolix in the planting of his hero, but thanks to the conservative conductor there was no sentimentality exhibited in the movement, and the oboe playing was especially exquisite. Coleridge called this "A funeral in purple," and that best describes its earnest vein. The horns did good work in the next movement, and the final variations were given with superb ensemble. M. Rabaud was applauded to the echo after this excellent reading of a great work.

St. Saens' views about Hercules as a young man have not led to his greatest music, but we are glad to see that all of the French newcomers give this sterling composer a good place upon their programs. St. Saens is an adept at modern scoring without indulging in too much bigness, he is always intelligible, his musical architecture does not run to the crazy-quilt style and he does not discard pleasant melody. We predict that in the music of the near future tune will come back into music again, and we agree with St. Saens' own recent saying, "Music is sick"—at least at present.

We can recall performances of this work under Gericke when the music was taken too gently to portray the champion heavy-weight of Olympus. In these performances, of last Friday and yesterday, there was more of power and it fitted well to the subject. It would be easy to sketch a story to the music. Hercules is a young man, enters college and is admitted to the "Dickey" Club at Harvard because of his athletic capabilities. A lively drinking theme pictures the young hero going over the bridge to take up an extra chemistry course at the Parker house. Tinkle of triangle and cymbals picture the return (2 a. m.) heavily loaded with chemicals. In the Scherzando, which might be called "At Play," Hercules holds two horns. In the draw he gets two more and a bugle. He wins, of course, four horns against a small pair of oboes. A subsequent minor passage may portray a later interview with the dean.

Seriously, however, this symphonic poem is a portrayal of a struggle between virtue and vice, a topic which Wagner has set forth with tremendously greater power in the "Tannhaeuser Overture." M. Rabaud exhibited commendable abandon in this work and had the elasticity required by its rhapsodical character. The piccolo did some good work in the "Path of Pleasure" portion; vice and the piccolo always go hand in hand; and there were also some stirring climaxes, of which the conductor made the most.

The concert ended with Rimski-Korsakoff. By the way, a pupil of this composer once told the present writer that he always accented the next to last syllable of his name, which is against the statement of the musical dictionaries. The caprice is a good deal more truly Spanish than the recent Spanish concert of M. Laparra was. Extremes meet, and the Russians and Scandinavians seem to catch up the Spanish swing readily. Not only are the Spanish rhythms well carried out, but there is a piquancy in the scoring that gives an agreeable and fitting spiciness to the subject. The work contains some fine obbligato work for solo violin, clarinette and for harp, and these were especially well done. The reading of the caprice was commendable, and M. Rabaud caught up its spirit finely. We enjoy this caprice more thoroughly with repeated hearings. Its spicy contrasts, its rhythmic dance effects, and its theatrical climaxes are all calculated to arouse the public and certainly did so on this occasion.

Altogether then, M. Rabaud has made a very successful debut. He is graphic and decisive in his beat and gestures, has sufficient freedom in his interpretation, is by no means as operatic in orchestral work as we had feared, and evidently has correct ideas about the length of the program. A good acquisition with which musical Boston may be heartily satisfied.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The fourth pair of Symphony concerts, which will be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, presents a program of unusual beauty and interest and a soloist who ranks among the most popular artists that visited Boston. This is Madame Olga Samaroff, the pianist. Her playing is even more brilliant today than it ever has been in the past. She will play Grieg's concerto in A minor. The opening number of the program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony. The closing number will be the "Organ" symphony of Saint Saens with Alber Snow as organist.

HERALD, NOVEMBER 2

The program of the Symphony concerts this week is as follows: Schubert, Unfinished Symphony; Grieg, piano concerto (Mme. Samaroff, pianist); Saint-Saens Symphony in C minor No. 3 (with organ; Mr. Snow organist.) The program for Nov. 29-30 will include these pieces: Weber, overture to "Euryanthe"; Mozart, "Jupiter" Symphony; Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Borodin, Symphony No. 2.

NEW YORK HERALD, NOVEMBER 18,

HENRI RABAUD'S CAREER IN BOSTON STARTS FAVORABLY

New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Reveals Abilities and Characteristics.

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

BOSTON, Mass., Sunday.—Having come to Boston especially for that purpose, I heard Mr. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conduct his first evening concert on Saturday night and was impressed by both the man and his art.

Mr. Rabaud has distinguished and distinctive personality; at once forcible and charming. Tall and slight, looking perhaps more than his years—he was born in 1873—he is dignified even to primness in pose and gesture, looking more like a diplomatists that a conductor; not at all the man in appearance whom one might expect to have written "Marouf" until one talks to him and notes the genial half humorous twinkle in his eye; altogether a kindly man, methinks. As a conductor Mr. Rabaud has a firm, clear swinging beat, with the evident knowledge, experience and fixity of purpose to know exactly what he wants, and all the authority and energy and force necessary to obtain it.

All these qualities and characteristics were well in evidence on Saturday, as in one short week of control Mr. Rabaud has pulled the orchestra together and restored to them a noticeable measure of their former unity of tone and artistic purpose. This fact surely speaks for itself.

Three Composers Represented.

The programme I heard was commendably brief and also varied and comprised Beethoven's "Erocia" symphony, Saint-Saën's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and the "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; a programme, as I thought, giving good indications of the trend of Mr. Rabaud's musical thought and his general attitude toward the classic, the romantic and the very modern in music.

And as between the classic and the modern he draws the line pretty sharply. For after his reading of the "Eroica," sanely classic, considered and consistent; martial, vigorous, and insistently brilliant; rather brusque in climax and a little too classically dry and unplastic where the composer meant to be romantic, it was evident that to Mr. Rabaud, Beethoven was the last of the great classicists, rather than, as I firmly believe, the first of the great romantics. It is unnecessary to particularize about the interpretation of the four movements, for all were read in entire consonance with the conductor's general scheme, but I must say that martial fervor, as in the "funeral march," but poorly replaced the mournful pathos which to my thinking ought to make this wonderful bit of inspiration a wail of the dead and vanquished. On the whole a Napoleonic reading of this mighty work, and generally effective and acceptable as such.

His Saint-Saens Romance.

Mr. Rabaud, however, allowed his Saint-Saëns to be romantic at will, without let or hindrance; and read this tone poem—the least striking, as I feel, of the four—with much color and imagination. And imagination, vivid, fervid, rather intellectual perhaps, than deeply emotional or sentiment, is certainly one of Mr. Rabaud's artistic assets and characteristics.

The composer of "Marouf" fairly revelled in the modernity and orchestral color and extravagance of Rimsky-Korsakoff—I feel that much inspiration has been derived from this source—and fairly pulled along his orchestra to a rendition of this gorgeous work so efficient and so brilliant that it recalled pleasurably former orchestral days when the orchestra stood supreme.

I think that New York will understand, like and approve of Mr. Rabaud as an orchestral conductor of marked force and individuality. Boston has so far given him cordial recognition and a respectful attention which bids fair to develop, and that soon, into entire adoption and affection.

HERALD

New York City

HENRI RABAUD'S CAREER IN BOSTON STARTS FAVORABLY

New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Reveals Abilities and Characteristics.

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

BOSTON, Mass., Sunday.—Having come to Boston especially for that purpose, I heard Mr. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conduct his first evening concert on Saturday night and was impressed by both the man and his art.

Mr. Rabaud has distinguished and distinctive personality; at once forcible and charming. Tall and slight, looking perhaps more than his years—he was born in 1873—he is dignified even to primness in pose and gesture, looking more like a diplomatists that a conductor; not at all the man in appearance whom one might expect to have written "Marouf" until one talks to him and notes the genial half humorous twinkle in his eye; altogether a kindly man, methinks. As a conductor Mr. Rabaud has a firm, clear swinging beat, with the evident knowledge, experience and fixity of purpose to know exactly what he wants, and all the authority and energy and force necessary to obtain it.

All these qualities and characteristics were well in evidence on Saturday, as in one short week of control Mr. Rabaud has pulled the orchestra together and restored to them a noticeable measure of their former unity of tone and artistic purpose. This fact surely speaks for itself.

Three Composers Represented.

The programme I heard was commendably brief and also varied and comprised Beethoven's "Erocia" symphony, Saint-Saën's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and the "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; a programme, as I thought, giving good indications of the trend of Mr. Rabaud's musical thought and his general attitude toward the classic, the romantic and the very modern in music.

And as between the classic and the modern he draws the line pretty sharply. For after his reading of the "Eroica," sanely classic, considered and consistent; martial, vigorous, and insistently brilliant; rather brusque in climax and a little too classically dry and unplastic where the composer meant to be romantic, it was evident that to Mr. Rabaud, Beethoven was the last of the great classicists, rather than, as I firmly believe, the first of the great romantics. It is unnecessary to particularize about the interpretation of the four movements, for all were read in entire consonance with the conductor's general scheme, but I must say that martial fervor, as in the "funeral march," but poorly replaced the mournful pathos which to my thinking ought to make this wonderful bit of inspiration a wail of the dead and vanquished. On the whole a Napoleonic reading of this mighty work, and generally effective and acceptable as such.

His Saint-Saens Romance.

Mr. Rabaud, however, allowed his Saint-Saëns to be romantic at will, without let or hindrance; and read this tone poem—the least striking, as I feel, of the four—with much color and imagination. And imagination, vivid, fervid, rather intellectual perhaps, than deeply emotional or sentiment, is certainly one of Mr. Rabaud's artistic assets and characteristics.

The composer of "Marouf" fairly revelled in the modernity and orchestral color and extravagance of Rimsky-Korsakoff—I feel that much inspiration has been derived from this source—and fairly pulled along his orchestra to a rendition of this gorgeous work so efficient and so brilliant that it recalled pleasurably former orchestral days when the orchestra stood supreme.

I think that New York will understand, like and approve of Mr. Rabaud as an orchestral conductor of marked force and individuality. Boston has so far given him cordial recognition and a respectful attention which bids fair to develop, and that soon, into entire adoption and affection.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

POLITICS, war news, visits and anticipated visits from dignitaries from foreign lands, important but small dinner parties, weddings, engagements and intended debuts all had their place in the social melange of the past week, and gave to society its usual meed of interest. And as for music, such rare treats have seldom or never been confined to the period of a few days. The Boston Symphony, which holds its special place in the hearts of all music lovers, would ordinarily have formed a well rounded week in that line, but when added to it were La Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris and the wonderful program from Mme. Schumann-Heink on the Treasury steps, then, indeed, must Washington folk congratulate themselves on riches and blessing abundance.

Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 2 1918

FLORENCE EASTON,
Prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on November eighth.

Boston Symphony's First Brooklyn Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its concerts in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November eighth, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Institute of Arts and Sciences. This first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the brilliant French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is making the first autumn tour with the orchestra through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza. Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, is in America, but will not begin his work until Monday, November eleventh, when he holds his first rehearsal in Boston. The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House. Madame Easton is not unknown in Brooklyn, where her beauty of voice, soundness of musicianship and charm of personality are justly admired. Madame Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the canzona "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of "Lia" from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Mr. Monteux has arranged a most interesting list of works for the orchestra. César Franck's Symphony in D minor, one of the noblest contributions of contemporary music, will be the first and longest number. The other works to be played will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's extraordinarily brilliant and subversive variations, entitled "Istar," and Debussy's kaleidoscopic "Iberia."

HERALD
Washington, D. C.

ENTHUSIASTIC CROWD WELCOMES ORCHESTRA

Initial Concert of Boston Symphony Success at National.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Washington concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon to an enthusiastic audience. It was made doubly enjoyable by reason of being the first musical event since the theaters were closed because of the influenza, and the first local appearance of the orchestra under the leadership of Henri Rabaud, who succeeded Dr. Karl Muck as conductor. Mr. Rabaud was unable to accompany th e orchestra to Washington, however, and Pierre Monteux, from the Metropolitan Opera House, in New York, conducted.

The opening number, Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, D minor, was well received, the first and third movements, Allegro and Largo being especially noteworthy for the solo work of the violins. Loeffler's "Une Bonne Chanson," a paraphrase of the poem by Paul Verlaine, was given a beautiful interpretation. The symphony was that of Ceasr Franck, in D minor, about which such a controversy raged at the time of its first performance in 1899. As interpreted by Mr. Monteux its status was established for all time with Washington music patrons.

The soloist was Florence Easton, soprano, who charmed by her rendition of the recitative "E Susanna non vein," and the "Aria Dove Sono," both from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and aria of Lia from Debussy's opera, "The Infant's Prodigy."

BULLETIN
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux Conducts Opening Concert, with Florence Easton Soloist

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-fourth season in Philadelphia took place at the Academy of Music last evening, with Pierre Monteux as a new and temporary conductor, serving until the arrival from France of Henri Rabaud, who is to assume the post as a permanent successor to Karl Muck. As the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mr. Monteux has several times appeared in Philadelphia, but last evening was the first occasion on which he has held the baton here purely as an orchestral leader.

There are many new players in the Boston organization this season, but during the weeks that he has had it in hand for rehearsals Mr. Monteux has succeeded in welding together the old men and the new into a homogeneous body which, in some respects, may be pronounced even finer than in former seasons. This fact particularly is noticeable in the elasticity and vibrant quality of the strings, always, however, a noticeable beauty of this great orchestra.

Mr. Monteux makes free use of his arms, though with no extravagance of gesture, and modesty marks a demeanor which indicates no desire for self-glorification. His work blends sympathetically and artistically into that of the orchestra, so that he seems a part of the admirable whole, rather than a conspicuous personality.

The program was opened with the Franck Symphony in D minor, a noble work, of rich tonal beauty, revealed in a wealth of instrumental detail, at once poetic and dramatic. At times the music is that of one inspired, less satisfactory, as to the manner of its interpretation, last evening, in the opening lento movement than in the allegretto, with its delightful pizzicato strains, and the closing allegro, which disclosed in brilliant style the best qualities of the orchestra.

Except for the somewhat uninteresting "Manfred" overture of Schuman, the program had a distinctly modern tinge. It included the fantastic "La Peri—Poeme Danse" ballet music of Dukas, given here the first time—and most felicitously done—and the characteristic "Iberia" of Debussy, in the well-known picturesque and impressionatic vein of the much-imitated French composer.

There was evidently much pleasure on the part of the audience in welcoming Miss Easton, whose appearances here in opera have established her as a favorite. Her clear, sympathetic soprano, of unusual beauty in quality and in its power of dramatic expression, was heard in Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and aria of Lia, from "L'Enfant Prodigue," Debussy, the latter disclosing her decidedly to the best advantage.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, NOVEMBER 17,

Rabaud's Debut in Symphony a Success

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven—Heroic Symphony.
St. Saens—"Youth of Hercules," Symphonic Poem.
Rimski-Korsakoff—Spanish Caprice.

NOT a very remarkable program for our orchestral series. Can it be that M. Rabaud, the new conductor, thinks us provincial compared with Paris? But each one of the new Frenchmen, Monteux, Messager and Rabaud, have played Beethoven as their trump card at each of their debuts, and, therefore, it is possible that they assume the interpretation of this master to be the touchstone of directorial ability.

And Beethoven's Heroic Symphony fits well to the present times, for it was the composer's cry for Liberty, and he pictures his hero, in the first movement, as pulling down all kinds of tyrants, and M. Rabaud demolished them with sufficient emphasis. The new conductor was received with the wildest Boston enthusiasm, and those who think the Boston audiences frigid ought to attend the orchestral concerts this season.

M. Rabaud began well. He made an excellent impression at this concert. Even "The Star Spangled Banner" went more broadly and less sentimentally than it has recently been done, and, by the way, the removal of that banner from the middle of the hall was an acoustical necessity. The resonance is better with the flag placed against a wall.

M. Rabaud read the Heroic symphony in a sensible, well-balanced and unaffected manner. This was very evident in the first movement. The Funeral March, no matter how well interpreted, is too long. Beethoven was altogether too prolix in the planting of his hero, but thanks to the conservative conductor there was no sentimentality exhibited in the movement, and the oboe playing was especially exquisite. Coleridge called this "A funeral in purple," and that best describes its earnest vein. The horns did good work in the next movement, and the final variations were given with superb ensemble. M. Rabaud was applauded to the echo after this excellent reading of a great work.

St. Saens' views about Hercules as a young man have not led to his greatest music, but we are glad to see that all of the French newcomers give this sterling composer a good place upon their programs. St. Saens is an adept at modern scoring without indulging in too much bigness, he is always intelligible, his musical architecture does not run to the crazy-quilt style and he does not discard pleasant melody. We predict that in the music of the near future tune will come back into music again, and we agree with St. Saens' own recent saying, "Music is sick"—at least at present.

We can recall performances of this work under Gericke when the music was taken too gently to portray the champion heavy-weight of Olympus. In these performances, of last Friday and yesterday, there was more of power and it fitted well to the subject. It would be easy to sketch a story to the music. Hercules is a young man, enters college and is admitted to the "Dickey" Club at Harvard because of his athletic capabilities. A lively drinking theme pictures the young hero going over the bridge to take up an extra chemistry course at the Parker house. Tinkle of triangle and cymbals picture the return (2 a. m.) heavily loaded with chemicals. In the Scherzando, which might be called "At Play," Hercules holds two horns. In the draw he gets two more and a bugle. He wins, of course, four horns against a small pair of oboes. A subsequent minor passage may portray a later interview with the dean.

Seriously, however, this symphonic poem is a portrayal of a struggle between virtue and vice, a topic which Wagner has set forth with tremendously greater power in the "Tannhaeuser Overture." M. Rabaud exhibited commendable abandon in this work and had the elasticity required by its rhapsodical character. The piccolo did some good work in the "Path of Pleasure" portion; vice and the piccolo always go hand in hand; and there were also some stirring climaxes, of which the conductor made the most.

The concert ended with Rimski-Korsakoff. By the way, a pupil of this composer once told the present writer that he always accented the next to last syllable of his name, which is against the statement of the musical dictionaries. The caprice is a good deal more truly Spanish than the recent Spanish concert of M. Laparra was. Extremes meet, and the Russians and Scandinavians seem to catch up the Spanish swing readily. Not only are the Spanish rhythms well carried out, but there is a piquancy in the scoring that gives an agreeable and fitting spiciness to the subject. The work contains some fine obbligato work for solo violin, clarinette and for harp, and these were especially well done. The reading of the caprice was commendable, and M. Rabaud caught up its spirit finely. We enjoy this caprice more thoroughly with repeated hearings. Its spicy contrasts, its rhythmic dance effects, and its theatrical climaxes are all calculated to arouse the public and certainly did so on this occasion.

Altogether then, M. Rabaud has made a very successful debut. He is graphic and decisive in his beat and gestures, has sufficient freedom in his interpretation, is by no means as operatic in orchestral work as we had feared, and evidently has correct ideas about the length of the program. A good acquisition with which musical Boston may be heartily satisfied.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The fourth pair of Symphony concerts, which will be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, presents a program of unusual beauty and interest and a soloist who ranks among the most popular artists that visited Boston. This is Madame Olga Samaroff, the pianist. Her playing is even more brilliant today than it ever has been in the past. She will play Grieg's concerto in A minor. The opening number of the program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony. The closing number will be the "Organ" symphony of Saint Saens with Alber Snow as organist.

HERALD NOVEMBER 2

The program of the Symphony concerts this week is as follows: Schubert, Unfinished Symphony; Grieg, piano concerto (Mme. Samaroff, pianist); Saint-Saens Symphony in C minor No. 3 with organ; Mr. Snow organist.) The program for Nov. 29-30 will include these pieces: Weber, overture to "Euryanthe"; Mozart, "Jupiter" Symphony; Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Borodin, Symphony No. 2.

NEW YORK HERALD, NOVEMBER 18,

HENRI RABAUD'S CAREER IN BOSTON STARTS FAVORABLY

New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Reveals Abilities and Characteristics.

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

BOSTON, Mass., Sunday.—Having come to Boston especially for that purpose, I heard Mr. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conduct his first evening concert on Saturday night and was impressed by both the man and his art.

Mr. Rabaud has distinguished and distinctive personality; at once forcible and charming. Tall and slight, looking perhaps more than his years—he was born in 1873—he is dignified even to primness in pose and gesture, looking more like a diplomatists that a conductor; not at all the man in appearance whom one might expect to have written "Marouf" until one talks to him and notes the genial half humorous twinkle in his eye; altogether a kindly man, methinks. As a conductor Mr. Rabaud has a firm, clear swinging beat, with the evident knowledge, experience and fixity of purpose to know exactly what he wants, and all the authority and energy and force necessary to obtain it.

All these qualities and characteristics were well in evidence on Saturday, as in one short week of control Mr. Rabaud has pulled the orchestra together and restored to them a noticeable measure of their former unity of tone and artistic purpose. This fact surely speaks for itself.

Three Composers Represented.

The programme I heard was commendably brief and also varied and comprised Beethoven's "Erocia" symphony, Saint-Saën's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and the "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; a programme, as I thought, giving good indications of the trend of Mr. Rabaud's musical thought and his general attitude toward the classic, the romantic and the very modern in music.

And as between the classic and the modern he draws the line pretty sharply. For after his reading of the "Eroica," sanely classic, considered and consistent; martial, vigorous, and insistently brilliant; rather brusque in climax and a little too classically dry and unplastic where the composer meant to be romantic, it was evident that to Mr. Rabaud, Beethoven was the last of the great classicists, rather than, as I firmly believe, the first of the great romantics. It is unnecessary to particularize about the interpretation of the four movements, for all were read in entire consonance with the conductor's general scheme, but I must say that martial fervor, as in the "funeral march," but poorly replaced the mournful pathos which to my thinking ought to make this wonderful bit of inspiration a wail of the dead and vanquished. On the whole a Napoleonic reading of this mighty work, and generally effective and acceptable as such.

His Saint-Saens Romance.

Mr. Rabaud, however, allowed his Saint-Saëns to be romantic at will, without let or hindrance; and read this tone poem—the least striking, as I feel, of the four—with much color and imagination. And imagination, vivid, fervid, rather intellectual perhaps, than deeply emotional or sentiment, is certainly one of Mr. Rabaud's artistic assets and characteristics.

The composer of "Marouf" fairly revelled in the modernity and orchestral color and extravagance of Rimsky-Korsakoff—I feel that much inspiration has been derived from this source—and fairly pulled along his orchestra to a rendition of this gorgeous work so efficient and so brilliant that it recalled pleasurably former orchestral days when the orchestra stood supreme.

I think that New York will understand, like and approve of Mr. Rabaud as an orchestral conductor of marked force and individuality. Boston has so far given him cordial recognition and a respectful attention which bids fair to develop, and that soon, into entire adoption and affection.

HERALD
New York City

HENRI RABAUD'S CAREER IN BOSTON STARTS FAVORABLY

New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Reveals Abilities and Characteristics.

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

BOSTON, Mass., Sunday.—Having come to Boston especially for that purpose, I heard Mr. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conduct his first evening concert on Saturday night and was impressed by both the man and his art.

Mr. Rabaud has distinguished and distinctive personality; at once forcible and charming. Tall and slight, looking perhaps more than his years—he was born in 1873—he is dignified even to primness in pose and gesture, looking more like a diplomatists that a conductor; not at all the man in appearance whom one might expect to have written "Marouf" until one talks to him and notes the genial half humorous twinkle in his eye; altogether a kindly man, methinks. As a conductor Mr. Rabaud has a firm, clear swinging beat, with the evident knowledge, experience and fixity of purpose to know exactly what he wants, and all the authority and energy and force necessary to obtain it.

All these qualities and characteristics were well in evidence on Saturday, as in one short week of control Mr. Rabaud has pulled the orchestra together and restored to them a noticeable measure of their former unity of tone and artistic purpose. This fact surely speaks for itself.

Three Composers Represented.

The programme I heard was commendably brief and also varied and comprised Beethoven's "Erocia" symphony, Saint-Saën's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and the "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; a programme, as I thought, giving good indications of the trend of Mr. Rabaud's musical thought and his general attitude toward the classic, the romantic and the very modern in music.

And as between the classic and the modern he draws the line pretty sharply. For after his reading of the "Eroica," sanely classic, considered and consistent; martial, vigorous, and insistently brilliant; rather brusque in climax and a little too classically dry and unplastic where the composer meant to be romantic, it was evident that to Mr. Rabaud, Beethoven was the last of the great classicists, rather than, as I firmly believe, the first of the great romantics. It is unnecessary to particularize about the interpretation of the four movements, for all were read in entire consonance with the conductor's general scheme, but I must say that martial fervor, as in the "funeral march," but poorly replaced the mournful pathos which to my thinking ought to make this wonderful bit of inspiration a wail of the dead and vanquished. On the whole a Napoleonic reading of this mighty work, and generally effective and acceptable as such.

His Saint-Saens Romance.

Mr. Rabaud, however, allowed his Saint-Saëns to be romantic at will, without let or hindrance; and read this tone poem—the least striking, as I feel, of the four—with much color and imagination. And imagination, vivid, fervid, rather intellectual perhaps, than deeply emotional or sentiment, is certainly one of Mr. Rabaud's artistic assets and characteristics.

The composer of "Marouf" fairly revelled in the modernity and orchestral color and extravagance of Rimsky-Korsakoff—I feel that much inspiration has been derived from this source—and fairly pulled along his orchestra to a rendition of this gorgeous work so efficient and so brilliant that it recalled pleasurably former orchestral days when the orchestra stood supreme.

I think that New York will understand, like and approve of Mr. Rabaud as an orchestral conductor of marked force and individuality. Boston has so far given him cordial recognition and a respectful attention which bids fair to develop, and that soon, into entire adoption and affection.

From ____

Address ____

Date ____

Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 2 1918

FLORENCE EASTON,
Prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on November eighth.

Boston Symphony's First Brooklyn Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its concerts in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November eighth, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Institute of Arts and Sciences. This first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the brilliant French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is making the first autumn tour with the orchestra through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza. Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, is in America, but will not begin his work until Monday, November eleventh, when he holds his first rehearsal in Boston. The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House. Madame Easton is not unknown in Brooklyn, where her beauty of voice, soundness of musicianship and charm of personality are justly admired. Madame Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the canzona "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of "Lia" from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Mr. Monteux has arranged a most interesting list of works for the orchestra. César Franck's Symphony in D minor, one of the noblest contributions of contemporary music, will be the first and longest number. The other works to be played will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's extraordinarily brilliant and subversive variations, entitled "Istar," and Debussy's kaleidoscopic "Iberia."

HERALD
Washington, D. C.

ENTHUSIASTIC CROWD WELCOMES ORCHESTRA

Initial Concert of Boston Symphony Success at National.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Washington concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon to an enthusiastic audience. It was made doubly enjoyable by reason of being the first musical event since the theaters were closed because of the influenza, and the first local appearance of the orchestra under the leadership of Henri Rabaud, who succeeded Dr. Karl Muck as conductor. Mr. Rabaud was unable to accompany the orchestra to Washington, however, and Pierre Monteux, from the Metropolitan Opera House, in New York, conducted.

The opening number, Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, D minor, was well received, the first and third movements, Allegro and Largo being especially noteworthy for the solo work of the violins. Loeffler's "Une Bonne Chanson," a paraphrase of the poem by Paul Verlaine, was given a beautiful interpretation. The symphony was that of Ceasr Franck, in D minor, about which such a controversy raged at the time of its first performance in 1899. As interpreted by Mr. Monteux its status was established for all time with Washington music patrons.

The soloist was Florence Easton, soprano, who charmed by her rendition of the recitative "E Susanna non vein," and the "Aria Dove Sono," both from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and aria of Lia from Debussy's opera, "The Infant's Prodigy."

BULLETIN
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux Conducts Opening Concert, with Florence Easton Soloist

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-fourth season in Philadelphia took place at the Academy of Music last evening, with Pierre Monteux as a new and temporary conductor, serving until the arrival from France of Henri Rabaud, who is to assume the post as a permanent successor to Karl Muck. As the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mr. Monteux has several times appeared in Philadelphia, but last evening was the first occasion on which he has held the baton here purely as an orchestral leader.

There are many new players in the Boston organization this season, but during the weeks that he has had it in hand for rehearsals Mr. Monteux has succeeded in welding together the old men and the new into a homogeneous body which, in some respects, may be pronounced even finer than in former seasons. This fact particularly is noticeable in the elasticity and vibrant quality of the strings, always, however, a noticeable beauty of this great orchestra.

Mr. Monteux makes free use of his arms, though with no extravagance of gesture, and modesty marks a demeanor which indicates no desire for self-glorification. His work blends sympathetically and artistically into that of the orchestra, so that he seems a part of the admirable whole, rather than a conspicuous personality.

The program was opened with the Franck Symphony in D minor, a noble work, of rich tonal beauty, revealed in a wealth of instrumental detail, at once poetic and dramatic. At times the music is that of one inspired, less satisfactory, as to the manner of its interpretation, last evening, in the opening lento movement than in the allegretto, with its delightful pizzicato strains, and the closing allegro, which disclosed in brilliant style the best qualities of the orchestra.

Except for the somewhat uninteresting "Manfred" overture of Schuman, the program had a distinctly modern tinge. It included the fantastic "La Peri—Poeme Danse" ballet music of Dukas, given here the first time—and most felicitously done—and the characteristic "Iberia" of Debussy, in the well-known picturesque and impressionatic vein of the much-imitated French composer.

There was evidently much pleasure on the part of the audience in welcoming Miss Easton, whose appearances here in opera have established her as a favorite. Her clear, sympathetic soprano, of unusual beauty in quality and in its power of dramatic expression, was heard in Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and aria of Lia, from "I'Enfant Prodigue," Debussy, the latter disclosing her decidedly to the best advantage.

POLITICS, war news, visits and anticipated visits from dignitaries from foreign lands, important but small dinner parties, weddings, engagements and intended debuts all had their place in the social melange of the past week, and gave to society its usual meed of interest. And as for music, such rare treats have seldom or never been confined to the period of a few days. The Boston Symphony, which holds its special place in the hearts of all music lovers, would ordinarily have formed a well rounded week in that line, but when added to it were La Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris and the wonderful program from Mme. Schumann-Heink on the Treasury steps, then, indeed, must Washington folk congratulate themselves on riches and blessing in abundance.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Reorganized Orchestra Is Greeted at Academy by Undemonstrative Audience.

With a conductor, Pierre Monteux, borrowed for the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the year in the Academy of Music last evening. The audience which greeted the reorganized band was to all appearances the same which year after year has sat at the feet of the long line of conductors who in the past were responsible for the orchestra's premier place in the world of music. Last evening they heard a new orchestra, a new conductor—this time for the first a Frenchman—and realized that a new spirit had entered into personnel and spirit of the playing. Like all Brooklyn audiences that last evening was cautious in its applause, correct almost to coldness in its greeting of new faces, appreciative but undemonstrative, and in sharp contrast to that which greeted the orchestra the evening previous in Carnegie Hall. Last evening only one national air was played, "The Star-Spangled Banner." A few enthusiasts might have insisted upon more, but they were quickly hushed by the coldness of their fellows.

Florence Easton, soloist of the evening, sang the recitative "E Susanna non vien?" and the aria "Dove Sang," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and Lia's recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." The latter she delivered with much dramatic warmth, purity of tone and excellence of diction; but in the Mozart she was not so happy, for, while she entered fully into the spirit of the composition and revealed an intelligent grasp of the essentials of Mozart's style, she found only inadequate vocal expression for its classic and aristocratic line. For her Mr. Monteux furnished adequate accompaniments.

The purely orchestral numbers included the Franck Symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Debussy's "Iberia" (the second of his three "Images" for orchestra)—all three of which compositions had been played in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening—and D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar." It was not altogether a representative program, but one which offered sufficient variety of composition to form an accurate estimate of the capability of the new band and of the conductor. Certainly, so far as the conductor was concerned, it seemed a program devised for his especial benefit, for its works were, with one exception, of the French school, and therefore particularly ingratiating for a French musician.

While the changes in the orchestra's personnel have been many, amounting in all to 25 per cent., enough of the older members were left after the purging of the Teutonic element to maintain the prestige of the band. What changes have taken place have affected the string sections primarily. There is a new American concertmaster, Frederic Fradkin; a new viola player at the first desk, Barrier, in lieu of Ferir, departed to Philadelphia; all in all, thirty-six old members and twenty-two new ones in the strings. In the woodwinds there is a new first flutist, one new clarinettist, one new bassoon and a new bass clarinet. There are changes in the horns and trombones, but the trumpets remain the same.

All these innovating moves have resulted in new qualities. The string section shows improvement, manifesting now a richer, more lustrous tone than ever before, particularly in the case of the second violins, who at times formerly approached to dryness of utterance. The woods and brasses are weaker in spots, more reliable in others. Today's band is one of euphony of utterance, pliant and pliable; still the premier orchestra of this country, and one to delight the mind of any conductor entrusted with the joy of leading it through the intricacies of an orchestral score. It is an orchestra capable of the fullest and most fitting expression, quick to respond to intelligent and penetrative direction. Its verve, its pliancy, its range of color, its brilliancy of execution, its power to stimulate ear and imagination are as potent as ever. With proper leadership there is musically nothing it canot accomplish.

For what Mr. Monteux has accomplished in the reorganization and rehabilitation of the band, much thanks are due him, and to him must go all the credit for the preliminary rehearsing. Mr. Rabaud, permanent conductor, finds a well-organized instrument to do his bidding.

As a conductor Mr. Monteux revealed nothing new to us last evening. He has been heard here many times, both as symphonic conductor of the civic concerts two years ago and as operatic with the Metropolitan last year. Before, he had been heard frequently with the Ballet Russe. But in all that time he never disclosed any qualities of greatness, and last evening and that before in New York he revealed nothing to change our estimate formed in seasons past. There was the same lack of decisiveness of beat, resulting in much roughness in an orchestra hitherto deemed incapable thereof; unformulated plan of outline; indefinite feeling for style.

The Franck Symphony received an amiable reading, but one that lost much of value because of its indefiniteness. This is music that because of its architechtonic structure submits to the finest and clearest of chiseling on the part of conductor. It can be made a Greek temple of sound; last evening its most delicate friezes were indistinct. Mr. Monteux hurried both first and last movements to distortion of the outline; only the allegretto was eloquent of Franck's complete genius.

On the other hand, the Debussy, which calls for atmosphere, almost impalpable at times, was clear cut to a fault. There is need for rhythmic precision in its glimpses of Spain, but not to the point of exaggeration disclosed by Mr. Monteux. The Schumann was better, and the D'Indy found the conductor at his best. Yet throughout the program was pervaded with an unevenness to which, in the case of this orchestra, we are unaccustomed. While under Mr. Monteux last evening it was still the best orchestra, it was so in spite of his lapses.

TIMES
ess: Washington, D. C.
NOV 6 - 1918

MONTEUX PROVES VOLATILE LEADER

By J. MacB.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera as conductor, returned to Washington yesterday afternoon after almost a year's absence, and gave the opening orchestral concert of the season at the National Theater before a capacity audience. Florence Easton, one of the young sopranos of the Metropolitan, was the soloist.

With a marked change in the personnel of the orchestra and a French director, who came through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, replacing for this one concert the conductor of the season, Henri Rabaud, who has just reached America, this famous orchestra seemed to take on a volatile quality with more of lightness and brilliancy in its tone and something less of sonority.

Handel, Loeffler and Franck, for the orchestra, presented marked contrasts in type. The symphony was the Caesar Franck in D minor. The rich orchestral score was given with breadth, reverence, and vibrant depths in its wealth of charming melody. There was a suffused richness in the orchestral body, lyric beauty, and at times exquisite figuration in the parts.

M. Monteux uses an accented, almost a spasmodic, beat that renders his interpretations more like detached episodes, in varied orchestral effects, than a homogeneous idea. This impressed itself upon the Loeffler poeme, "La Bonne Chanson." It is vague in the modern French style of Debussy—where sustained atmosphere and imagination play so vital a part. But again it holds almost banal moments, such as the inconsequential waltz. Beautiful it was in the long descending close-interval passage that opened this idyl—or in the pastoral with its touch of "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune," showing the beauty of winds and strings.

In orchestral detail the great concerto of Handel for string orchestra rose to the greatest heights, with most effective solo work for Mr. Fradkin and Mr. Noack, solo violins; Mr. Barrier, solo viola, and Mr. Malkin, solo 'cello. The presto was exquisitely delineated in phrase and color, the voices clear and finely wrought in delicate figures, while against this the repose of the largo and its rich choral balance was gratifying and noble. Then M. Monteux made a delightful transition to the graceful minuet, giving it with a [illegible]

n SUN
ress: New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Monteux Conducts at Carnegie. in Brooklyn This Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, reorganized, rejuvenated, and with all its appendages of Teutonism removed, came to Carnegie Hall last evening in its first concert of the year. At least 25 per cent. of the players were newcomers, to fill those vacancies made by the elimination of the Germans of last year, and in the conductor's chair was Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera House, released through the courtesy of Mr. Gratti-Casazza to conduct the orchestra until such time as Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, might arrive in America. Mr. Rabaud is now here and will be heard during the next visit of the orchestra to the Metropolitan district.

Following the playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner" (in a new orchestral dress prepared by Converse), the "Marseillaise," the "Marche Reale" and "God Save the King," Mr. Monteux conducted the Franck Symphony, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," Dukas' "Le Peri; Poeme Danse" and the "Iberia: Images" of Debussy. With the exception of the Dukas composition, all will be played by the orchestra at its first Brooklyn concert in the Academy this evening. Accordingly all critical comment regarding them will be reserved until tomorrow, as will also detailed account of Mr. Monteux's conducting and the present condition of the orchestra's playing.

Paul Abraham Dukas composed the ballet "Le Peri" in 1912 and found production for it at one of the Concerts de Danse at the Chatelet in 1912. While the work has not been given with its choreographic trappings in this country, it was played by the San Francisco Orchestra under the direction of Alfred Hertz, January 7, 1916. Its first performance by the Boston Symphony was two weeks ago, at the opening Boston concert.

The ballet tells the story of Iskender's search for the flower of life, his appropriation of it from the sleeping Peri at the world's end, the Peri's dance to secure its return, and its final surrender by Iskender to the true owner. Dukas has fashioned for the story such music as can only be comprehended and fully appreciated when played as accompaniment for the choreographic action. But as heard last evening, it is not such music as will redound to its inventor's fame. In form and substance it is eclectic, not to say imitative. There are measures of Debussy, of Ravel, of Rimsky-Korsakoff, and little of the genius that shines through the pages of its composer's "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

It received at the hands of conductor and orchestra alike, a reading born undoubtedly of affection, a reading that was marked by appreciation of its choreographic meaning, and such should find full understanding at the hands of Mr. Monteux, who for so long a time was associated with the pantomimic productions of the Ballet Russe. But all the luster and radiance of tone, all the sharply defined rhythm of the orchestra could not save the work from a tediousness inherent in its pages. How it might affect the ear, if heard with the accompaning visual delight of the dance is another matter. As a concert piece it proved of little musical value.

n TIMES
ress: Washington, D. C.
NOV 6 - 1918

At Initial Concert.

The first of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater and was attended by a brilliant audience, which crowded the theater to capacity. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French ambassador, occupied a box and had members of the embassy staff with her as guests. Mme. Riano, wife of the Spanish ambassador, was a guest in Mme. Hauge's box, the others in the party being Mrs. Richard Townsend, Mrs. Henry Purdy and Mrs. Woodbury Blair. Mrs. Franklin K. Lane and Mrs. Hare Lippincott were among Mrs. Marshall Field's guests.

The Rt. Rev. Alfred Harding, bishop of Washington; Miss Harriette S. Douglas, Mrs. Craik and Miss Muriel Denys were guests of the Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and Mrs. La Salle Corbell Pickett also had boxes.

Others in the audience were the Assistant Secretary of State and Mrs. William Phillips, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Robert M. Thompson, Miss Hilda Sykes, Miss [illegible]ura Harlan, Mrs. D. Buchanan Merr[illegible]an, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Reeside, M[illegible] Victor Kauffmann and Mrs. On[illegible] Talbot.

Major and Comt[illegible]sse Jean De Re[illegible]viers of Paris wh[illegible] have spent the [illegible] are in Wash-

NEW FIRST VIOLA WINS HIS AUDIENCE

Rene Pollain Plays "Harold in Italy" at Symphony Society Concert.

MABEL GARRISON SINGS

Philharmonic Orchestra Gives Programme in Carnegie Hall in the Evening.

Two local orchestras were heard in Carnegie Hall yesterday, the Symphony Society in the afternoon and the Philharmonic in the evening. Mr. Damrosch invited the attention of his audience to the familiar "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz, which was chosen, no doubt, to enable the newly engaged first viola, M. Rene Pollain, to display his art. If so the choice was fully justified.

Not in some years has the "Harold" symphony had such a satisfactory performance. The last previous presentation rising above the common level was by the Boston Orchestra toward the close of the season of 1914-15, when Emil Ferir played the obbligato. But that performance was not as finished as yesterday's.

The Symphony Society musicians showed a transparency and richness of tone, a clear pellucid depth, a delicacy of nuance and a remarkable control of dynamics which evoked expressions of delight from music lovers. M. Pollain proved himself to be an artist of the soundest merit, equipped with a beautiful tone and a suave eloquence of delivery refreshingly congenial to all who cherish an affection for purity and repose in art.

The other orchestral numbers were Mozart's "Les Petits Riens" ballet music and the symphonic excerpt from Cesar Franck's "Redemption." The soloist was Mabel Garrison, who sang two numbers. The second was Edgar Stillman Kelley's "California Idyl," which was heard in public for the first time. A very pretty and grateful song it proved to be for any soprano with facility, a good range and taste. Miss Garrison sang it very well indeed.

The first of her numbers was Mozart's concert air, "Mia speranza adorata." If Miss Garrison had done nothing else she would have convinced her hearers that Mme. Lange, for whom the air was written, was a singer of extended scale and extraordinary command of both cantilena and floridity. Having done that the young singer should have been satisfied.

The Philharmonic Society's concert in the evening was the first of its series for the season. The programme was fragmentary in effect because it contained six numbers. These were the venerable and venerated "Meisgeneue" overture of the dean of American composers, George Whitfield Chadwick of Boston, Dvorak's G major symphony, Roger-Ducasse's symphonic poem "Sarabande," heard for the first time in this country; Sir Charles Villiers Stanford's tone poem "Verdun," produced at the Norfolk festival of last June; Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" and Tschaikowsky's "Marche Slav."

Mr. Chadwick's overture was good to hear again for the sake of its soundness. The Dvorak's work would have been more pleasing had Mr. Stransky been better acquainted with the tempi. Furthermore, the style of the orchestra was much too heavy and opaque; but there was vigor in the last movement.

The Roger-Ducasse number proved to be one of the prevailing type of mood pictures in which neither purposes nor tonalities are clear. The employment of the invisible choir was very skilful and the character of the music allotted to it went far toward the establishment of a determinable feeling of wide and melancholy spaces, just as the invisible chorus in "Pelleas et Melisande" does. The composition was excellently composed in respect of technic, particularly in the instrumentation.

Sir Charles Villiers Stanford's "Verdun" is a work of very slight texture in which fragments of "The Marseillaise" are used as the chief melodic material. The work ends with the great anthem in full orchestration. Every one stood up and there was much applause.

m POST
lress: Washington, D. C.
te NOV 6 - 1918

Mme. Jusserand, accompanied by members of the French embassy staff, occupied a box at the concert yesterday afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. Riano was the guest of Mme. Hauge, who also had as guests in her box Mrs. Richard Townsend, Mrs. Henry Purdy and Mrs. Woodbury Blair. The Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane and Mrs. Hare Lippincott were the guests of Mrs. Marshall Field. The Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys had with them in their box the bishop of Washington, the Rev. Alfred Harding; Miss Douglass, Mrs. Craik and Miss Muriel Denys. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and Mrs. La Salle Corbell Pickett also had boxes.

m EVENING TELEGRAM
lress Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

A New Conductor Makes First Appearance With Orchestra. Florence Easton the Soloist

One goes, or, rather, should go, to a concert to hear the music more than to hear the interpreter; but this condition was reversed last night at the Academy of Music. The occasion was the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia since the disruption, which resulted virtually in a reorganization of the orchestra. Intense curiosity as to what effect the changes, including the conductorship, would have brought out a large audience.

It is not going too far to say that the changes have had anything but a beneficial effect on the orchestra. How much is due to the absence of the leader of former years and how much is due to the sweeping changes in personnel is impossible to say, but there was a noticeable lack of accuracy of attack and of the balance between the choirs in the tuttis, while there were unison solo passages, especially in the second movement of the symphony, which were not strictly in tune.

It was also the first appearance in this city of Pierre Monteux as conductor of a symphony orchestra, Monsieur Monteux having been allowed to lead the orchestra by the Metropolitan Opera Company until the arrival from France of Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor. M. Monteux is no stranger to symphonic work, as he frequently conducted the famous Colonne Orchestra in Paris, but he showed his preference for the operatic style of conducting strongly by treating purely orchestral works rather as series of dramatic climaxes than as homogeneous musical entities.

The program began, of course, with the "Star Spangled Banner," the little spark from which grew so mighty a blaze in the Boston Symphony, and this was followed by the D Minor Symphony of Caesar Franck. M. Monteux conducted the entire program without scores, even the accompaniments to the soloist, which were beautifully done, and showed himself a keen analyst and a master of detail.

His interpretation of the symphony depends somewhat upon whether the work is viewed as a symphony in classic form or in the light of freer orchestral works. It was poetic to a degree and every thematic detail of the composition was brought out clearly. The introductory lento, containing the germ of the whole work, was taken at a tremendously slow tempo, and the allegros very fast, thus giving strong contrasts. Design is one of the strongest characteristics of Franck's works, notably in the reappearance of the main themes in all the movements, and every part of the web and woof of it was brought out. There was a tendency to force the volume of tone here and there in the brasses, but the interpretation was original, enjoyable and decidedly French, although some of the so-called "mysticism" of Franck was lost in the dramatic reading.

The other orchestral numbers on the program were the "Manfred" Overture of Schumann and two numbers by Dukas and Debussy. The first of the French works, a ballet, entitled "The Peri," and described as a "danced poem," is ultra-modern in orchestration, although the melodies are somewhat more coherent than the average modern orchestral work. It is by no means absolute music, although with a program and performed under the circumstances called for by the composer, it would doubtless be effective. The Debussy number was "Iberia," the second of three "images" for orchestra. Both works are difficult and employ every resource of orchestration, including the muting of almost every instrument. In both, for the same influences are shown strongly in both composers, orchestral color used in the creation of "atmosphere" is everywhere, and melodic design and fixed tonalities are almost entirely missing.

The soloist was Florence Easton, and she made an excellent impression. Her voice is not very large nor her range excessive, but she rendered two numbers as far apart in style as the poles in a splendid manner. The first was the well-known "Dove Sono" from the "Marriage of Figaro," of Mozart, and the second the exquisite aria of Lia, from Debussy's "Prodigal Son." It is hard to say in which she excelled, the very difficult simplicity and perfect vocalization required by Mozart or in the pathos and sympathy demanded by the French master. She was recalled many times after each performance.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Henri Rabaud as conductor, interest will be increased in the announcement by General Manager Gatti-Casazza that he will open the Metropolitan Opera season here on Tuesday evening, November 19, with Rabaud's spectacular opera, "Marouf." The opera had its premiere in Paris not long before the outbreak of the world war. It is sentimental, humorous, picturesque and fantastic, based on an episode in the "Arabian Nights." "Marouf" will be conducted by Rabaud's friend, Pierre Monteux, who has been directing the Boston symphonists until Rabaud's arrival. De Luca will have the title role. Frances Alda will impersonate the princess who falls in love with the cobbler, with whom she elopes, disguised as a boy.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Reorganized Orchestra Is Greeted at Academy by Undemonstrative Audience.

With a conductor, Pierre Monteux, borrowed for the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the year in the Academy of Music last evening. The audience which greeted the reorganized band was to all appearances the same which year after year has sat at the feet of the long line of conductors who in the past were responsible for the orchestra's premier place in the world of music. Last evening they heard a new orchestra, a new conductor—this time for the first a Frenchman—and realized that a new spirit had entered into personnel and spirit of the playing. Like all Brooklyn audiences that last evening was cautious in its applause, correct almost to coldness in its greeting of new faces, appreciative but undemonstrative, and in sharp contrast to that which greeted the orchestra the evening previous in Carnegie Hall. Last evening only one national air was played, "The Star-Spangled Banner." A few enthusiasts might have insisted upon more, but they were quickly hushed by the coldness of their fellows.

Florence Easton, soloist of the evening, sang the recitative "E Susanna non vien?" and the aria "Dove Sang," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and Lia's recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." The latter she delivered with much dramatic warmth, purity of tone and excellence of diction; but in the Mozart she was not so happy, for, while she entered fully into the spirit of the composition and revealed an intelligent grasp of the essentials of Mozart's style, she found only inadequate vocal expression for its classic and aristocratic line. For her Mr. Monteux furnished adequate accompaniments.

The purely orchestral numbers included the Franck Symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Debussy's "Iberia" (the second of his three "Images" for orchestra)—all three of which compositions had been played in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening—and D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar." It was not altogether a representative program, but one which offered sufficient variety of composition to form an accurate estimate of the capability of the new band and of the conductor. Certainly, so far as the conductor was concerned, it seemed a program devised for his especial benefit, for its works were, with one exception, of the French school, and therefore particularly ingratiating for a French musician.

While the changes in the orchestra's personnel have been many, amounting in all to 25 per cent., enough of the older members were left after the purging of the Teutonic element to maintain the prestige of the band. What changes have taken place have affected the string sections primarily. There is a new American concertmaster, Frederic Fradkin; a new viola player at the first desk, Barrier, in lieu of Ferir, departed to Philadelphia; all in all, thirty-six old members and twenty-two new ones in the strings. In the woodwinds there is a new first flutist, one new clarinettist, one new bassoon and a new bass clarinet. There are changes in the horns and trombones, but the trumpets remain the same.

All these innovating moves have resulted in new qualities. The string section shows improvement, manifesting now a richer, more lustrous tone than ever before, particularly in the case of the second violins, who at times formerly approached to dryness of utterance. The woods and brasses are weaker in spots, more reliable in others. Today's band is one of euphony of utterance, pliant and pliable; still the premier orchestra of this country, and one to delight the mind of any conductor entrusted with the joy of leading it through the intricacies of an orchestral score. It is an orchestra capable of the fullest and most fitting expression, quick to respond to intelligent and penetrative direction. Its verve, its pliancy, its range of color, its brilliancy of execution, its power to stimulate ear and imagination are as potent as ever. With proper leadership there is musically nothing it canot accomplish.

For what Mr. Monteux has accomplished in the reorganization and rehabilitation of the band, much thanks are due him, and to him must go all the credit for the preliminary rehearsing. Mr. Rabaud, permanent conductor, finds a well-organized instrument to do his bidding.

As a conductor Mr. Monteux revealed nothing new to us last evening. He has been heard here many times, both as symphonic conductor of the civic concerts two years ago and as operatic with the Metropolitan last year. Before, he had been heard frequently with the Ballet Russe. But in all that time he never disclosed any qualities of greatness, and last evening and that before in New York he revealed nothing to change our estimate formed in seasons past. There was the same lack of decisiveness of beat, resulting in much roughness in an orchestra hitherto deemed incapable thereof; unformulated plan of outline; indefinite feeling for style.

The Franck Symphony received an amiable reading, but one that lost much of value because of its indefiniteness. This is music that because of its architechtonic structure submits to the finest and clearest of chiseling on the part of conductor. It can be made a Greek temple of sound; last evening its most delicate friezes were indistinct. Mr. Monteux hurried both first and last movements to distortion of the outline; only the allegretto was eloquent of Franck's complete genius.

On the other hand, the Debussy, which calls for atmosphere, almost impalpable at times, was clear cut to a fault. There is need for rhythmic precision in its glimpses of Spain, but not to the point of exaggeration disclosed by Mr. Monteux. The Schumann was better, and the D'Indy found the conducter at his best. Yet throughout the program was pervaded with an unevenness to which, in the case of this orchestra, we are unaccustomed. While under Mr. Monteux last evening it was still the best orchestra, it was so in spite of his lapses.

TIMES

ess: Washington, D. C.

NOV 6 - 1918

MONTEUX PROVES VOLATILE LEADER

By J. MacB.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera as conductor, returned to Washington yesterday afternoon after almost a year's absence, and gave the opening orchestral concert of the season at the National Theater before a capacity audience. Florence Easton, one of the young sopranos of the Metropolitan, was the soloist.

With a marked change in the personnel of the orchestra and a French director, who came through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, replacing for this one concert the conductor of the season, Henri Rabaud, who has just reached America, this famous orchestra seemed to take on a volatile quality with more of lightness and brilliancy in its tone and something less of sonority.

Handel, Loeffler and Franck, for the orchestra, presented marked contrasts in type. The symphony was the Caesar Franck in D minor. The rich orchestral score was given with breadth, reverence, and vibrant depths in its wealth of charming melody. There was a suffused richness in the orchestral body, lyric beauty, and at times exquisite figuration in the parts.

M. Monteux uses an accented, almost a spasmodic, beat that renders his interpretations more like detached episodes, in varied orchestral effects, than a homogeneous idea. This impressed itself upon the Loeffler poeme, "La Bonne Chanson." It is vague in the modern French style of Debussy—where sustained atmosphere and imagination play so vital a part. But again it holds almost banal moments, such as the inconsequential waltz. Beautiful it was in the long descending close-interval passage that opened this idyl—or in the pastoral with its touch of "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune," showing the beauty of winds and strings.

In orchestral detail the great concerto of Handel for string orchestra rose to the greatest heights, with most effective solo work for Mr. Fradkin and Mr. Noack, solo violins; Mr. Barrier, solo viola, and Mr. Malkin, solo 'cello. The presto was exquisitely delineated in phrase and color, the voices clear and finely wrought in delicate figures, while against this the repose of the largo and its rich choral balance was gratifying and noble. Then M. Monteux made a delightful transition to the graceful minuet, giving it with a [illegible] suavity.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Monteux Conducts at Carnegie in Brooklyn This Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, reorganized, rejuvenated, and with all its appendages of Teutonism removed, came to Carnegie Hall last evening in its first concert of the year. At least 25 per cent. of the players were newcomers, to fill those vacancies made by the elimination of the Germans of last year, and in the conductor's chair was Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera House, released through the courtesy of Mr. Gratti-Casazza to conduct the orchestra until such time as Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, might arrive in America. Mr. Rabaud is now here and will be heard during the next visit of the orchestra to the Metropolitan district.

Following the playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner" (in a new orchestral dress prepared by Converse), the "Marseillaise," the "Marche Reale" and "God Save the King," Mr. Monteux conducted the Franck Symphony, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," Dukas' "Le Peri; Poeme Danse" and the "Iberia: Images" of Debussy. With the exception of the Dukas composition, all will be played by the orchestra at its first Brooklyn concert in the Academy this evening. Accordingly all critical comment regarding them will be reserved until tomorrow, as will also detailed account of Mr. Monteux's conducting and the present condition of the orchestra's playing.

Paul Abraham Dukas composed the ballet "Le Peri" in 1912 and found production for it at one of the Concerts de Danse at the Chatelet in 1912. While the work has not been given with its choreographic trappings in this country, it was played by the San Francisco Orchestra under the direction of Alfred Hertz, January 7, 1916. Its first performance by the Boston Symphony was two weeks ago, at the opening Boston concert.

The ballet tells the story of Iskender's search for the flower of life, his appropriation of it from the sleeping Peri at the world's end, the Peri's dance to secure its return, and its final surrender by Iskender to the true owner. Dukas has fashioned for the story such music as can only be comprehended and fully appreciated when played as accompaniment for the choreographic action. But as heard last evening, it is not such music as will redound to its inventor's fame. In form and substance it is eclectric, not to say imitative. There are measures of Debussy, of Ravel, of Rimsky-Korsakoff, and little of the genius that shines through the pages of its composer's "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

It received at the hands of conductor and orchestra alike, a reading born undoubtedly of affection, a reading that was marked by appreciation of its choreographic meaning, and such should find full understanding at the hands of Mr. Monteux, who for so long a time was associated with the pantomimic productions of the Ballet Russe. But all the luster and radiance of tone, all the sharply defined rhythm of the orchestra could not save the work from a tediousness inherent in its pages. How it might affect the ear, if heard with the accompaning visual delight of the dance is another matter. As a concert piece it proved of little musical value.

---

ington, D. C.

NOV 6 - 1918

At Initial Concert.

The first of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater and was attended by a brilliant audience, which crowded the theater to capacity. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French ambassador, occupied a box and had members of the embassy staff with her as guests. Mme. Riano, wife of the Spanish ambassador, was a guest in Mme. Hauge's box, the others in the party being Mrs. Richard Townsend, Mrs. Henry Purdy and Mrs. Woodbury Blair. Mrs. Franklin K. Lane and Mrs. Hare Lippincott were among Mrs. Marshall Field's guests.

The Rt. Rev. Alfred Harding, bishop of Washington; Miss Harriette S. Douglas, Mrs. Craik and Miss Muriel Denys were guests of the Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and Mrs. La Salle Corbell Pickett also had boxes.

Others in the audience were the Assistant Secretary of State and Mrs. William Phillips, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Robert M. Thompson, Miss Hilda Sykes, Miss Laura Harlan, Mrs. D. Buchanan Merriman, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Reeside, Mr. Victor Kauffmann and Mrs. Ont Talbot.

Major and Comtesse Jean De Reviers of Paris who have spent the [illegible] are in Wash-

---

n SUN

ress: New York City.

e

NEW FIRST VIOLA WINS HIS AUDIENCE

Rene Pollain Plays "Harold in Italy" at Symphony Society Concert.

MABEL GARRISON SINGS

Philharmonic Orchestra Gives Programme in Carnegie Hall in the Evening.

Two local orchestras were heard in Carnegie Hall yesterday, the Symphony Society in the afternoon and the Philharmonic in the evening. Mr. Damrosch invited the attention of his audience to the familiar "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz, which was chosen, no doubt, to enable the newly engaged first viola, M. Rene Pollain, to display his art. If so the choice was fully justified.

Not in some years has the "Harold" symphony had such a satisfactory performance. The last previous presentation rising above the common level was by the Boston Orchestra toward the close of the season of 1914-15, when Emil Ferir played the obbligato. But that performance was not as finished as yesterday's.

The Symphony Society musicians showed a transparency and richness of tone, a clear pellucid depth, a delicacy of nuance and a remarkable control of dynamics which evoked expressions of delight from music lovers. M. Pollain proved himself to be an artist of the soundest merit, equipped with a beautiful tone and a suave eloquence of delivery refreshingly congenial to all who cherish an affection for purity and repose in art.

The other orchestral numbers were Mozart's "Les Petits Riens" ballet music and the symphonic excerpt from Cesar Franck's "Redemption." The soloist was Mabel Garrison, who sang two numbers. The second was Edgar Stillman Kelley's "California Idyl," which was heard in public for the first time. A very pretty and grateful song it proved to be for any soprano with facility, a good range and taste. Miss Garrison sang it very well indeed.

The first of her numbers was Mozart's concert air, "Mia speranza adorata." If Miss Garrison had done nothing else she would have convinced her hearers that Mme. Lange, for whom the air was written, was a singer of extended scale and extraordinary command of both cantilena and floridity. Having done that the young singer should have been satisfied.

The Philharmonic Society's concert in the evening was the first of its series for the season. The programme was fragmentary in effect because it contained six numbers. These were the venerable and venerated "Melpomene" overture of the dean of American composers, George Whitfield Chadwick of Boston, Dvorak's G major symphony, Roger-Ducasse's symphonic poem "Sarabande," heard for the first time in this country; Sir Charles Villiers Stanford's tone poem "Verdun," produced at the Norfolk festival of last June; Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" and Tschaikowsky's "Marche Slav."

Mr. Chadwick's overture was good to hear again for the sake of its soundness. The Dvorak's work would have been more pleasing had Mr. Stransky been better acquainted with the tempi. Furthermore, the style of the orchestra was much too heavy and opaque, but there was vigor in the last movement.

The Roger-Ducasse number proved to be one of the prevailing type of mood pictures in which neither purposes nor tonalities are clear. The employment of the invisible choir was very skilful and the character of the music allotted to it went far toward the establishment of a determinable feeling of wide and melancholy spaces, just as the invisible chorus in "Pelleas et Melisande" does. The composition was excellently composed in respect of technic, particularly in the instrumentation.

Sir Charles Villiers Stanford's "Verdun" is a work of very slight texture in which fragments of "The Marseillaise" are used as the chief melodic material. The work ends with the great anthem in full orchestration. Every one stood up and there was much applause.

---

m POST

lress: Washington, D. C.

te

NOV 6 - 1918

Mme. Jusserand, accompanied by members of the French embassy staff, occupied a box at the concert yesterday afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. Riano was the guest of Mme. Hauge, who also had as guests in her box Mrs. Richard Townsend, Mrs. Henry Purdy and Mrs. Woodbury Blair. The Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane and Mrs. Hare Lippincott were the guests of Mrs. Marshall Field. The Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys had with them in their box the bishop of Washington, the Rev. Alfred Harding; Miss Douglass, Mrs. Craik and Miss Muriel Denys. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and Mrs. La Salle Corbell Pickett also had boxes.

---

m EVENING TELEGRAM

lress Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

A New Conductor Makes First Appearance With Orchestra. Florence Easton the Soloist

One goes, or, rather, should go, to a concert to hear the music more than to hear the interpreter; but this condition was reversed last night at the Academy of Music. The occasion was the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia since the disruption, which resulted virtually in a reorganization of the orchestra. Intense curiosity as to what effect the changes, including the conductorship, would have brought out a large audience.

It is not going too far to say that the changes have had anything but a beneficial effect on the orchestra. How much is due to the absence of the leader of former years and how much is due to the sweeping changes in personnel is impossible to say, but there was a noticeable lack of accuracy of attack and of the balance between the choirs in the tuttis, while there were unison solo passages, especially in the second movement of the symphony, which were not strictly in tune.

It was also the first appearance in this city of Pierre Monteux as conductor of a symphony orchestra, Monsieur Monteux having been allowed to lead the orchestra by the Metropolitan Opera Company until the arrival from France of Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor. M. Monteux is no stranger to symphonic work, as he frequently conducted the famous Colonne Orchestra in Paris, but he showed his preference for the operatic style of conducting strongly by treating purely orchestral works rather as series of dramatic climaxes than as homogeneous musical entities.

The program began, of course, with the "Star Spangled Banner," the little spark from which grew so mighty a blaze in the Boston Symphony, and this was followed by the D Minor Symphony of Caesar Franck. M. Monteux conducted the entire program without scores, even the accompaniments to the soloist, which were beautifully done, and showed himself a keen analyst and a master of detail.

His interpretation of the symphony depends somewhat upon whether the work is viewed as a symphony in classic form or in the light of freer orchestral works. It was poetic to a degree and every thematic detail of the composition was brought out clearly. The introductory lento, containing the germ of the whole work, was taken at a tremendously slow tempo, and the allegros very fast, thus giving strong contrasts. Design is one of the strongest characteristics of Franck's works, notably in the reappearance of the main themes in all the movements, and every part of the web and woof of it was brought out. There was a tendency to force the volume of tone here and there in the brasses, but the interpretation was original, enjoyable and decidedly French, although some of the so-called "mysticism" of Franck was lost in the dramatic reading.

The other orchestral numbers on the program were the "Manfred" Overture of Schumann and two numbers by Dukas and Debussy. The first of the French works, a ballet, entitled "The Peri," and described as a "danced poem," is ultra-modern in orchestration, although the melodies are somewhat more coherent than the average modern orchestral work. It is by no means absolute music, although with a program and performed under the circumstances called for by the composer, it would doubtless be effective. The Debussy number was "Iberia," the second of three "images" for orchestra. Both works are difficult and employ every resource of orchestration, including the muting of almost every instrument. In both for the same influences are shown strongly in both composers, orchestral color used in the creation of "atmosphere" is everywhere and melodic design and fixed tonalities are almost entirely missing.

The soloist was Florence Easton, and she made an excellent impression. Her voice is not very large nor her range excessive, but she rendered two numbers as far apart in style as the poles in a splendid manner. The first was the well-known "Dove Sono" from the "Marriage of Figaro," of Mozart, and the second the exquisite aria of Lia, from Debussy's "Prodigal Son." It is hard to say in which she excelled, the very difficult simplicity and perfect vocalization required by Mozart or in the pathos and sympathy demanded by the French master. She was recalled many times after each performance.

RECORD

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Henri Rabaud as conductor, interest will be increased in the announcement by General Manager Gatti-Casazza that he will open the Metropolitan Opera season here on Tuesday evening, November 19, with Rabaud's spectacular opera, "Marouf." The opera had its premiere in Paris not long before the outbreak of the world war. It is sentimental, humorous, picturesque and fantastic, based on an episode in the "Arabian Nights." "Marouf" will be conducted by Rabaud's friend, Pierre Monteux, who has been directing the Boston symphonists until Rabaud's arrival. De Luca will have the title role. Frances Alda will impersonate the princess who falls in love with the cobbler, with whom she elopes, disguised as a boy.

50

...ew York City

...ONY ...TS SEASON

Makes First Orchestra. ...he Soloist

...uld go, to a con-...re than to hear ...ndition was re-...ademy of Music. ... concert of the ...in Philadelphia ... resulted virtu-... the orchestra. ...at effect the ...ctorship, would ...udience. ... say that the ...ut a beneficial ...y much is due ...f former years ...weeping changes ... say, but there ...curacy of attack ...the choirs in the ...nison solo pas-...ond movement of ...e not strictly in ...ppearance in this ...conductor of a ...nsieur Monteux ... the orchestra ... Company until ... Henri Rabaud, ... M. Monteux ...work, as he fre-...amous Colonne ...owed his pref-...le of conducting ...orchestral works ...tic climaxes than ...ities. ...course, with the ... the little spark ...y a blaze in the ...was followed by ...aesar Franck. M. ...e program with-...animents to the ...ully done, and ...st and a master ... symphony de-...her the work is ...lassic form or in ... works. It was ... thematic detail ...ought out clearly. ...taining the germ ...ten at a tremen-...the allegros very ...trasts. Design is ...haracteristics of ...the reappearance ...l the movements, ...b and woof of it ...as a tendency to ...ere and there in ...etation was orig-...dly French, al-...d "mysticism" of ...matic reading. ...bers on the pro-... Overture of Schu-... Dukas and De-...ench works, a bal-...d described as a ...modern in orches-...les are somewhat ...verage modern or-...no means absolute ...program and per-...tances called for ...d doubtless be ef-...ber was "Iberia." ...es" for orchestra. ...and employ every ...n, including the ...trument. In both, ...are shown strongly ...tral color used in ...ere" is everywhere, ...fixed tonalities are ...ce Easton, and she ...sion. Her voice is ...ange excessive, but ...s as far apart in ...lendid manner. The ... "Dove Sono" from ...of Mozart, and the ... of Lia, from De-...t is hard to say in ...very difficult sim-...lization required by ... and sympathy de-...master. She was ...each performance

...a, Pa.

...0 1918

... Boston Symphony ...ed the services of ...conductor, interest ... the announcement ... Gatti-Casazza that ...Metropolitan Opera ...sday evening, No-...baud's spectacular ...he opera had its ...t long before the ... war. It is senti-...turesque and fan-... episode in the ...Marouf" will be ...d's friend, Pierre ...een directing the ...until Rabaud's ar-...ave the title role. ... impersonate the ...ove with the cob-... elopes, disguised

PHILADELPHIA PRESS
OCTOBER 13,

Music.

Monteux Conducts d'Indy and Beethoven.

The second local concert of the Bos-...n Symphony Orchestra, led by ...ierre Monteux, took place in Car-...negie Hall Saturday afternoon. To-...day Mr. Monteux returns to his post at the Metropolitan Opera House and yields the Boston baton to Henri Rabaud, the regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season. The programme chosen by Mr. Monteux for Saturday consisted of Handel's fifth concerto grosso, in D major, for string orchestra; Charles Martin Loeffler's poem "La Bonne Chanson"; Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The pomp and the jollity which are both so characteristic of Handel were delightfully present in Mr. Monteux's vigorous, healthy reading of the concert grosso, but it is hndeniable that the strings of the Boston orchestra have lost their one-time golden transparency of tone, though they leave nothing to be desired in muscularity. Mr. Loeffler's poem, played here in its present form for the first time, is based on one of the loveliest lyrics in Verlaine's "Bonne Chanson," and is a revision and reorchestration of an earlier work of the same name composed in 1901. The orchestration is exceedingly beautiful, but the musical content leans heavily on Wagner and even bewrays a curious prevision of "Madama Butterfly." As a whole "La Bonne Chanson" is not one of Mr. Loeffler's most successful efforts. There is even an inappropriateness in paraphrasing Verlaine, who sang singly, as the bird sings, with the multiple choiring of a large modern orchestra. The work received a sympathetic performance. But the features of the afternoon were the d'Indy variations and the Beethoven symphony.

M. d'Indy himself led the Boston orchestra in his "Istar" here thirteen years ago. Dr. Muck during his reign excluded the works of d'Indy from the programmes of this band, angered, it is said, by M. d'Indy's shrewd observation that Germany had unduly influenced the musical life of America. Mr. Monteux did well to restore immediately this monumental work to the current repertory of the band. In splendor and variety of instrumental speech, in cunning nuance, in warmth, in sensuousness, in amplitude and nobility of design the performance of the variations led by Mr. Monteux was indeed memorable. Audiences have been as shy of d'Indy as a generation earlier they were of Brahms. The audience Saturday saw revealed the glory of this masterpiece of modern music even as the dwellers in the "immutable land" beheld the glory of Istar unveiled. The audience testified to its satisfaction in enthusiastic applause.

In the opening movement of the Seventh Symphony Mr. Monteux was not at his best. Dr. Muck, conducting unforgettably this sumphony in Carnegie Hall in November, 1914, far surpassed Mr. Monteux in the finesse and the leashed buoyancy of his reading of the introduction and in the golden clarity of line that leaped and caracolled through the vivace. But, with the next movement, Mr. Monteux redeemed himself magnificently. Here is a conductor who really knows an allegretto—which is neither an allegro nor an andante! The scherzo was also done in masterly fashion, and the finale came off with intoxicating spirit, though through all the tumultuousness of the merrymaking Mr. Monteux preserved a classical modelling that is rather of the jubilant Corybantes about the cradle of the infant Zeus than the utter downrightness of a peasant's dance. Again the audience responded heartily to the admirable efforts of the orchestra and the conductor.

Before the programme Mr. Monteux led with superb effect "The Star-Spangled Banner" and the "Marseillaise." To judge from the temper of the audience he might have gone on as Thursday night with "God Save the King" and the Italian "Marcia Reale," and even the anthems of other of our allies.

PITTS SANBORN.

...n PRESS
...ress Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 10 1918

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Henri Rabaud as conductor, interest will be increased in the announcement by General Manager Gatti-Casazza, that he will open the Metropolitan Opera season here on Tuesday evening, November 19, with Rabaud's spectacular opera "Marouf."

From all accounts "Marouf," which had its premiere in Paris not long before the outbreak of the world war, has been pronounced the most popular French work produced in many years. It is sentimental, humorous, picturesque and fantastic, based on an episode in the "Arabian Nights." "Marouf" will be conducted by Mr. Rabaud's friend, Pierre Monteux, who has been directing the Boston symphonists until Mr. Rabaud's arrival. Mr. De Luca will have the title role, while Mme. Frances Alda will impersonate the Princess who falls in love with the Cobbler with whom she elopes disguised as a boy.

Miss Easton gave the recitative a... aria of Lia, from Debussy's "L'Enf... Prodigue," with good dramatic ef... and in musical accord with the ingr... tiating orchestral score. She has ... light soprano voice, but her "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," was marred by an uneven production of tone, at times throaty and varying in quality, that was not fully mature art.

TIMES, PAWTUCKET,
OCTOBER 26,

Boston Symphony.

The general sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Infantry Hall will open at Seddon's News Stand, Butler Exchange, Providence, Monday morning, Nov. 4. Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, will direct the first concert here, and incidentally it will be his first out-of-town concert with the orchestra.

There will be five concerts, all on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Nov. 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21, March 11 and April 8. At the first concert the soloist will be Merle Alcock, the distinguished contralto. At the second concert Harold Bauer, the pianist, will appear; Frederic Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will be soloist at the third, and Arthur Hackett, the American tenor, will be soloist at the fourth. At the last concert Providence will make the acquaintance of that very remarkable young Chilean pianist, Rosita Renard.

NEW YORK TIMES,
NOVEMBER 8.

SYMPHONY CONCERT MARRED BY THE DIN

Boston Orchestra Begins Its Program at Carnegie Hall with Patriotic Airs.

PIERRE MONTEUX CONDUCTS

His Reading of Cesar Frank's Work and Schurmann's Manfried Overture Not Noteworthy.

By JAMES GIBBONS HUNEKER.

There were vibrations extraordinary in Carnegie Hall last night vibrations both patriotic and musical. When Pierre Monteux mounted his little railed-in rostrum he found an audience ready to go up in the air at the merest provocation. No wonder. Without the hall cacophany reigned. "The Star Spangled Banner" led to the "Marseiles," which in turn modulated into "God Save the King," followed by the "Marcia Reale" of Italy½. Only the fact that Cesar Franck opened the program, or a call might have been made for the Belgian National Hymn. However, M. Monteux' amiability and patriotism merged into the Frnck work, which was not played in a noaeworthy fashion. Perhaps the scheme, for the first movement was opaque, the second was heavy in touch, and the final allegro noisy.

But the new band from Boston is still the old band, and their momento, nay, stretches, when the strings were celestial, the woodwind euphonious as no other orchestra's, and the brass, both massive and mellow. Nevertheless, one had the unmistakable sensation that the entire symphony was overblown. It is not profound the "egnial" composition, but it has an atmosphere of its own, and while the composer levies upon Brahms, Schumann, Wagner—toujours Wagner!—he has an individual profile. With Debussy he is one of the beloved Little Masters.

The new and temporary conductor, M. Monteux, was at the head of the famous orchestra through the courtesy of Manager Gatti-Casazza. A familiar figure his; New York has known and liked him at our Opera House. His routine in operatic work doubtless led him to transpose to the symphonic region something of broader toual masses, something of tendency to shifting rhythms. There was less balance of the various instrumental charms than a certain aiming at picturesque, even sweeping effects, in a word, operatic. The Schumann Munfred Overture, muddy in orchestration yet contains nobler ideas and more poetical expressiveness than Franck. But the Belgian is the better painter. M. Monteux's reading did not reveal the eloquence, stammering as it sometimes is, of Schumann.

In the nvelty of the program he was in safer waters. "The Peri: A Poem Dance," by Dukas, may not add to his reputation, though it proved entertaining. This charming French composer is now the sorcerer's apprentice to his own mannerisms. He spins an iridescent, harmonious web, and his dance rhythms were sonorous and melodic, and in his beloved exotic scales. The evening ended with Debussy's "Iberia," with the Spain of Velasquez, El Greco or Goya, but a subtilized Spain in which the stark realism of Zuloga is sifted through silken veils, painted veils, like prose of Maurice Barres. Yet all that followed lacked the glow and rapture of the national anthems seemed in the unfury of an anticlimax.

Pierre Monteux was given a warm greeting by a large audience, both modish and musical. We await with curiosity his second and last concert next Saturday afternoon. No doubt the serenity and search for Nuancis will be gratifying. Any fear that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had changed was dispelled after the first clangorous chords. Our musical community breathed easier last night.

THE SUN, NOVEMBER

BOSTON SYMPHONY SADLY DISAPPOINTS

Orchestra's Reconstruction Into Loyal Band Shows Effect in Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in this city given last evening in Carnegie Hall, might easily have aroused misgivings in the minds of the faithful subscribers. History does not demand detailed repetition here, but it is well to call to mind the stormy period of last spring, when dissolution threatened the famous organization because of the peculiar actions of a Teutonic conductor (now retired) and others, in regard to the national anthem.

Major Higginson's abandonment of his long cherished creation was happily not fatal and public spirited Bostonians were found to take up the burden which he had laid down. They scanned the horizon for a conductor and saw Sir Henry Wood, Arturo Toscanini and other stars, which refused to move westward. Finally Henri Rabaud, composer, was secured, but he could not arrive in time to prepare the first concerts, whereupon Mr. Gatti-Casazza kindly lent Boston his French conductor, Pierre Monteux, who directed last evening's performance.

Incidentally it may be recorded that some two score alien enemy members of the band were dismissed, and this necessitated a considerable rearrangement. A new concert master, Frederick Fradkin, supplanted Anton Witek, and altogether there was much to raise question as to the present state of music in Boston. Last evening's concert provided an uncertain answer.

The programme comprised Cesar Franck's symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." It will be noted that one Teutonic romanticist was represented by an overture to a drama by an English poet.

M. Monteux, who conducted, is a fortunately temporary leader of the Boston forces. Possibly for that reason it might not be amiss to defer analytical consideration of the reconstructed orchestra till it is heard under M. Rabaud. Of a certainty, all old friends of the gentlemen from Boston will hope that they will not contract a habit of playing as they played the Cesar Franck symphony.

It was a very vigorous, not to say robustious, reading that M. Monteux gave, deficient in delicate shades of color, insistent in style, overdrawn in most respects and sadly opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts. All the crystalline clarity, the sunny tone quality and the exquisite precision of the old orchestra were missing.

There was more smoothness in the Schumann number, but there was again little vitality in the tone and a way of nuance throughout. The Dukas composition was a novelty. It was written ...s work, in which the solo instruments ...re played by the Messrs. Fradkin and ...oak, violins, Mr. Barrier, viola, and ... Malkin, violoncello, it was possible ... sense the actual finesse of the players. ...his "concerto" is a beautiful example of ...ure music, replete with grace and the ...harming elegance of other days.

The modern note was introduced in ...oeffler's symphonic paraphrase of the ...ifth poem of Paul Verlaine's "Bonne Chanson," a strangely rambling work, richly beautiful in certain of its episodes, but, as read last evening, vividly emotional in its more expansive moments and scarcely a suggestive or satisfying musical interpretation of the poem which Verlaine himself spoke of as "so sincere, so amiably, sweetly purely thought, so simply written."

Florence Easton, Soloist.

In addition to the orchestral numbers, Florence Easton, one of the Metropolitan Opera sopranos, sang two arias, the famous "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and Lia's plaint from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." As the timbre of this artist's upper register, which is very thin, is quite different from that of her lower voice, which is rich and quite beautiful, she made her most agreeable impression in the Debussy number, which she sang with a good deal of effect and passion, its more dramatic quality offering opportunities for the ... of her vo... She sa... gence, ... music is ... to accen... voice, w... broken t... ment of ... ing.

...VENING TELEGRAPH
New York City

Boston Symphony Transformation.

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra incurred some critical animadversions deprecating the disappearance of that infinite precision, that meticulous nicety of cohesion, that hair-splitting preciosity of instrumental concordance which characterized this orchestra under Doktor Muck. To my way of thinking, the disappearance of this unhuman (or is it superhuman?) accuracy, this microscopical precision of reading and rendition, this everlasting "efficiency" of German orchestral ideas and methods is a good riddance. The only danger which it invites is the temptation to become slovenly, to drift from extreme nicety of delivery to the opposite of disorderly individualism, "self-determination"—to use another favorite Teuton phrase—and so to dissipate the meaning as well as the motive of all true symphonic instrumentation.

To un-Teutonize the Boston Symphony and Gallicize it by the same process is, I think, a heroic undertaking in that it required vital changes in the personnel of the organization as well as a complete transformation in the philosophy and esthetic ideals of its new French conductors. Pierre Monteaux, known and beloved of the New York public as a most typically Gallic master of the operatic baton, has been leading the Boston orchestra out of its familiar, long-trodden paths of scientific exactness and Teutonic traditions, into the higher and rarified atmosphere of the new day of musical liberty, imagination, originality and buoyant audacity. And this "new day" for all of our symphonic and operatic organizations is, after all, an "old day" for France and Italy, as we have had ample proof in the two unforgettable concerts here by the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris. There was freedom without license, imagination without disorder, originality without eccentricity, daring without impudence, from celesta to stopped trumpets.

Of plain line and curve, he seemed to take no heed. All this harmonic paint is becoming wearisome. One yearns for a Bach fugue, which is at least obvious in its design. However, it is the painters' day. If they would only combine their tone tinting with some outlines after the manner of the Venetian colorists in a sister art there would be general happiness. The composition of M Dukas might sound better if it were better played. It was a foggy night and there was noise both outdoors and in.

STANDARD UNION
s: Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 1918

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The annual series of five subscription concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always been the sterling feature on the calendar of musical events under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The first concert of this season's series was given at the Academy of Music last evening before an audience truly representative of the artistic and social culture of the borough. Every seat was occupied and appreciative enthusiasm was dominant throughout the evening. It was, furthermore, a new Boston Symphony for since the turbulent events of last season it has undergone changes of management and reorganization in its personnel of players. The orchestra, as heard last night, has entered upon a fresh era of progressive advancement due to the processes of deteutonicization through which it has passed. Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera House, conducted. Mr. Monteux's assignment to this highest of musical posts is temporary, as the musical destinies of the orchestra will soon pass into the hands of the newly appointed French conductor, Henri Rabaud.

Last evening's programme was both liberal and interesting. The symphony was Cesar Franck's D minor, which is perhaps the finest flower of French symphonic literature. Like all superlative art creations, this symphony was misunderstood at first and has only in the last few years fully come into its own. Its performance, under the guidance of Mr. Monteux's baton, did not not bring forward the rich spiritual nature of its content. The conductor, as an exponent of operatic music, inclines towards dramaticism. The fine shadings of nuance were absent and the crescendos were too pronounced and sudden. The orchestra, in its playing, has not yet risen to the past standards of finished executancy. It has fine material, however, that will be more fully fused and developed as the season advances. The tone quality of the brass choir, in particular, must undergo modifications in the matter of dynamics.

The symphony was followed by Schumann's gloomy "Manfred," a later work in which the composer is guilty of forcing the mood. It is difficult to identify this Schumann with that of the exquisite pianoforte imageries. Vincent D'Indy's "Istar" variations and Debussy's "Iberia" (this latter introduced in Brooklyn several years ago by the late Gustave Mahler) were the remaining instrumental numbers. That of Debussy is a most marvelous example of tone-painting, surpassing in unheard effects the efforts of Richard Strauss. The colors are put on with a big brush, and there is no pretension of connected themes. Debussy, however, of all the moderns, does not desecrate the niceties of form as a simple expedient. He is the creator of new forms, and his music has the double faculty of being objective and subjective. The soloist was Florence Easton, soprano. Her numbers were from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" and Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." Miss Easton's voice is not truly flexible and lacks somewhat in sympathetic quality.

...VENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 1918

LYRIC

The Boston Orchestra.

The newly organized Boston Orchestra gave its first Baltimore concert at the Lyric last evening under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who was the guest-conductor of the occasion. The audience was unexpectedly sparse for so important a musical event, the first of the season's greater concerts, but so sincere was its enthusiasm that the musicians, who seemed to play with unusual brilliance, sympathy and verve, were several times brought to their feet during the course of the evening to acknowledge the freely offered plaudits.

The symphony was the famous one in D minor by Cesar Franck, a work peculiarly rich in thematic beauty and melodic charm. There is expressed in this score a subtle suggestion of spiritual growth, a kind of breaking forth of stifled aspirations that arise, as the symphony unfolds its harmonic richness, in a final outpouring that gives the auditor a curious sense of elevation and satisfaction. While listening to the reading of this great work one felt immediately that the tone of the orchestra had never seemed richer. M. Mouteux interpreted the symphony with rare appreciation, giving it a warmth and a certain vitality that brought to it a new interest, for this director has a rare understanding of dynamic values and rhythmic accent. The performance was throughout a fine piece of interpretative playing.

Orchestra At Its Best.

It was, however, in the delicate simplicity of Haendel's fifth "Concerto Grosso," the one in D major for string orchestra, that the exquisite purity and roundness of the timbre of the organization was most perfectly exploited. In

PUBLIC LEDGER
...ess Philadelphia, Pa.

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Henri Rabaud as conductor, interest will be increased in the announcement by General Manager Gatti-Casazza that he will open the Metropolitan Opera season here on Tuesday evening, November 19, with Rabaud's spectacular opera, "Marouf."

From all accounts "Marouf," which had its premier in Paris not long before the outbreak of the world war, has been pronounced the most popular French work produced in many years. It is sentimental, humorous, picturesque and fantastic, based on an episode in the "Arabian Nights."

"Marouf" will be conducted by Mr. Rabaud's friend, Pierre Monteux, who has been directing the Boston symphonists until Mr. Rabaud's arrival. Mr. De Luca will have the title role, while Mme. Frances Alda will impersonate the Princess who falls in love with the cobbler with whom she elopes disguised as a boy.

EGRAM
a, Pa.

ONY TS SEASON

Makes First Orchestra. the Soloist

uld go, to a con-re than to hear ondition was re-cademy of Music. t concert of the in Philadelphia resulted virtu-the orchestra. hat effect the ctorship, would udience.

o say that the but a beneficial ow much is due of former years sweeping changes to say, but there ccuracy of attack the choirs in the unison solo pas-cond movement of e not strictly in ppearance in this conductor of a onsieur Monteux the orchestra Company until Henri Rabaud, tor. M. Monteux work, as he fre-famous Colonne showed his pref-yle of conducting orchestral works tic climaxes than ntities.

course, with the the little spark y a blaze in the was followed by Caesar Franck. M. e program with-panaiments to the fully done, and st and a master symphony de-ther the work is lassic form or in works. It was thematic detail ought out clearly. taining the germ ken at a tremen-the allegros very ntrasts. Design is characteristics of the reappearance the movements, b and woof of it as a tendency to here and there in etation was orig-edly French, al-ed "mysticism" of amatic reading. nbers on the pro-Overture of Schu-y Dukas and De-ench works, a bal-nd described as a modern in orches-dies are somewhat verage modern or-no means absolute program and per-stances called for d doubtless be ef-mber was "Iberia." ges" for orchestra. and employ every on, including the strument. In both, are shown strongly stral color used in ere" is everywhere. fixed tonalities are ice Easton, and she ssion. Her voice is ange excessive, but rs as far apart in lendid manner. The "Dove Sono" from of Mozart, and the of Lia, from De-It is hard to say in very difficult sim-lization required by and sympathy de-master. She was each performance ia, Pa.

Boston Symphony red the services of conductor, interest the announcement Gatti-Casazza that Metropolitan Opera sday evening, No-baud's spectacular The opera had its t long before the war. It is senti-turesque and fan-episode in the "Marouf" will be d's friend, Pierre been directing the until Rabaud's ar-have the title role. impersonate the ove with the cob-elopes, disguised

---

New York City

Music.

Monteux Conducts d'Indy and Beethoven.

The second local concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, took place in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Today Mr. Monteux returns to his post at the Metropolitan Opera House and yields the Boston baton to Henri Rabaud, the regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season. The programme chosen by Mr. Monteux for Saturday consisted of Handel's fifth concerto grosso, in D major, for string orchestra; Charles Martin Loeffler's poem "La Bonne Chanson"; Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The pomp and the jollity which are both so characteristic of Handel were delightfully present in Mr. Monteux's vigorous, healthy reading of the concert grosso, but it is hndeniable that the strings of the Boston orchestra have lost their one-time golden transparency of tone, though they leave nothing to be desired in muscularity. Mr. Loeffler's poem, played here in its present form for the first time, is based on one of the loveliest lyrics in Verlaine's "Bonne Chanson," and is a revision and reorchestration of an earlier work of the same name composed in 1901. The orchestration is exceedingly beautiful, but the musical content leans heavily on Wagner and even bewrays a curious prevision of "Madama Butterfly." As a whole "La Bonne Chanson" is not one of Mr. Loeffler's most successful efforts. There is even an inappropriateness in paraphrasing Verlaine, who sang singly, as the bird sings, with the multiple choiring of a large modern orchestra. The work received a sympathetic performance. But the features of the afternoon were the d'Indy variations and the Beethoven symphony.

M. d'Indy himself led the Boston orchestra in his "Istar" here thirteen years ago. Dr. Muck during his reign excluded the works of d'Indy from the programmes of this band, angered, it is said, by M. d'Indy's shrewd observation that Germany had unduly influenced the musical life of America. Mr. Monteux did well to restore immediately this monumental work to the current repertory of the band. In splendor and variety of instrumental speech, in cunning nuance, in warmth, in sensuousness, in amplitude and nobility of design the performance of the variations led by Mr. Monteux was indeed memorable. Audiences have been as shy of d'Indy as a generation earlier they were of Brahms. The audience Saturday saw revealed the glory of this masterpiece of modern music even as the dwellers in the "immutable land" beheld the glory of Istar unveiled. The audience testified to its satisfaction in enthusiastic applause.

In the opening movement of the Seventh Symphony Mr. Monteux was not at his best. Dr. Muck, conducting unforgettably this sumphony in Carnegie Hall in November, 1914, far surpassed Mr. Monteux in the finesse and the leashed buoyancy of his reading of the introduction and in the golden clarity of line that leaped and caracolled through the vivace. But, with the next movement, Mr. Monteux redeemed himself magnificently. Here is a conductor who really knows an allegretto—which is neither an allegro nor an andante! The scherzo was also done in masterly fashion, and the finale came off with intoxicating spirit, though through all the tumultuousness of the merrymaking Mr. Monteux preserved a classical modelling that is rather of the jubilant

---

PHILADELPHIA PRESS,
OCTOBER 13,

Corybantes about the cradle of the infant Zeus than the utter downrightness of a peasant's dance. Again the audience responded heartily to the admirable efforts of the orchestra and the conductor.

Before the programme Mr. Monteux led with superb effect "The Star-Spangled Banner" and the "Marseillaise." To judge from the temper of the audience he might have gone on as Thursday night with "God Save the King" and the Italian "Marcia Reale," and even the anthems of other of our allies.

PITTS SANBORN.

---

the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees, composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music, on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

Notices of renewals of subscriptions have been sent to all of last year's subscribers to the Symphony Orchestra, and the response has been immediate and gratifying. Subscribers to last year's concerts are given until October 15 in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday morning, October 21, 1119 Chestnut Street. The soloists announced for the season are: Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin, the distinguished violinist, who is now the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

* * *

TIMES, PAWTUCKET,
OCTOBER 26,

Boston Symphony.

The general sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Infantry Hall will open at Seddon's News Stand, Butler Exchange, Providence, Monday morning, Nov. 4. Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, will direct the first concert here, and incidentally it will be his first out-of-town concert with the orchestra.

There will be five concerts, all on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Nov. 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21, March 11 and April 8. At the first concert the soloist will be Merle Alcock, the distinguished contralto. At the second concert Harold Bauer, the pianist, will appear; Frederic Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will be soloist at the third, and Arthur Hackett, the American tenor, will be soloist at the fourth. At the last concert Providence will make the acquaintance of that very remarkable young Chilean pianist, Rosita Renard.

NEW YORK TIMES,
NOVEMBER 8,

SYMPHONY CONCERT MARRED BY THE DIN

Boston Orchestra Begins Its Program at Carnegie Hall with Patriotic Airs.

PIERRE MONTEUX CONDUCTS

His Reading of Cesar Frank's Work and Schurmann's Manfried Overture Not Noteworthy.

By JAMES GIBBONS HUNEKER.

There were vibrations extraordinary in Carnegie Hall last night vibrations both patriotic and musical. When Pierre Monteux mounted his little railed-in rostrum he found an audience ready to go up in the air at the merest provocation. No wonder. Without the hall cacophany reigned. "The Star Spangled Banner" led to the "Marseilles," which in turn modulated into "God Save the King," followed by the "Marcia Reale" of Italy½. Only the fact that Cesar Franck opened the program, or a call might have been made for the Belgian National Hymn. However, M. Monteux' amiability and patriotism merged into the Frnck work, which was not played in a noaeworthy fashion. Perhaps the scheme, for the first movement was opaque, the second was heavy in touch, and the final allegro noisy.

But the new band from Boston is still the old band, and their momento, nay, stretches, when the strings were celestial, the woodwind euphonious as no other orchestra's, and the brass, both massive and mellow. Nevertheless, one had the unmistakable sensation that the entire symphony was overblown. It is not profound the "egnial" composition, but it has an atmosphere of its own, and while the composer leaves upon Brahms, Schumann, Wagner—toujours Wagner!—he has an individual profile. With Debussy he is one of the beloved Little Masters.

The new and temporary conductor, M. Monteux, was at the head of the famous orchestra through the courtesy of Manager Gatti-Casazza. A familiar figure his; New York has known and liked him at our Opera House. His routine in operatic work doubtless led him to transpose to the symphonic region something of broader toual masses, something of tendency to shifting rhythms. There was less balance of the various instrumental charms than a certain aiming at picturesque, even sweeping effects, in a word, operatic. The Schumann Munfred Overture, muddy in orchestration yet contains nobler ideas and more poetical expressiveness than Franck. But the Belgian is the better painter. M. Monteux's reading did not reveal the eloquence, stammering as it sometimes is, of Schumann.

In the nvelty of the program he was in safer waters. "The Peri: A Poem Dance," by Dukas, may not add to his reputation, though it proved entertaining. This charming French composer is now the sorcerer's apprentice to his own mannerisms. He spins an iridescent, harmonious web, and his dance rhythms were sonorous and melodic, and in his beloved exotic scales. The evening ended with Debussy's "Iberia," with the Spain of Velasquez, El Greco or Goya, but a subtilized Spain in which the stark realism of Zuloga is sifted through silken veils, painted veils, like prose of Maurice Barres. Yet all that followed lacked the glow and rapture of the national anthems seemed in the unfury of an anticlimax.

Pierre Monteux was given a warm greeting by a large audience, both modish and musical. We await with curiosity his second and last concert next Saturday afternoon. No doubt the serenity and search for Nuancis will be gratifying. Any fear that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had changed was dispelled after the first clangorous chords. Our musical community breathed easier last night.

50

EVENING TELEGRAPH

New York City

Boston Symphony Transformation.

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra incurred some critical animadversions deprecating the disappearance of that infinite precision, that meticulous nicety of cohesion, that hair-splitting precisity of instrumental concordance which characterized this orchestra under Doktor Muck. To my way of thinking, the disappearance of this unhuman (or is it superhuman?) accuracy, this microscopical precision of reading and rendition, this everlasting "efficiency" of German orchestral ideas and methods is a good riddance. The only danger which it invites is the temptation to become slovenly, to drift from extreme nicety of delivery to the opposite of disorderly individualism, "self-determination"—to use another favorite Teuton phrase—and so to dissipate the meaning as well as the motive of all true symphonic instrumentation.

To un-Teutonize the Boston Symphony and Gallicize it by the same process is, I think, a heroic undertaking in that it required vital changes in the personnel of the organization as well as a complete transformation in the philosophy and esthetic ideals of its new French conductors. Pierre Monteaux, known and beloved of the New York public as a most typically Gallic master of the operatic baton, has been leading the Boston orchestra out of its familiar, long-trodden paths of scientific exactness and Teutonic traditions, into the higher and rarified atmosphere of the new day of musical liberty, imagination, originality and buoyant audacity. And this "new day" for all of our symphonic and operatic organizations is, after all, an "old day" for France and Italy, as we have had ample proof in the two unforgettable concerts here by the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris. There was freedom without license, imagination without disorder, originality without eccentricity, daring without impudence.

THE SUN, NOVEMBER

BOSTON SYMPHONY SADLY DISAPPOINTS

Orchestra's Reconstruction Into Loyal Band Shows Effect in Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in this city given last evening in Carnegie Hall, might easily have aroused misgivings in the minds of the faithful subscribers. History does not demand detailed repetition here, but it is well to call to mind the stormy period of last spring, when dissolution threatened the famous organization because of the peculiar actions of a Teutonic conductor (now retired) and others, in regard to the national anthem.

Major Higginson's abandonment of his long cherished creation was happily not fatal and public spirited Bostonians were found to take up the burden which he had laid down. They scanned the horizon for a conductor and saw Sir Henry Wood, Arturo Toscanini and other stars, which refused to move westward. Finally Henri Rabaud, composer, was secured, but he could not arrive in time to prepare the first concerts, whereupon Mr. Gatti-Casazza kindly lent Boston his French conductor, Pierre Monteux, who directed last evening's performance.

Incidentally it may be recorded that some two score alien enemy members of the band were dismissed, and this necessitated a considerable rearrangement. A new concert master, Frederick Fradkin, supplanted Anton Witek, and altogether there was much to raise question as to the present state of music in Boston. Last evening's concert provided an uncertain answer.

The programme comprised Cesar Franck's symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." It will be noted that one Teutonic romanticist was represented by an overture to a drama by an English poet.

M. Monteux, who conducted, is a fortunately temporary leader of the Boston forces. Possibly for that reason it might not be amiss to defer analytical consideration of the reconstructed orchestra till it is heard under M. Rabaud. Of a certainty, all old friends of the gentlemen from Boston will hope that they will not contract a habit of playing as they played the Cesar Franck symphony.

It was a very vigorous, not to say robustious, reading that M. Monteux gave, deficient in delicate shades of color, insistent in style, overdrawn in most respects and sadly opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts. All the crystalline clarity, the sunny tone quality and the exquisite precision of the old orchestra were missing.

There was more smoothness in the Schumann number, but there was again little vitality in the tone and a way of nuance throughout. The Dukas composition was a novelty. It was written from celesta to stopped trumpets.

Of plain line and curve, he seemed to take no heed. All this harmonic paint is becoming wearisome. One yearns for a Bach fugue, which is at least obvious in its design. However, it is the painters' day. If they would only combine their tone tinting with some outlines after the manner of the Venetian colorists in a sister art there would be general happiness. The composition of M. Dukas might sound better if it were better played. It was a foggy night and there was noise both outdoors and in.

VENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 1918

LYRIC

The Boston Orchestra.

The newly organized Boston Orchestra gave its first Baltimore concert at the Lyric last evening under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who was the guest-conductor of the occasion. The audience was unexpectedly sparse for so important a musical event, the first of the season's greater concerts, but so sincere was its enthusiasm that the musicians, who seemed to play with unusual brilliance, sympathy and verve, were several times brought to their feet during the course of the evening to acknowledge the freely offered plaudits.

The symphony was the famous one in D minor by Cesar Franck, a work peculiarly rich in thematic beauty and melodic charm. There is expressed in this score a subtle suggestion of spiritual growth, a kind of breaking forth of stifled aspirations that arise, as the symphony unfolds its harmonic richness, in a final outpouring that gives the auditor a curious sense of elevation and satisfaction. While listening to the reading of this great work one felt immediately that the tone of the orchestra had never seemed richer. M. Mouteux interpreted the symphony with rare appreciation, giving it a warmth and a certain vitality that brought to it a new interest, for this director has a rare understanding of dynamic values and rhythmic accent. The performance was throughout a fine piece of interpretative playing.

Orchestra At Its Best.

It was, however, in the delicate simplicity of Haendel's fifth "Concerto Grosso," the one in D major for string orchestra, that the exquisite purity and roundness of the timbre of the organization was most perfectly exploited. In his work, in which the solo instruments were played by the Messrs. Fradkin and Noak, violins, Mr. Barrier, viola, and Mr. Malkin, violoncello, it was possible to sense the actual finesse of the players. This "concerto" is a beautiful example of pure music, replete with grace and the charming elegance of other days.

The modern note was introduced in Loeffler's symphonic paraphrase of the fifth poem of Paul Verlaine's "Bonne Chanson," a strangely rambling work, richly beautiful in certain of its episodes, but, as read last evening, vividly emotional in its more expansive moments and scarcely a suggestive or satisfying musical interpretation of the poem which Verlaine himself spoke of as "so sincere, so amiably, sweetly purely thought, so simply written."

Florence Easton, Soloist.

In addition to the orchestral numbers, Florence Easton, one of the Metropolitan Opera sopranos, sang two arias, the famous "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and Lia's plaint from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." As the timbre of this artist's upper register, which is very thin, is quite different from that of her lower voice, which is rich and quite beautiful, she made her most agreeable impression in the Debussy number, which she sang with a good deal of effect and passion, its more dramatic quality offering opportunities for the
of her vo
She sa gence, l music is to accen voice, wh broken t ment of ing.

STANDARD UNION
s: Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The annual series of five subscription concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always been the sterling feature on the calendar of musical events under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The first concert of this season's series was given at the Academy of Music last evening before an audience truly representative of the artistic and social culture of the borough. Every seat was occupied and appreciative enthusiasm was dominant throughout the evening. It was, furthermore, a new Boston Symphony for since the turbulent events of last season it has undergone changes of management and reorganization in its personnel of players. The orchestra, as heard last night, has entered upon a fresh era of progressive advancement due to the processes of deteutonicization through which it has passed. Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera House, conducted. Mr. Monteux's assignment to this highest of musical posts is temporary, as the musical destinies of the orchestra will soon pass into the hands of the newly appointed French conductor, Henri Rabaud.

Last evening's programme was both liberal and interesting. The symphony was Cesar Franck's D minor, which is perhaps the finest flower of French symphonic literature. Like all superlative art creations, this symphony was misunderstood at first and has only in the last few years fully come into its own. Its performance, under the guidance of Mr. Monteux's baton, did not not bring forward the rich spiritual nature of its content. The conductor, as an exponent of operatic music, inclines towards dramaticism. The fine shadings of nuance were absent and the crescendos were too pronounced and sudden. The orchestra, in its playing, has not yet risen to the past standards of finished executancy. It has fine material, however, that will be more fully fused and developed as the season advances. The tone quality of the brass choir, in particular, must undergo modifications in the matter of dynamics.

The symphony was followed by Schumann's gloomy "Manfred," a later work in which the composer is guilty of forcing the mood. It is difficult to identify this Schumann with that of the exquisite pianoforte imageries. Vincent D'Indy's "Istar" variations and Debussy's "Iberia" (this latter introduced in Brooklyn several years ago by the late Gustave Mahler) were the remaining instrumental numbers. That of Debussy is a most marvelous example of tone-painting, surpassing in unheard effects the efforts of Richard Strauss. The colors are put on with a big brush, and there is no pretension of connected themes. Debussy, however, of all the moderns, does not desecrate the niceties of form as a simple expedient. He is the creator of new forms, and his music has the double faculty of being objective and subjective. The soloist was Florence Easton, soprano. Her numbers were from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" and Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." Miss Easton's voice is not truly flexible and lacks somewhat in sympathetic quality.

PRESS
ress Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Henri Rabaud as conductor, interest will be increased in the announcement by General Manager Gatti-Casazza, that he will open the Metropolitan Opera season here on Tuesday evening, November 19, with Rabaud's spectacular opera "Marouf."

From all accounts "Marouf," which had its premiere in Paris not long before the outbreak of the world war, has been pronounced the most popular French work produced in many years. It is sentimental, humorous, picturesque and fantastic, based on an episode in the "Arabian Nights." "Marouf" will be conducted by Mr. Rabaud's friend, Pierre Monteux, who has been directing the Boston symphonists until Mr. Rabaud's arrival. Mr. De Luca will have the title role, while Mme. Frances Alda will impersonate the Princess who falls in love with the Cobbler with whom she elopes disguised as a boy.

* * *

Miss Easton gave the recitative a aria of Lia, from Debussy's "L'Enf Prodigue," with good dramatic eff and in musical accord with the ingr tiating orchestral score. She has light soprano voice, but her "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," was marred by an uneven production of tone, at times throaty and varying in quality, that was not fully mature art.

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Henri Rabaud as conductor, interest will be increased in the announcement by General Manager Gatti-Casazza that he will open the Metropolitan Opera season here on Tuesday evening, November 19, with Rabaud's spectacular opera, "Marouf."

From all accounts "Marouf," which had its premier in Paris not long before the outbreak of the world war, has been pronounced the most popular French work produced in many years. It is sentimental, humorous, picturesque and fantastic, based on an episode in the "Arabian Nights."

"Marouf" will be conducted by Mr. Rabaud's friend, Pierre Monteux, who has been directing the Boston symphonists until Mr. Rabaud's arrival. Mr. De Luca will have the title role, while Mme. Frances Alda will impersonate the Princess who falls in love with the cobbler with whom she elopes disguised as a boy.

EGRAM, Lehigh
a, Pa.

ONY TS SEASON

Makes First Orchestra. the Soloist

uld go, to a con-re than to hear ondition was re-cademy of Music.
st concert of the
in Philadelphia resulted virtu-
the orchestra.
hat effect the ctorship, would udience.
to say that the
but a beneficial much is due of former years weeping changes to say, but there ccuracy of attack
the choirs in the unison solo pas-cond movement of not strictly in ppearance in this conductor of a onsieur Monteux

the orchestra
Company until
Henri Rabaud,
tor. M. Monteux work, as he frefamous Colonne showed his prefyle of conducting orchestral works tic climaxes than ntities.
course, with the
the little spark a blaze in the was followed by Caesar Franck. M. e program with-companiments to the fully done, and st and a master symphony de-ther the work is lassic form or in works. It was thematic detail ought out clearly.

ntaining the germ
ken at a trementhe allegros very ntrasts. Design is characteristics of the reappearance
ll the movements,
b and woof of it
as a tendency to here and there in retation was orig-dly French, alled "mysticism" of ramatic reading.
mbers on the pro-
Overture of Schuby Dukas and Deench works, a bal-and described as a modern in orches-odies are somewhat average modern or-no means absolute program and pernstances called for ld doubtless be efmber was "Iberia."
ges" for orchestra.
and employ every on, including the strument. In both,
are shown strongly estral color used in here" is everywhere, fixed tonalities are nce Easton, and she ssion. Her voice is range excessive, but ers as far apart in lendid manner. The

"Dove Sono" from of Mozart, and the
of Lia, from De-
It is hard to say in very difficult simlization required by and sympathy de-master. She was each performance

ia, Pa.

Boston Symphony
red the services of conductor, interest
the announcement
Gatti-Casazza that Metropolitan Opera
esday evening, No-abaud's spectacular
The opera had its t long before the war. It is senti-cturesque and fan-episode in the "Marouf" will be d's friend, Pierre been directing the until Rabaud's ar-have the title role.
impersonate the love with the cob-elopes, disguised

...ew York City

COMMERCE ADVERTISER,
...e day's pay to United War Wor

...AS GIFTS
...rtment
LORE

Rabaud, the regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season. The programme chosen by Mr. Monteux for Saturday consisted of Handel's fifth concerto grosso, in D major, for string orchestra; Charles Martin Loeffler's poem "La Bonne Chanson"; Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The pomp and the jollity which are both so characteristic of Handel were delightfully present in Mr. Monteux's vigorous, healthy reading of the concert grosso, but it is hndeniable that the strings of the Boston orchestra have lost their one-time golden transparency of tone, though they leave nothing to be desired in muscularity. Mr. Loeffler's poem, played here in its present form for the first time, is based on one of the loveliest lyrics in Verlaine's "Bonne Chanson," and is a revision and reorchestration of an earlier work of the same name composed in 1901. The orchestration is exceedingly beautiful, but the musical content leans heavily on Wagner and even bewrays a curious prevision of "Madama Butterfly." As a whole "La Bonne Chanson" is not one of Mr. Loeffler's most successful efforts. There is even an inappropriateness in paraphrasing Verlaine, who sang singly, as the bird sings, with the multiple choiring of a large modern orchestra. The work received a sympathetic performance. But the features of the afternoon were the d'Indy variations and the Beethoven symphony.

M. d'Indy himself led the Boston orchestra in his "Istar" here thirteen years ago. Dr. Muck during his reign excluded the works of d'Indy from the programmes of this band, angered, it is said, by M. d'Indy's shrewd observation that Germany had unduly influenced the musical life of America. Mr. Monteux did well to restore immediately this monumental work to the current repertory of the band. In splendor and variety of instrumental speech, in cunning nuance, in warmth, in sensuousness, in amplitude and nobility of design the performance of the variations led by Mr. Monteux was indeed memorable. Audiences have been as shy of d'Indy as a generation earlier they were of Brahms. The audience Saturday saw revealed the glory of this masterpiece of modern music even as the dwellers in the "immutable land" beheld the glory of Istar unveiled. The audience testified to its satisfaction in enthusiastic applause.

In the opening movement of the Seventh Symphony Mr. Monteux was not at his best. Dr. Muck, conducting unforgettably this sumphony in Carnegie Hall in November, 1914, far surpassed Mr. Monteux in the finesse and the leashed buoyancy of his reading of the introduction and in the golden clarity of line that leaped and caracolled through the vivace. But, with the next movement, Mr. Monteux redeemed himself magnificently. Here is a conductor who really knows an allegretto—which is neither an allegro nor an andante! The scherzo was also done in masterly fashion, and the finale came off with intoxicating spirit, though through all the tumultuousness of the merrymaking Mr. Monteux preserved a classical modelling that is rather of the jubilant

n PRESS
ress Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Henri Rabaud as conductor, interest will be increased in the announcement by General Manager Gatti-Casazza, that he will open the Metropolitan Opera season here on Tuesday evening, November 19, with Rabaud's spectacular opera "Marouf."

From all accounts "Marouf," which had its premiere in Paris not long before the outbreak of the world war, has been pronounced the most popular French work produced in many years. It is sentimental, humorous, picturesque and fantastic, based on an episode in the "Arabian Nights." "Marouf" will be conducted by Mr. Rabaud's friend, Pierre Monteux, who has been directing the Boston symphonists until Mr. Rabaud's arrival. Mr. De Luca will have the title role, while Mme. Frances Alda will impersonate the Princess who falls in love with the Cobbler with whom she elopes disguised as a boy.

* * *

Miss Easton gave the recitative a aria of Lia, from Debussy's "L'Enf Prodigue," with good dramatic eff and in musical accord with the ingr tiating orchestral score. She has light soprano voice, but her "Dove
Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," was marred by an uneven production of tone, at times throaty and varying in quality, that was not fully mature art.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS,
OCTOBER 13,

In the Mu

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, this city, during the coming Winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last Spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees, composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music, on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

Notices of renewals of subscriptions have been sent to all of last year's subscribers to the Symphony Orchestra, and the response has been immediate and gratifying. Subscribers to last year's concerts are given until October 15 in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday morning, October 21, 1119 Chestnut Street. The soloists announced for the season are: Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin, the distinguished violinist, who is now the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

* * *

TIMES, PAWTUCKET,
OCTOBER 26,

Boston Symphony.

The general sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Infantry Hall will open at Seddon's News Stand, Butler Exchange, Providence, Monday morning, Nov. 4. Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, will direct the first concert here, and incidentally it will be his first out-of-town concert with the orchestra.

There will be five concerts, all on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Nov. 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21, March 11 and April 8. At the first concert the soloist will be Merle Alcock, the distinguished contralto. At the second concert Harold Bauer, the pianist, will appear; Frederic Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will be soloist at the third, and Arthur Hackett, the American tenor, will be soloist at the fourth. At the last concert Providence will make the acquaintance of that very remarkable young Chilean pianist, Rosita Renard.

NEW YORK TIMES,
NOVEMBER 8,

50

SYMPHONY CONCERT MARRED BY THE DIN

Boston Orchestra Begins Its Program at Carnegie Hall with Patriotic Airs.

PIERRE MONTEUX CONDUCTS

His Reading of Cesar Frank's Work and Schurmann's Manfried Overture Not Noteworthy.

By JAMES GIBBONS HUNEKER.

There were vibrations extraordinary in Carnegie Hall last night vibrations both patriotic and musical. When Pierre Monteux mounted his little railed-in rostrum he found an audience ready to go up in the air at the merest provocation. No wonder. Without the half cacophany reigned. "The Star Spangled Banner" led to the "Marseilles," which in turn modulated into "God Save the King," followed by the "Marcia Reale" of Italy½. Only the fact that Cesar Franck opened the program, or a call might have been made for the Belgian National Hymn. However, M. Monteux' amiability and patriotism merged into the Frnck work, which was not played in a noaeworthy fashion. Perhaps the scheme, for the first movement was opaque, the second was heavy in touch, and the final allegro noisy.

But the new band from Boston is still the old band, and their momento, nay, stretches, when the strings were celestial, the woodwind euphonious as no other orchestra's, and the brass, both massive and mellow. Nevertheless, one had the unmistakable sensation that the entire symphony was overblown. It is not profound the "egnial" composition, but it has an atmosphere of its own, and while the composer leaves upon Brahms, Schumann, Wagner—toujours Wagner!—he has an individual profile. With Debussy he is one of the beloved Little Masters.

The new and temporary conductor, M. Monteux, was at the head of the famous orchestra through the courtesy of Manager Gatti-Casazza. A familiar figure his; New York has known and liked him at our Opera House. His routine in operatic work doubtless led him to transpose to the symphonic region something of broader toual masses, something of tendency to shifting rhythms. There was less balance of the various instrumental charms than a certain aiming at picturesque, even sweeping effects, in a word, operatic. The Schumann Munfred Overture, muddy in orchestration yet contains nobler ideas and more poetical expressiveness than Franck. But the Belgian is the better painter. M. Monteux's reading did not reveal the eloquence, stammering as it sometimes is, of Schumann.

In the nvelty of the program he was in safer waters. "The Peri: A Poem Dance," by Dukas, may not add to his reputation, though it proved entertaining. This charming French composer is now the sorcerer's apprentice to his own mannerisms. He spins an iridescent, harmonious web, and his dance rhythms were sonorous and melodic, and in his beloved exotic scales. The evening ended with Debussy's "Iberia," with the Spain of Velasquez, El Greco or Goya, but a subtilized Spain in which the stark realism of Zuloga is sifted through silken veils, painted veils, like prose of Maurice Barres. Yet all that followed lacked the glow and rapture of the national anthems seemed in the unfury of an anticlimax.

Pierre Monteux was given a warm greeting by a large audience, both modish and musical. We await with curiosity his second and last concert next Saturday afternoon. No doubt the serenity and search for Nuancis will be gratifying. Any fear that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had changed was dispelled after the first clangorous chords. Our musical community breathed easier last night.

...NING TELEGRAPH
New York City

Boston Symphony Transformation.

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra incurred some critical animadversions deprecating the disappearance of that infinite precision, that meticulous nicety of cohesion, that hair-splitting preciosity of instrumental concordance which characterized this orchestra under Doktor Muck. To my way of thinking, the disappearance of this unhuman (or is it superhuman?) accuracy, this microscopical precision of reading and rendition, this everlasting "efficiency" of German orchestral ideas and methods is a good riddance. The only danger which it invites is the temptation to become slovenly, to drift from extreme nicety of delivery to the opposite of disorderly individualism, "self-determination"—to use another favorite Teuton phrase—and so to dissipate the meaning as well as the motive of all true symphonic instrumentation.

To un-Teutonize the Boston Symphony—and Galicize it by the same process is, I think, a heroic undertaking in that it required vital changes in the personnel of the organization as well as a complete transformation in the philosophy and esthetic ideals of its new French conductors. Pierre Monteaux, known and beloved of the New York public as a most typically Gallic master of the operatic baton, has been leading the Boston orchestra out of its familiar, long-

AMSHIP

THE SUN, NOVEMBER 8,

BOSTON SYMPHONY SADLY DISAPPOINTS

Orchestra's Reconstruction Into Loyal Band Shows Effect in Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in this city given last evening in Carnegie Hall might easily have aroused misgivings in the minds of the faithful subscribers. History does not demand detailed repetition here, but it is well to call to mind the stormy period of last spring, when dissolution threatened the famous organization because of the peculiar actions of a Teutonic conductor (now retired) and others, in regard to the national anthem.

Major Higginson's abandonment of his long cherished creation was happily not fatal and public spirited Bostonians were found to take up the burden which he had laid down. They scanned the horizon for a conductor and saw Sir Henry Wood, Arturo Toscanini and other stars, which refused to move westward. Finally Henri Rabaud, composer, was secured, but he could not arrive in time to prepare the first concerts, whereupon Mr. Gatti-Casazza kindly lent Boston his French conductor, Pierre Monteux, who directed last evening's performance.

Incidentally it may be recorded that some two score alien enemy members of the band were dismissed, and this necessitated a considerable rearrangement. A new concert master, Frederick Fradkin, supplanted Anton Witek, and altogether there was much to raise question as to the present state of music in Boston. Last evening's concert provided an uncertain answer.

The programme comprised Cesar Franck's symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." It will be noted that one Teutonic romanticist was represented by an overture to a drama by an English poet.

M. Monteux, who conducted, is a fortunately temporary leader of the Boston forces. Possibly for that reason it might not be amiss to defer analytical consideration of the reconstructed orchestra till it is heard under M. Rabaud. Of a certainty, all old friends of the gentlemen from Boston will hope that they will not contract a habit of playing as they played the Cesar Franck symphony.

It was a very vigorous, not to say robustious, reading that M. Monteux gave, deficient in delicate shades of color, insistent in style, overdrawn in most respects and sadly opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts. All the crystalline clarity, the sunny tone quality and the exquisite precision of the old orchestra were missing.

There was more smoothness in the Schumann number, but there was again little vitality in the tone and a way of nuance throughout. The Dukas composition was a novelty. It was written around the chromatic scale, which is a foundation for tears, but not for melodic song. The composer was chiefly concerned about juggling with all the modern apparatus of the orchestral writer, from celesta to stopped trumpets.

Of plain line and curve, he seemed to take no heed. All this harmonic paint is becoming wearisome. One yearns for a Bach fugue, which is at least obvious in its design. However, it is the painters' day. If they would only combine their tone tinting with some outlines after the manner of the Venetian colorists in a sister art there would be general happiness. The composition of M. Dukas might sound better if it were better played. It was a foggy night and there was noise both outdoors and in.

VENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.

NOV 1919

LYRIC
The Boston Orchestra.

The newly organized Boston Orchestra gave its first Baltimore concert at the Lyric last evening under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who was the guest-conductor of the occasion. The audience was unexpectedly sparse for so important a musical event, the first of the season's greater concerts, but so sincere was its enthusiasm that the musicians, who seemed to play with unusual brilliance, sympathy and verve, were several times brought to their feet during the course of the evening to acknowledge the freely offered plaudits.

The symphony was the famous one in D minor by Cesar Franck, a work peculiarly rich in thematic beauty and melodic charm. There is expressed in this score a subtle suggestion of spiritual growth, a kind of breaking forth of stifled aspirations that arise, as the symphony unfolds its harmonic richness, in a final outpouring that gives the auditor a curious sense of elevation and satisfaction. While listening to the reading of this great work one felt immediately that the tone of the orchestra had never seemed richer. M. Mouteux interpreted the symphony with rare appreciation, giving it a warmth and a certain vitality that brought to it a new interest, for this director has a rare understanding of dynamic values and rhythmic accent. The performance was throughout a fine piece of interpretative playing.

Orchestra At Its Best.

It was, however, in the delicate simplicity of Haendel's fifth "Concerto Grosso," the one in D major for string orchestra, that the exquisite purity and roundness of the timbre of the organization was most perfectly exploited. In this work, in which the solo instruments were played by the Messrs. Fradkin and Noak, violins, Mr. Barrier, viola, and Mr. Malkin, violoncello, it was possible to sense the actual finesse of the players. This "concerto" is a beautiful example of pure music, replete with grace and the charming elegance of other days.

The modern note was introduced in Loeffler's symphonic paraphrase of the fifth poem of Paul Verlaine's "Bonne Chanson," a strangely rambling work, richly beautiful in certain of its episodes, but, as read last evening, vividly emotional in its more expansive moments and scarcely a suggestive or satisfying musical interpretation of the poem which Verlaine himself spoke of as "so sincere, so amiably, sweetly purely thought, so simply written."

Florence Easton, Soloist.

In addition to the orchestral numbers, Florence Easton, one of the Metropolitan Opera sopranos, sang two arias, the famous "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and Lia's plaint from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." As the timbre of this artist's upper register, which is very thin, is quite different from that of her lower voice, which is rich and quite beautiful, she made her most agreeable impression in the Debussy number, which she sang with a good deal of effect and passion, its more dramatic quality offering opportunities for the
of her vo
She sa gence, I music is to accen voice, wh
broken t
ment of
ing.

STANDARD UNION
s: Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The annual series of five subscription concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always been the sterling feature on the calendar of musical events under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The first concert of this season's series was given at the Academy of Music last evening before an audience truly representative of the artistic and social culture of the borough. Every seat was occupied and appreciative enthusiasm was dominant throughout the evening. It was, furthermore, a new Boston Symphony for since the turbulent events of last season it has undergone changes of management and reorganization in its personnel of players. The orchestra, as heard last night, has entered upon a fresh era of progressive advancement due to the processes of deteutonicization through which it has passed. Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera House, conducted. Mr. Monteux's assignment to this highest of musical posts is temporary, as the musical destinies of the orchestra will soon pass into the hands of the newly appointed French conductor, Henri Rabaud.

Last evening's programme was both liberal and interesting. The symphony was Cesar Franck's D minor, which is perhaps the finest flower of French symphonic literature. Like all superlative art creations, this symphony was misunderstood at first and has only in the last few years fully come into its own. Its performance, under the guidance of Mr. Monteux's baton, did not not bring forward the rich spiritual nature of its content. The conductor, as an exponent of operatic music, inclines towards dramaticism. The fine shadings of nuance were absent and the crescendos were too pronounced and sudden. The orchestra, in its playing, has not yet risen to the past standards of finished executancy. It has fine material, however, that will be more fully fused and developed as the season advances. The tone quality of the brass choir, in particular, must undergo modifications in the matter of dynamics.

The symphony was followed by Schumann's gloomy "Manfred," a later work in which the composer is guilty of forcing the mood. It is difficult to identify this Schumann with that of the exquisite pianoforte imageries. Vincent D'Indy's "Istar" variations and Debussy's "Iberia" (this latter introduced in Brooklyn several years ago by the late Gustave Mahler) were the remaining instrumental numbers. That of Debussy is a most marvelous example of tone-painting, surpassing in unheard effects the efforts of Richard Strauss. The colors are put on with a big brush, and there is no pretension of connected themes. Debussy, however, of all the moderns, does not desecrate the niceties of form as a simple expedient. He is the creator of new forms, and his music has the double faculty of being objective and subjective. The soloist was Florence Easton, soprano. Her numbers were from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" and Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." Miss Easton's voice is not truly flexible and lacks somewhat in sympathetic quality.

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Henri Rabaud as conductor, interest will be increased in the announcement by General Manager Gatti-Casazza that he will open the Metropolitan Opera season here on Tuesday evening, November 19, with Rabaud's spectacular opera, "Marouf."

From all accounts "Marouf," which had its premier in Paris not long before the outbreak of the world war, has been pronounced the most popular French work produced in many years. It is sentimental, humorous, picturesque and fantastic, based on an episode in the "Arabian Nights."

"Marouf" will be conducted by Mr. Rabaud's friend, Pierre Monteux, who has been directing the Boston symphonists until Mr. Rabaud's arrival. Mr. De Luca will have the title role, while Mme. Frances Alda will impersonate the Princess who falls in love with the cobbler with whom she elopes disguised as a boy.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

STAR

dress: Baltimore, Md.

It remains for Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., to prove its assertion which it makes in its announcement folder being distributed in Baltimore that:

"Essentially, however, the orchestra remains what it has been for a generation, the greatest artistic possession of America."

This is a big assertion at any time for anyone, and under the circumstances of its reorganization it is still more assertive. The orchestra's official announcer may think so, and it may be so, but it did not prove it in Baltimore last Wednesday night at its first concedt here since reorganization, there is not unanimous opinion elsewhere supporting its claim so far, and the claim cannot be proven until the orchestra and its new director, Henri Rabaud, come to know each other thoroughly. In the meantime the public has a right to its own opinion and not to be caught by a self-assertion which excludes all others.

Neither is the official announcer reticent, otherwise, when he uses the word "remains" and the designation "greatest artistic possession of America." By this he boldly declares this organization above and excludes painting, sculpture, literature and all the other arts in the Western Hemisphere.

There is not the slightest objection by any impartial person to Boston Symphony Orchestra, Incorporated, being what it claims it is and more, if it can be so. The greater it or any other good organization can become, the greater good it can do for the world. May the orchestra prosper for accomplishment of this end.

There are 91 players in its present personnel list, divided into 30 first and second violins, 10 violas, 10 violoncellos, eight string contrabasses, three each of flutes, oboes, clarinets and bassons; one each of piccolo, English horn and bass clarinet; five French horns, four trumpets, three trombones, one tuba, two harps, two tympani, three of other percussion instruments, and one organ.

W. H. Brennan is now manager of the orchestra and G. E. Judd assistant manager.

In its folder referred to the announcer "lets down" the orchestra so:

"The Boston Spmphony Orchestra, in a sense, begins in this its thirty-eighth season a new era in its history. The retirement of Mr. Higginson has placed its government and maintenance in a board of trustees. For the first time since its organization its conductor is a Frenchman. For the first time its concertmaster is an American. The complexion of the personnel itself has changed greatly by the engagement of Americans and Frenchmen to fill the several vacancies in the ranks. Essentially, however, the orchestra remains what it has been for a generation, the greatest artistic possession of America.

"The engagement of Henri Rabaud as conductor must be regarded as a very happy and fortunate solution of a difficult problem. In him the trustees have secured a splendidly equipped musican, one of the most eminent conductors of France. Steeped in the finest traditions of French music, he is sympathetic with the best music of all schools and under him the catholicity which has always characterized Boston Symphony programs will not be lessened.

"This distinguished Frenchman, at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is certain to strike a new note in the music of this country and to have widespread influence. Until now, so far as orchestras are concerned, the Teutonic influence has been so predominant as to be practically exclusive. Without gainsaying the value of this in the past, conditions have made the country ripe for a change, and the pre-eminence of Boston's great orchestra peculiarly fits it to be the leader in this movement."

How about the excellent Philadelphia Orchestra, of whose leader, Leopold Stokowski, becoming so in 1912, it says? "He was born in London, of a Polish father and an Irish mother, in 1882, and, coming to America in 1905, immediately announced his intention of becoming a citizen of this country. In due time this intention was realized." This is approximately six years before the Boston orchestra's said contribution to the "change."

"In making the necessary changes in the personnel, the trustees have exhibited that same painstaking effort which in other years has contributed so much to the success of the orchestra. The new concertmaster, Mr. Fradkin, is a musician and violinist of most unusual gifts, an American by birth, who won the first prize for violin in the Paris Conservatoire. The presence in this country of the famous French Military Band made possible the engagement of several remarkable artists, all graduates of the Conservatoire, who have won through service their release from further military duty. The vacancies in the string section have for the most part been filled by native Americans. Not only have these changes brought no sacrifice, but the orchestra is the stronger for them."

(Why, then, were "these changes" not made before? Does the Boston Orchestra mean to convey the impression that "native Americans" were not available before? This is not general belief).

However, it is hoped the orchestra now is, relevantly, wholly "a changed man," and it is certain that when it proves its claim of supremacy impartial critics will admit the proof freely and gladly.

LEDGER—PHILADELPHIA NOVEMBER 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

First Concert, Under Pierre Monteux, Brings Forward Florence Easton as the Soloist

Program

Frarnck.....D Minor Symphony
Schumann.....“Manfred” Overture
Mozart, Recitative and Aria from Mozart’s “Figaro”
Dukas.....“Le Peri”
Debussy....Recitative and Aria of Lia from “L’Infant Prodigue”
Debussy.....“Iberia”

The reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a very fine initial concert of a series of five at the Academy last night. The audience was somewhat smaller than usual. There were seats vacant in the parquet and the boxes. The disposition of those present was manifestly cordial toward conductor, players, soloist and all the music played, and it was apparent at once that the present and the future of a great American orchestra rest in safe and wholly competent hands.

Pierre Monteux, spared for the purpose by the Metropolitan Opera management, led in a way that showed he is no mere locum tenens until Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, appears. Merely as a feat of memory, his achievement of last night was extraordinary. His railed-off dais did not hold a stand, and even for the accompaniments of the soloists he had no score. The chop-and-change of Debussy's complex and varying rhythms in "Iberia" were the same open book to his photographic mind that Mozart's recitative and aria in their simpler form presented. He earned the appreciation of loyal Americans at the start by a version of the national air that was innocent of tricks, of ornament and orchestration. He showed himself a leader of grace coupled with force, of suavity in union with authority, of equipoise and temperance not wanting in temperament. He forbore to pose as a god in the musical machine and he put the music ahead of himself, where it should be.

The new concertmeister, Frederic Fradkin, plays with easy-going yet scrupulously accurate refinement, producing a full, round tone without agony. It was pleasant to recognize the veteran Alwin Schroeder once more with the cellos. At the celesta sat Carl Lamson, who was formerly Mr. Kreisler's accompanist.

The orchestra stood after the Franck symphony, at the bidding of an audience moved to admiration. Mr. Monteux had put his harpists (young Theodore Cella, of Philadelphia, one of the pair) at the rear of the cellos, and the effect in the allegretto movement was to make them members of the family. The English horn (whose inclusion elicited the protest of the conventional symphonists when the work was first played) descanted luscious sounds. In the Schumann overture the beautifully pure and fluent tone of the strings issued to especial advantage.

Madam Easton has already won her loyal public here by her admirable work as an opera singer, and her rare gifts were all in evidence last evening. A certain radiant, buoyant freshness of presence in red-flowered white satin gave itself with aptness to the lovely lyricism of Mozart—and nobody cared to remember to the mellifluous Italian text that the music was German. The words of Lia from Debussy (aged twenty-two, and in his early, unsophisticated method) were likewise declaimed with purity of voice and a sympathetic sincerity of manner. Madam Easton is a singer who rests her appeal on the straightforward technics and not the artificial strategics of her metier. She knows how to sing, and so she does not have to display meretricious bravura.

The "dance poem" of Dukas, "Le Peri," and the atmospheric, exotic tissue of vague, weird sounds denominated "Iberia" by Debussy rounded out the program. Both works are of the sort the orchestralist loves, for they individualize the instruments and give every player his own puzzle-problem in fingering or breathing. An audience that a third of a century ago (when this orchestra first came here) would have had no patience with such music heard it and liked it very much last night. "Iberia" was first performed nearly nine years ago. It seems almost old-fashioned in this futurist era.

F. L. W.

NEW YORK HERALD, NOVEMBER 8

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON; HAS FRENCH CONDUCTOR

Starts Thirty-Third Season, with Pierre Monteux in Place of Doktor Muck.

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, revised and reconstructed following the internment of Dr. Karl Muck as an enemy alien, opened its thirty-third season in New York with a concert at Carnegie Hall last night, with Pierre Monteux, French conductor, of the Metropolitan Opera House, as conductor. The occasion was notable, owing to the fact that the orchestra played for the first time in New York under another but German conductor.

The orchestra was greeted by an audience ebullient with enthusiasm over the war news, true or false, to an extent which, after the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," which Dr. Muck once refused to conduct, to open the proceedings, demanded more patriotic music, and Mr. Monteux responded first with the "Marsellaise," then with "God Save the King," and the Italian national anthem to finish up with, before the audience would quiet down to the serious musical business of the evening.

Apart from Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," which on this occasion sounded as dry as dust and hard as nails, the programme was composed entirely of music by French composers. Memories of the interpretation of Franck's D minor symphony, which opened the programme, by the French Orchestra was sufficiently recent and vivid to decidedly impair one's enjoyment of the work in the very muddy way it was perfor[illegible] last night. Mons. Monteux is a very [illegible]sistent conductor, anxious, as it w[illegible] ti dig out effects by the roots; and if [illegible] symphony, through his reading, ga[illegible] somewhat in force and dynamic effect [illegible] that of the French Orchestra it [illegible] definitely the mystic color, elasticity [illegible] nuance and subtle charm which sh[illegible] characterize the work.

For me a little of Paul Dukas go[illegible] long way, but the little we heard [illegible] night in the shape of "La Peri, a Da[illegible] Poem," showed the composer at his [illegible] in point of varied orchestral color [illegible] effect, and also at his worst in [illegible] of diffuseness of expression and lac[illegible] salient melodic material. This poem [illegible] set to music by Dukas, must have [illegible] very tempestuous and febrile in chara[illegible] and I tremble to think of the feelin[illegible] any dancer who danced it all.

But in this number the orchestra h[illegible] to play with something more of it[illegible] finesse and finish than had been exhi[illegible] before, and this evidence of orch[illegible] efficiency was fortunately again n[illegible] able in the playing of Dubussy's "Ibe[illegible] where both color and contrast in e[illegible] tion brought out with excellent ar[illegible] esults the impressionistic and w[illegible] aried imagery of this most picture[illegible] d typical work of its composer.

"he Boston Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] y another institution during the [illegible] had to suffer by the force ma[illegible] erse circumstance. It seems t[illegible] e concert of last night that [illegible] it were, to simmer and [illegible] the revisions and reconstr[illegible] nel, which they have been [illegible] o, and to a process of [illegible] re-adjustment, which M[illegible] takes charge beginnin[illegible] will doubtless be able [illegible] first afternoon concert [illegible] when Beethoven's "S[illegible] will be the piece de resi[illegible] at Carnegie Hall to-n[illegible]

Boston Players Led by Monteux At First Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra purged of its German conductor and regenerated by the infusion of more than a score of new players, gave its first concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was as large as ever, and, while there were many new faces to be seen, after a remarkable exhibition of exaltation in celebration of Victory, remained typical of New York's best musical intelligence and appreciation. First "The Star Spangled Banner" was played. Demands for "The Marseillaise" followed, next for "God Save the King" and, finally, for the "Marcia Reale." Patriotic fervor then subsided and the official programme was permitted to be carried out.

Pierre Monteux, who, by courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, has conducted the opening concerts of the organization in Boston this season, again was the leader, as he will be at the concert here on to-morrow afternoon. After that Henri Rabaud, another Frenchman, who has been engaged as successor to the interned Dr. Karl Muck, will take charge. Mr. Monteux showed vigorous qualities not anticipated and something lacking in poetic interpretation to be expected.

The programme consisted of Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Dukas's danced poem "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." There was harshness, not to say blatancy, in the orchestra's pronouncement of each of these works, save in the Dukas composition, unquestionably the best played. In that the suavity and grace to which this orchestra has accustomed us were maintained. Doubtless after Mr. Rabaud has welded the old and the new material together the virtues of this superb band, fostered by Mayor Higginson and developed under master conductors for o! these many years, will shine resplendent as ever.

Providence Journal

TO-NIGHT'S SYMPHONY CONCERT

To the Editor of the Journal:

That the people of Providence should accord the newly organized Boston Symphony Orchestra a rousing welcome, as suggested in your timely editorial in Thursday's Journal, is an appeal that ought to be reiterated often before Tuesday night.

America, by the winning of her great moral victory, becomes the leader of nations. Our country assumes henceforth a greater responsibility than was ever offered to a nation heretofore. This new responsibility includes not only the development of political, economic and social interests but also the development of cultural interests. We cannot hold our place unless we develop our every side; we cannot afford to expose any weakness in our new civilization. This country must strive to lead in art, in music and in literature.

Although the general interest in music that is beginning to show itself in such movements as community singing, municipal band concerts, municipal organs, etc., is a gratifying proof of increased interest, still these movements will not establish our country on any definite plane. Only by cultivation of the highest developments in art, such as is represented by symphonic music, can any degree of leadership be maintained. The previous to last spring the Boston Symphony Orchestra was accorded by critics the world over as high a place as any orchestra in existence and with the new personnel conducted by M. Rabaud and supported by the new management it will retain its former enviable position. Providing Americans will support by their attendance and enthusiasm the concerts offered us by this genuinely American organization.

EDWIN E. WIL[illegible]

Providence, Nov. 16.

STAR

ess: Baltimore, Md.

Officers and trustees of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. (recently reorganized), as published in the orchestra's Baltimore program booklet of November 6, 1918, are:

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president; Galen L. Stone, vice president; Frederick E. Lowell, treasurer, and trustees, all of the foregoing, and Ernest B. Dane, Mark A. De Wolfe Howe, John Ellerton Lodge, Arthur Lyman, Henry B. Sawyer and Bentley W. Warren.

om REPUBLICAN

ddress Springfield, Mass.

ate

Cambridge rather than Boston was the place of the American debut of the new Boston symphony conductor, Henri Rabaud. The orchestra had a concert scheduled at Sanders theater, Cambridge, last night, and as Mr Rabaud took charge of the orchestra a week ago, it naturally fell to him to lead the orchestra on this occasion. The Friday afternoon audience at Symphony hall has thus been deprived of its usual opportunity of being first to welcome a new conductor.

HERALD NOVEMBER 24

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will begin with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." The brilliant performance of this favorite overture at the last Cambridge concert led by Mr. Rabaud aroused enthusiasm. Mozart's "Jubilee" symphony will follow, for Mr. Rabaud is by no means Chauvenistic in his choice of compositions. Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" will be the third number. It will be interesting to hear this distinctively French composition conducted by a Frenchman. Borodin's superbly wild and barbaric symphony in B minor will bring the concert to an end.

A week from tonight the orchestra will leave Boston for its second trip.

NEW YORK TRIBUNE NOVEMBER 8

Music

Visit From the Boston Orchestra With a French Conductor

By H. E. Krehbiel

The Boston Orchestra, which departed from us last spring amid recriminations and heartburnings, and followed by regrets as well as imprecations because of its German conductor, returned to us at Carnegie Hall last night with a French leader of good local repute at its head. It was sped with contumely, it was welcomed with rejoicings. In the interim it has undergone constitutional changes as well as dynastic, but since in its home town its temporary conductor was received metaphorically with shouts of "The king is dead! Long live the king!" there is danger that we should be called unpatriotic did we not echo the cry. The organization comes back to us "as chastened and not killed" as Paul remarked to the Corinthians. It brings with it on this visit M. Pierre Monteux, of whose excellence as an operatic conductor the local public was well advised. Nevertheless it is a pleasure to say of him that in his new capacity he seemed as admirable as in that in which he had already won our admiration. It was a happy dispensation which brought him to us on a night when we could think of the gentleman interned at Oglethorpe with some of the goodwill which filled all hearts and yet with no regret that he was not at the head of the purged and purified organization. Purged and purified, but neither bettered nor worsened as much as was hoped and feared. The wind-choirs have suffered, both wood and brass, but that they are still capable is incontestable, and that M. Monteux has worked something like a miracle with the band is incontestable. Last night's audience, a fine one in number and character, was not in a captious mood, however. It rejoiced in the opportunity to hear the organization whose stiff-necked, short-sighted manager withheld "The Star-Spangled Banner" play not only that patriotic air, but also because insistent applause commanded also the national airs of France, England and Italy, and settled down to the conventional business of the evening only because it was a duty enforced by artistic propriety.

The programme was made up of César Franck's D minor symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," a "danced poem" entitled "La Péri," by Dukas, and the second of Debussy's "Images" entitled "Iberia." The performance of the symphony might under ordinary circumstances have tempted a comparison of reading and execution with the work done recently under M. Messager by the orchestra of the Conservatory. But we forbear beyond saying that while there was not finesse in the performance of the Frenchmen there was less academic rigidity and more virility in that of the band from Boston. The Debussy piece has been played here before by the Boston Orchestra as well as our own Philharmonic. By a coincidence, when Mr. Fiedler brought it forward some seven years ago, he also associated it with Franck's symphony. The circumstance was edifying for those who were able and willing to take note of the divergent trends of French music during the last generation, assuming that Cé[illegible] Franck is to be taken as a represen[illegible]tive of French and not Franco-Flem[illegible] music. The D minor symphony [illegible] been played so often in this city wit[illegible] the last few years that its defect[illegible] reiteration of theme and mood has b[illegible] so forced upon attention as to milit[illegible] a little unduly, perhaps, against [illegible] lofty beauty of the work. Its monot[illegible] has grown almost oppressive. But [illegible] is honest music, logical, consistent w[illegible] the materials, purposes and capaci[illegible] of the art, never straying outside [illegible] boundaries. Debussy's "Iberia" is i[illegible] vastly different case. As music it [illegible] chiefly concerned with an exploitat[illegible] of devices in orchestral combinati[illegible] and an attempt to appeal to the fa[illegible] and ear by extra musical means. [illegible] professes not only to depict s[illegible] scenes as the streets and bypaths [illegible] Spain and suggest the spirit of a Sp[illegible]ish festival, but also to give an [illegible]pression of the night air burdened w[illegible] odors.

That there may be some associat[illegible] between sounds, colors and odors is [illegible] ancient notion, and simultaneous [illegible]peals to optical, aural and olfact[illegible] nerves date back at least as far [illegible] Apuleius's sojourn in Alexandria. [illegible] know that when the intellect first gi[illegible] an impetus to the fancy much can [illegible] done in the way of juggling with [illegible] senses in music. Fantastic as it m[illegible] sound, we know that in the idyl[illegible] scene in "Siegfried" Wagner alm[illegible] makes the eyes hear and the ears se[illegible] but he first puts the picture and [illegible] dramatic situation before us. It is al[illegible] something more than mere fancy wh[illegible] after the storm scene in Beethove[illegible] "Pastoral" symphony the Ranz d[illegible] Vaches, which introduces the fin[illegible] movement, seems to make us feel a[illegible] freshened and reinvigorated atmosphere. And this magic is accomplished by purely musical means, aided but slightly by the verbal programme. But can even a programmatic title make the ear smell? A Viennese critic once professed that such a dreadful thing as a stench in the ear had been suggested to him when listening for the firs[illegible] time to Tschaikowsky's violin concerto but that was only a literary tric[illegible] caught from a German æstheticia[illegible] who had said that some pictures ha[illegible] a bad odor in the eye. Here criticis[illegible] has gone as far astray as the perform[illegible]ances which it is endeavoring to repr[illegible]bate. We see no struts, and we sme[illegible] no odors in Debussy's so-called "im[illegible]age." All that we do is to recogni[illegible] that Spanish rhythms and melodies o[illegible] a Spanish type have been put togethe[illegible] fragmentarily in a manner so inge[illegible]ious as to fascinate a sophisticated lis[illegible]tener. Musical themes based on exoti[illegible] scales are no more redolent of swee[illegible] perfumes than would be themes frank[illegible]ly conceived in the familiar diatonic modes; nor can they be made odorous by ingenious and novel combinations of orchestral voices.

A novelty in our concert rooms was the ballet music by Dukas, which wa[illegible] first heard in Paris five years ago, whe[illegible] the composition had its proper adjunct[illegible] of stage picture and pantomime. [illegible] might have made a different impressio[illegible] last night had the listeners been per[illegible]mitted to see and not merely imagin[illegible] the scene showing, as Mr. Hale tells [illegible] it did at the Châtelet Theatre, "go[illegible] mountains, crimson valleys and tre[illegible] bearing silver fruit," and also to wi[illegible]ness the choreographic acting ("min[illegible]ing" is the word since the Russia[illegible] dancers brought revelations to youn[illegible] reviewers) of Mademoiselle Trouha[illegible]owa, whose figure, we hope, is bett[illegible] for the eye than her name. The st[illegible] of the ballet tells how a young monarch journeyed to the ends of the earth in search of the lotus flower which was the symbol and badge of immortality, and at last found it in the hands of a peri. He snatched it from her, and she strove to regain it so that she might again approach the light which went out from Ormuzd, on the steps of whose hall Iskender had found her sleeping. And the face of the peri ravished the soul of the young King, which so swelled with longing that the lotus turned purple, whereby he knew that the flower of life was not for him. And the peri danced the dance of the peris, while the prince was torn between desire for her and life everlasting, until at last he gave back the flower, which now became as snow and gold commingled, as sunset upon a mountain. Then she faded away in the light which streamed from the calix of the lotus and vanished from his sight like a hand uplifting a flower of flame. An inviting theme, reminding one of the legend of "The blue flower which Brahmins say Blooms nowhere but in Paradise," but we should have had picture and action to stir the fancy and prevent the weariness which came from listening to multitudinous voices commingling short breathed phrases, over-persistent pedal points and tiresomely reiterated figures. It is decorative music, and we should have had before our eyes the pictures which it professed to decorate. Then, possibly, we should have found pretty associations between kaledioscopic mixtures of tones, golden mountains, crimson valleys and silver-fruited trees. Also perhaps with purple cows and blue moons.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

m STAR

dress: Baltimore, Md.

It remains for Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., to prove its assertion which it makes in its announcement folder being distributed in Baltimore that:

"Essentially, however, the orchestra remains what it has been for a generation, the greatest artistic possession of America."

This is a big assertion at any time for anyone, and under the circumstances of its reorganization it is still more assertive. The orchestra's official announcer may think so, and it may be so, but it did not prove it in Baltimore last Wednesday night at its first concedt here since reorganization, there is not unanimous opinion elsewhere supporting its claim so far, and the claim cannot be proven until the orchestra and its new director, Henri Rabaud, come to know each other thoroughly. In the meantime the public has a right to its own opinion and not to be caught by a self-assertion which excludes all others.

Neither is the official announcer reticent, otherwise, when he uses the word "remains" and the designation "greatest artistic possession of America." By this he boldly declares this organization above and excludes painting, sculpture, literature and all the other arts in the Western Hemisphere.

There is not the slightest objection by any impartial person to Boston Symphony Orchestra, Incorporated, being what it claims it is and more, if it can be so. The greater it or any other good organization can become, the greater good it can do for the world. May the orchestra prosper for accomplishment of this end.

There are 91 players in its present personnel list, divided into 30 first and second violins, 10 violas, 10 violoncellos, eight string contrabasses, three each of flutes, oboes, clarinets and bassons; one each of piccolo, English horn and bass clarinet; five French horns, four trumpets, three trombones, one tuba, two harps, two tympani, three of other percussion instruments, and one organ.

W. H. Brennan is now manager of the orchestra and G. E. Judd assistant manager.

In its folder referred to the announcer "lets down" the orchestra so:

"The Boston Spmphony Orchestra, in a sense, begins in this its thirty-eighth season a new era in its history. The retirement of Mr. Higginson has placed its government and maintenance in a board of trustees. For the first time since its organization its conductor is a Frenchman. For the first time its concertmaster is an American. The complexion of the personnel itself has changed greatly by the engagement of Americans and Frenchmen to fill the several vacancies in the ranks. Essentially, however, the orchestra remains what it has been for a generation, the greatest artistic possession of America.

"The engagement of Henri Rabaud as conductor must be regarded as a very happy and fortunate solution of a difficult problem. In him the trustees have secured a splendidly equipped musican, one of the most eminent conductors of France. Steeped in the finest traditions of French music, he is sympathetic with the best music of all schools and under him the catholicity which has always characterized Boston Symphony programs will not be lessened.

"This distinguished Frenchman, at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is certain to strike a new note in the music of this country and to have widespread influence. Until now, so far as orchestras are concerned, the Teutonic influence has been so predominant as to be practically exclusive. Without gainsaying the value of this in the past, conditions have made the country ripe for a change, and the pre-eminence of Boston's great orchestra peculiarly fits it to be the leader in this movement."

How about the excellent Philadelphia Orchestra, of whose leader, Leopold Stokowski, becoming so in 1912, it says? "He was born in London, of a Polish father and an Irish mother, in 1882, and, coming to America in 1905, immediately announced his intention of becoming a citizen of this country. In due time this intention was realized." This is approximately six years before the Boston orchestra's said contribution to the "change."

"In making the necessary changes in the personnel, the trustees have exhibited that same painstaking effort which in other years has contributed so much to the success of the orchestra. The new concertmaster, Mr. Fradkin, is a musician and violinist of most unusual gifts, an American by birth, who won the first prize for violin in the Paris Conservatoire. The presence in this country of the famous French Military Band made possible the engagement of several remarkable artists, all graduates of the Conservatoire, who have won through service their release from further military duty. The vacancies in the string section have for the most part been filled by native Americans. Not only have these changes brought no sacrifice, but the orchestra is the stronger for them."

(Why, then, were "these changes" not made before? Does the Boston Orchestra mean to convey the impression that "native Americans" were not available before? This is not general belief).

However, it is hoped the orchestra now is, relevantly, wholly "a changed man;" and it is certain that when it proves its claim of supremacy impartial critics will admit the proof freely and gladly.

LEDGER—PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

First Concert, Under Pierre Monteux, Brings Forward Florence Easton as the Soloist

Program

Franck.....D Minor Symphony
Schumann......"Manfred" Overture
Mozart.
Recitative and Aria from Mozart's "Figaro"
Dukas......"Le Peri"
Debussy....Recitative and Aria of Lia from "L'Infant Prodigue"
Debussy....."Iberia"

The reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a very fine initial concert of a series of five at the Academy last night. The audience was somewhat smaller than usual. There were seats vacant in the parquet and the boxes. The disposition of those present was manifestly cordial toward conductor, players, soloist and all the music played, and it was apparent at once that the present and the future of a great American orchestra rest in safe and wholly competent hands.

Pierre Monteux, spared for the purpose by the Metropolitan Opera management, led in a way that showed he is no mere locum tenens until Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, appears. Merely as a feat of memory, his achievement of last night was extraordinary. His railed-off dais did not hold a stand, and even for the accompaniments of the soloists he had no score. The chop-and-change of Debussy's complex and varying rhythms in "Iberia" were the same open book to his photographic mind that Mozart's recitative and aria in their simpler form presented. He earned the appreciation of loyal Americans at the start by a version of the national air that was innocent of tricks, of ornament and orchestration. He showed himself a leader of grace coupled with force, of suavity in union with authority, of equipoise and temperance not wanting in temperament. He forbore to pose as a god in the musical machine and he put the music ahead of himself, where it should be.

The new concertmeister, Frederic Fradkin, plays with easy-going yet scrupulously accurate refinement, producing a full, round tone without agony. It was pleasant to recognize the veteran Alwin Schroeder once more with the cellos. At the celesta sat Carl Lamson, who was formerly Mr. Kreisler's accompanist.

The orchestra stood after the Franck symphony, at the bidding of an audience moved to admiration. Mr. Monteux had put his harpists (young Theodore Cella, of Philadelphia, one of the pair) at the rear of the cellos, and the effect in the allegretto movement was to make them members of the family. The English horn (whose inclusion elicited the protest of the conventional symphonists when the work was first played) descanted luscious sounds. In the Schumann overture the beautifully pure and fluent tone of the strings issued to especial advantage.

Madam Easton has already won her loyal public here by her admirable work as an opera singer, and her rare gifts were all in evidence last evening. A certain radiant, buoyant freshness of presence in red-flowered white satin gave itself with aptness to the lovely lyricism of Mozart—and nobody cared to remember to the mellifluous Italian text that the music was German. The words of Lia from Debussy (aged twenty-two, and in his early, unsophisticated method) were likewise declaimed with purity of voice and a sympathetic sincerity of manner. Madam Easton is a singer who rests her appeal on the straightforward technics and not the artificial strategics of her metier. She knows how to sing, and so she does not have to display meretricious bravura.

The "dance poem" of Dukas, "Le Peri," and the atmospheric, exotic tissue of vague, weird sounds denominated "Iberia" by Debussy rounded out the program. Both works are of the sort the orchestralist loves, for they individualize the instruments and give every player his own puzzle-problem in fingering or breathing. An audience that a third of a century ago (when this orchestra first came here) would have had no patience with such music heard it and liked it very much last night. "Iberia" was first performed nearly nine years ago. It seems almost old-fashioned in this futurist era.

F. L. W.

STAR

ess: Baltimore, Md.

Officers and trustees of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. (recently reorganized), as published in the orchestra's Baltimore program booklet of November 6, 1918, are:

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president; Galen L. Stone, vice president; Frederick E. Lowell, treasurer, and, trustees, all of the foregoing, and Ernest B. Dane, Mark A. De Wolfe Howe, John Ellerton Lodge, Arthur Lyman, Henry B. Sawyer and Bentley W. Warren.

om REPUBLICAN

ddress Springfield, Mass.

ate

Cambridge rather than Boston was the place of the American debut of the new Boston symphony conductor, Henri Rabaud. The orchestra had a concert scheduled at Sanders theater, Cambridge, last night, and as Mr Rabaud took charge of the orchestra a week ago, it naturally fell to him to lead the orchestra on this occasion. The Friday afternoon audience at Symphony hall has thus been deprived of its usual opportunity of being first to welcome a new conductor.

NEW YORK HERALD, NOVEMBER 8.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON; HAS FRENCH CONDUCTOR

Starts Thirty-Third Season, with Pierre Monteux in Place of Doktor Muck

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, revised and reconstructed following the internment of Dr. Karl Muck as an enemy alien, opened its thirty-third season in New York with a concert at Carnegie Hall last night, with Pierre Monteux, French conductor, of the Metropolitan Opera House, as conductor. The occasion was notable, owing to the fact that the orchestra played for the first time in New York under another but German conductor.

The orchestra was greeted by an audience ebullient with enthusiasm over the war news, true or false, to an extent which, after the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," which Dr. Muck once refused to conduct, to open the proceedings, demanded more patriotic music, and Mr. Monteux responded first with the "Marseillaise," then with "God Save the King," and the Italian national anthem to finish up with, before the audience would quiet down to the serious musical business of the evening.

Apart from Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," which on this occasion sounded as dry as dust and hard as nails, the programme was composed entirely of music by French composers. Memories of the interpretation of Franck's D minor symphony, which opened the programme, by the French Orchestra was sufficiently recent and vivid to decidedly impair one's enjoyment of the work in the very muddy way it was perform last night. Mons. Monteux is a very sistent conductor, anxious, as it w ti dig out effects by the roots; and if symphony, through his reading, ga somewhat in force and dynamic effect that of the French Orchestra it definitely the mystic color, elasticity nuance and subtle charm which sh characterize the work.

For me a little of Paul Dukas go long way, but the little we heard night in the shape of "La Peri, a Da Poem," showed the composer at his in point of varied orchestral color effect, and also at his worst in of diffuseness of expression and lac salient melodic material. This poem set to music by Dukas, must have very tempestuous and febrile in chara and I tremble to think of the feelin any dancer who danced it all.

But in this number the orchestra b to play with something more of its finesse and finish than had been exhi before, and this evidence of orche efficiency was fortunately again n able in the playing of Dubussy's "Ib where both color and contrast in e tion brought out with excellent ar esults the impressionistic and w aried imagery of this most picture d typical work of its composer.

he Boston Symphony Orchestra, y another institution during the had to suffer by the force ma erse circumstance. It seems t se concerts of last night that it were, to simmer and the revisions and reconstr nel, which they have been o, and to a process of re-adjustment, which M takes charge beginnin will doubtless be able t first afternoon concert when Beethoven's "S will be the piece de resi at Carnegie Hall to-n

HERALD, NOVEMBER 24,

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will begin with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." The brilliant performance of this favorite overture at the last Cambridge concert led by Mr. Rabaud aroused enthsiasm. Mozart's "Jubilee" symphony will follow, for Mr. Rabaud is by no means Chauvenistic in his choice of compositions. Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" will be the third number. It will be interesting to hear this distinctively French composition conducted by a Frenchman. Borodin's superbly wild and barbaric symphony in B minor will bring the concert to an end.

A week from tonight the orchestra will leave Boston for its second trip.

WORLD, NOVEMBER 8

Boston Players Led by Monteux At First Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra purged of its German conductor and regenerated by the infusion of more than a score of new players, gave its first concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was as large as ever, and, while there were many new faces to be seen, after a remarkable exhibition of exaltation in celebration of Victory, remained typical of New York's best musical intelligence and appreciation. First "The Star Spangled Banner" was played. Demands for "The Marseillaise" followed, next for "God Save the King" and, finally, for the "Marcia Reale." Patriotic fervor then subsided and the official programme was permitted to be carried out.

Pierre Monteux, who, by courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, has conducted the opening concerts of the organization in Boston this season, again was the leader, as he will be at the concert here on to-morrow afternoon. After that Henri Rabaud, another Frenchman, who has been engaged as successor to the interned Dr. Karl Muck, will take charge. Mr. Monteux showed vigorous qualities not anticipated and something lacking in poetic interpretation to be expected.

The programme consisted of Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Dukas's danced poem "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." There was harshness, not to say blatancy, in the orchestra's pronouncement of each of these works, save in the Dukas composition, unquestionably the best played. In that the suavity and grace to which this orchestra has accustomed us were maintained. Doubtless after Mr. Rabaud has welded the old and the new material together the virtues of this superb band, fostered by Mayor Higginson and developed under master conductors for so these many years, will shine resplendent as ever.

Providence Journal

TO-NIGHT'S SYMPHONY CONCERT

To the Editor of the Journal:

That the people of Providence should accord the newly organized Boston Symphony Orchestra a rousing welcome, as suggested in your timely editorial in Thursday's Journal, is an appeal that ought to be reiterated often before Tuesday night.

America, by the winning of her great moral victory, becomes the leader of nations. Our country assumes henceforth a greater responsibility than was ever offered to a nation heretofore. This new responsibility includes not only the development of political, economic and social interests but also the development of cultural interests. We cannot hold our place unless we develop our every side; we cannot afford to expose any weakness in our new civilization. This country must strive to lead in art, in music and in literature.

Although the general interest in music that is beginning to show itself in such movements as community singing, municipal band concerts, municipal organs, etc., is a gratifying proof of increased interest, still these movements will not establish our country on any definite plane. Only by cultivation of the highest developments in art, such as is represented by symphonic music, can any degree of leadership be maintained. Previous to last spring the Boston Symphony Orchestra was accorded by critics the world over as high a place as any orchestra in existence and with the new personnel conducted by M. Rabaud and supported by the new management it will retain its former enviable position. Providing Americans will support by their attendance and enthusiasm the concerts offered us by this genuinely American organization.

EDWIN E. WIL

Providence, Nov. 16.

NEW YORK TRIBUNE, NOVEMBER 8

Music

Visit From the Boston Orchestra With a French Conductor

By H. E. Krehbiel

The Boston Orchestra, which departed from us last spring amid recriminations and heartburnings, and followed by regrets as well as imprecations because of its German conductor, returned to us at Carnegie Hall last night with a French leader of good local repute at its head. It was sped with contumely, it was welcomed with rejoicings. In the interim it has undergone constitutional changes as well as dynastic, but since in its home town its temporary conductor was received metaphorically with shouts of "The king is dead! Long live the king!" there is danger that we should be called unpatriotic did we not echo the cry. The organization comes back to us "as chastened and not killed" as Paul remarked to the Corinthians. It brings with it on this visit M. Pierre Monteux, of whose excellence as an operatic conductor the local public was well advised. Nevertheless it is a pleasure to say of him that in his new capacity he seemed as admirable as in that in which he had already won our admiration. It was a happy dispensation which brought him to us on a night when we could think of the gentleman interned at Oglethorpe with some of the goodwill which filled all hearts and yet with no regret that he was not at the head of the purged and purified organization. Purged and purified, but neither bettered nor worsened as much as was hoped and feared. The wind-choirs have suffered, both wood and brass, but that they are still capable is incontestable, and that M. Monteux has worked something like a miracle with the band is incontestable. Last night's audience, a fine one in number and character, was not in a captious mood, however. It rejoiced in the opportunity to hear the organization whose stiff-necked, short-sighted manager withheld "The Star-Spangled Banner" play not only that patriotic air, but also because insistent applause commanded also the national airs of France, England and Italy, and settled down to the conventional business of the evening only because it was a duty enforced by artistic propriety.

The programme was made up of César Franck's D minor symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," a "danced poem" entitled "La Péri," by Dukas, and the second of Debussy's "Images" entitled "Iberia." The performance of the symphony might under ordinary circumstances have tempted a comparison of reading and execution with the work done recently under M. Messager by the orchestra of the Conservatory. But we forbear beyond saying that while there was not finesse in the performance of the Frenchmen there was less academic rigidity and more virility in that of the band from Boston. The Debussy piece has been played here before by the Boston Orchestra as well as our own Philharmonic. By a coincidence, when Mr. Fiedler brought it forward some seven years ago, he also associated it with Franck's symphony. This circumstance was edifying for those who were able and willing to take note of the divergent trends of French music during the last generation, assuming that César Franck is to be taken as a representative of French and not Franco-Flemish music. The D minor symphony has been played so often in this city within the last few years that its defects of reiteration of theme and mood have been so forced upon attention as to militate a little unduly, perhaps, against the lofty beauty of the work. Its monotony has grown almost oppressive. But it is honest music, logical, consistent with the materials, purposes and capacities of the art, never straying outside its boundaries. Debussy's "Iberia" is in a vastly different case. As music it is chiefly concerned with an exploitation of devices in orchestral combination and an attempt to appeal to the fancy and ear by extra musical means. It professes not only to depict street scenes as the streets and bypaths of Spain and suggest the spirit of a Spanish festival, but also to give an impression of the night air burdened with odors.

That there may be some association between sounds, colors and odors is an ancient notion, and simultaneous appeals to optical, aural and olfactory nerves date back at least as far as Apuleius's sojourn in Alexandria. We know that when the intellect first gives an impetus to the fancy much can be done in the way of juggling with the senses in music. Fantastic as it may sound, we know that in the idyllic scene in "Siegfried" Wagner almost makes the eyes hear and the ears see, but he first puts the picture and the dramatic situation before us. It is also something more than mere fancy when, after the storm scene in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony the Ranz des Vaches, which introduces the final movement, seems to make us feel as if refreshened and reinvigorated atmosphere. And this magic is accomplished by purely musical means, aided but slightly by the verbal programme. But can even a programmatic title make the ear smell? A Viennese critic once professed that such a dreadful thing as a stench in the ear had been suggested to him when listening for the first time to Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, but that was only a literary trick caught from a German æsthetician who had said that some pictures had a bad odor in the eye. Here criticism has gone as far astray as the performances which it is endeavoring to reprobate. We see no struts, and we smell no odors in Debussy's so-called "image." All that we do is to recognize that Spanish rhythms and melodies of a Spanish type have been put together fragmentarily in a manner so ingenious as to fascinate a sophisticated listener. Musical themes based on exotic scales are no more redolent of sweet perfumes than would be themes frankly conceived in the familiar diatonic modes; nor can they be made odorous by ingenious and novel combinations of orchestral voices.

A novelty in our concert rooms was the ballet music by Dukas, which was first heard in Paris five years ago, when the composition had its proper adjuncts of stage picture and pantomime. It might have made a different impression last night had the listeners been permitted to see and not merely imagine the scene showing, as Mr. Hale tells us it did at the Châtelet Theatre, "golden mountains, crimson valleys and trees bearing silver fruit," and also to witness the choreographic acting ("miming" is the word since the Russian dancers brought revelations to young reviewers) of Mademoiselle Trouhanowa, whose figure, we hope, is better for the eye than her name. The story of the ballet tells how a young monarch journeyed to the ends of the earth in search of the lotus flower which was the symbol and badge of immortality, and at last found it in the hands of a peri. He snatched it from her, and she strove to regain it so that she might again approach the light which went out from Ormuzd, on the steps of whose hall Iskender had found her sleeping. And the face of the peri ravished the soul of the young King, which so swelled with longing that the lotus turned purple, whereby he knew that the flower of life was not for him. And the peri danced the dance of the peris, while the prince was torn between desire for her and life everlasting, until at last he gave back the flower, which now became as snow and gold commingled, as sunset upon a mountain. Then she faded away in the light which streamed from the calix of the lotus and vanished from his sight like a hand uplifting a flower of flame. An inviting theme, reminding one of the legend of "The blue flower which Brahmins say Blooms nowhere but in Paradise," but we should have had picture and action to stir the fancy and prevent the weariness which came from listening to multitudinous voices commingling short breathed phrases, over-persistent pedal points and tiresomely reiterated figures. It is decorative music, and we should have had before our eyes the pictures which it professed to decorate. Then, possibly, we should have found pretty associations between kaledioscopic mixtures of tones, golden mountains, crimson valleys and silver-fruited trees. Also perhaps with purple cows and blue moons.

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Symphony Concert

POST NOVEMBER 23

SYMPHONY PRESENTS EXTREMES

Sweet Lyrical and Ultra Modern Words Heard

BY OLIN DOWNES

The fourth programme of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, was soloist, playing the Grieg concerto. The purely orchestral compositions were Schubert's symphony in B minor and Saint-Saen's symphony in C minor, for big modern orchestra including the organ and piano, four hands.

WIDELY SEPARATED WORKS

No juxtaposition of two symphonies could have offered a more provocative comparison—on the one hand, the lyrical and profoundly emotional outpouring of the dreamer, Schubert, who left in the tragically uncomplete work the record of his last days as an artist, on the other, the elaborate architecture of Saint-Saens, an intellectual, a man of the world, author of a symphony which embodies modern ideas of musical development of which the simple Schubert surely never dreamed.

Neither man could have come remotely within distance of the other. Therefore it is the more interesting to consider the manner in which Saint-Saens treats a theme which has its genesis in a musical figure having more than a remote resemblance to a figure heard at the beginning of the symphony of Schubert!

Saint-Saens' Masterpiece

Saint-Saens would have understood Schubert's symphony better than the unsophisticated and comparatively unlearned Schubert would have understood the symphony of Saint-Saens. The symphony of Schubert is of course greater music, while as a musical edifice the symphony of Saint-Saens is considerably the more significant work of the two. Saint-Saens' themes assume a Proteus-like variety of manifestation. They are transformed, lengthened, broken apart, and one part pitted against the other. At last the thematic fragments cohere and combine in a sonorous and impressive finale. The structure is a colossal one. If some of the ideas are not in themselves worthy of the composer's intention, his skill in manipulating and building with them is past the praise of a dilettante who writes on a newspaper.

One realizes not only the breadth of Saint-Saens' musical knowledge and taste, but the profound earnestness shown by him in his desire to produce a French orchestral work worthy of the highest traditions of the symphonic form. Everything that modern composers had discovered when this work was written is exemplified in it. And yet—when a man writes music his heart cannot be greater than his heart. Saint-Saens' symphony has everything except the all-compelling spiritual urge that begets enduring masterpiece. The symphony of Schubert says things more personal, more profound, and music more romantic.

It is curious. The latter work is almost exactly in the symphonic mould as proved by the strict formulas, large-cast off today, of the early 19th century, yet it is subjective romanticism in itself in tones. The symphony of Saint-Saens confesses its indebtedness to Liszt, in particular, to Beethoven, to half a dozen others by whose discoveries and experiments the later composer profits. Yet this modern and eleborate symphony, comparatively free in its form, full of rich colors, and striking effects, seems today a classic of the most strictly classic sort, a monument of proportion, emotional restraint, enduring tradition.

It may be added that Saint-Saens' work had not been dreamed of as possessing so much force and form and grandeur as it was seen to have under Mr. Rabaud's baton yesterday. His performance was literally a revelation of the composition, which Dr. Muck played here under the eye of Saint-Saens himself in 1906. Mr. Rabaud's reading was a memorable one, and one which we are certain Saint-Saens himself would have gratefully applauded had he been present. Mr. Snow gave an admirable performance of the organ part.

Much could be said of the slow movement of Schubert's symphony, a movement in which every phrase was exquisitely moulded, when the orchestra played with that beauty of tone, and of individual parts—notably Mr. Longy's oboe—for which it has long been famous.

Mme. Samaroff's Playing

Mr. Rabaud grows on one as a conductor. His reading of standard orchestral works is never slavish routine and always distinguished by the utmost conviction and the finest taste. He will be heard next week in more modern music. His performances of yesterday afternoon were of the most admirable quality—this though the tone of the horn choir was lacking at times in clearness and brilliancy.

Then there was Mme. Samaroff, flourishing her pretty paws in the Grieg concerto. She gave an [illegible] often poetic rendering of the work. From a tendency to over-brilliancy and to a certain dryness of tone in the past she has gone over to a tone fuller, rounder and more singing than of yore, and a discretion in balancing with the orchestra, which was almost too pronounced on her part yesterday afternoon. She was recalled with much enthusiasm.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 23

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A TRANQUIL AND INTERESTING AFTERNOON

Mr. Rabaud and the Orchestra in a Remarkably Eloquent and Engrossing Performance of Saint-Saens's "Organ Symphony," but in a Somewhat Dry and Rigid Version of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" — Between, Grieg's Fading Concerto, with Mme. Samaroff Repressed

QUICKLY comes routine. To all appearances at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, Mr. Rabaud might have been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for two years instead of two weeks, with his hearers and his forces correspondingly accustomed to him. The usual applause greeted him as he came to his place; the usual playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner" ensued; for it is doubtful whether two ears in twenty in the audience note that Mr. Converse's arrangement is a new orchestral version of the hymn, stately and sonorous to its purpose. Conductor, orchestra and listeners then passed to a programme that might have been made for any Symphony Concert within the past twenty years—Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the concerto for piano by Grieg, Saint-Saëns's symphony in C minor with conspicuous organ part. The audience listened intently, applauded warmly—least for the concerto, most for the Parisian symphony. Outside a few restless spirits and tongues, few debated the quality of either the new orchestra or the new conductor. Every one stayed to the end; nearly every one departed content.

Not a ripple disturbed the tranquil pleasure of the day except, possibly, the watery green dress that clothed Mme. Samaroff, the pianist of the afternoon, as though she were come to play Ravel's aquatic "Undine" and not Grieg's high and dry concerto. There was even opportunity to speculate upon the seeming perplexities of the management in the arrangement of a United States flag above the stage. At the beginning of the season it hung pendant from the ceiling; a week ago it was outspread upon the pipes of the organ; yesterday it stood in perpendicular folds against them. So runs the calm record of a day that brought back recollection of the "soothing" quality once attributed to the Symphony Concerts by a well-intentioned man of business in a speech to a retiring conductor. The speaker meant to please; the conductor chose to be irritated—all of which is neither here nor there. Suffice it that yesterday the afternoon audience had regained nearly normal numbers—happy omen for the new régime if only the company assembling on Saturday evenings similarly mounts.

If every conductor must have a "specialty" as well as be the "all-'round" leader that the office implies, then Mr. Rabaud's, so far as two pairs of concerts have disclosed him, is the music of Saint-Saëns. A week ago, he and the orchestra wove with blended exactitude and elasticity the pattern of the Parisian's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," set the music in the clearest possible light, polished every detail of an assiduous workmanship, fused in perfect unity poetic imagery and tonal progress. Not within memory hereabouts has the cool music of Saint-Saëns been so artfully chiselled. Yesterday, with the symphony in C minor, Mr. Rabaud and his forces excelled even this achievement, not only continuing the chiselling, but actually warming the material and the method into emotional heat. For once a piece by Saint-Saëns not only interested the mind of the hearer, pleased his taste, intrigued his musical scholarship, but warmed his heart as well. Out of himself, as it seemed, out of a deep and congenial devotion, Mr. Rabaud often transformed what usually seems a music of calculation and reflection into a music of propulsive power and eloquence. This symphony in C minor is no new thing. For years it has had intermittent place in the repertory of the Symphony Concerts, whoever the conductor. Every one who reads the programme-book—and who does not?—knows by this time the composer's somewhat proclamatory attitude with regard to it—his intention to enrich the orchestra, as enrichment went modestly in the eighties, with the swelling voice of the organ, the scintillant voice of the piano; his inclination to freedom of form, since these were the days in which Saint-Saëns was studious of the ways of Liszt and well disposed toward the procedures of Wagner. Hence the division of the symphony into two parts with a single pause, which is no more than discreet veiling and mild transmutation of orthodox process, since the first "part" obviously consists of slow introduction, concise allegro and more expansive slow movement; while the second leads as transparently through introduction and scherzo into sonorous finale. Hence, also, a Lisztian fondness for recurring motives as a means to unity and a snapping, scintillant scherzo with hint here and there of Lisztian deviltry. Hence, too, as in the more songful measures of the slow movement, an occasional clear Wagnerian tang. From his eighth to his eightieth year processes, workmanship have preoccupied Saint-Saëns. Being luminous, exact, sedulous with them, he would have them equally preoccupy his audiences. Possibly, by this very quality, his music endures the years so well, is heard so often. For upon style and the pleasures of style Time blunts its gnawing teeth.

Unlike many a predecessor with the symphony Mr. Rabaud was not content with lucid revelation of Saint-Saëns's design, clear exposition, cool manipulation and large cumulation of his melodies, dutiful and pointing heed to details, calm [illegible]smission of surface-voice and mo[illegible] Rather, he woke a music that can s[illegible]m all cerebral exactitude and supe[illegible]cial dexterity [illegible] an inner and emotion[illegible] life of its own [illegible] these remarkable [illegible] to his more sophisticated auditors they were such—by a pace that vitalized Saint-Saëns's motives into melody, that imparted to them a clear ardor of progress; by a rhythmic zest that heightened their vitality and motion; by incisiveness of accent and warmth of color as the music variously bade; by play of large design and upswelling climax; by sincere emotional response to a music often presumed to bear no emotion except that of a symphonic scheme well planned and well accomplished. With the orchestra yielding him a sensuous, elastic, euphonious and expressive tone, he gave the slow movement with which the first part ends, a veritable beauty, dry if the listener will, but beauty still and beauty born of as veritable a contemplative emotion. For once, albeit in his own way, Saint-Saëns was scaling the heavens and bearing his hearers on his quest. If the Parisian may not write a mystical tonal poetry in the manner of Franck, he may at least achieve a mystical tonal prose. Again with the scherzo of the second part, Mr. Rabaud gained a fantastic diablerie of mood, fancy, stroke, which was no mere technical jugglery with showering arpeggi, slithering scales and chopped rhythms. Then the finale, in which the conductor attained the long, spacious, ardent advance, the mighty outspreading and enfolding cumulation that elsewhere have proved him a master of climax. So the symphony sounded by no small addition of Henri Rabaud to Camille Saint-Saëns.

On the other hand, with the fragment that is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, neither conductor nor orchestra succeeded so well. Especially in the more strenuous measures of the allegro moderato, the instrumental voices sounded coarse, opaque, needlessly heavy-footed; again in the songful andante, they lacked the transparency, the elasticity, the edgeless flow of Schubert lyric, even sentimental. For the first time in Boston, the band seemed to be playing as report says it played on those two beset days in New York. Particularly in the slow movement, somewhere beween conductor and orchestra, the fine ear essential to the full beauty and charm of Schubert's music was missing. Moreover, was not Mr. Rabaud, in curious contrast to the Rabaud of Saint-Saëns's symphony, somewhat too cerebral, too austere with the whole music? Agreed that this gravity, this force suits the more impassioned voice, the occasional grimness even, of many a period, of many a solemn intervention in the first movement. Here, unmistakably, is music of a Schubert deepening, capable of tragic mood, courting power in the expression of it. Granted the elegiac, the mourning vein of other measures varying, continuing such mood. Yet soon emerges Schubert, the long-breathed singer for the sake of song, wreathing it in flowing counterpoint, smiling, almost, in innocent delight with spontaneous process, even when the mood behind is as troubled as that of this allegro moderato. The zest of music-making softens, as the movement proceeds, even a tragically-minded Schubert, while Mr. Rabaud would hold him grim to the end.

Still more with the succeeding andante of pure lyric flow, of melody welling from one choir to another, almost from instrument to instrument, ever finding new garlands of counterpoint or ornament, modulated as by a hundred quick impulses, warmed by the sentiment that in Schubert breeds song. The outcome is the loveliness of such sound upon ear and fancy. The mind does not measure, but sensation and sentiment stir in the hearer no less than in the composer. Now, as it seemed yesterday, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra stopped short at painstaking exposition of this second movement; they missed grace, charm, spontaneity, euphonious flow. They were dry and firm where they should have been lissome, transparent. A sentimental music of the heart and impulse is such and nothing else. There is no making it music of the brain and meditation and not stripping it thereby out of a sun-shot poetry into a lustreless prose. There have been better days than yesterday for Schubert at the Symphony Concerts.

Between the two symphonies, alike in the sequence of the programme and the quality of the performance, stood Grieg's concerto. The enthusiasts, either for praise or dispraise of Greig's music, will allow mere detached listeners to it no privilege of middle ground. Like all the rest of the Norwegian's pieces in their ears, this concerto is either a work of plenary inspiration from shadowy beginning to vociferous close, or else a dull, halting, threadbare thing on the way to deserved oblivion. The more precarious, then, the footing of those who will not take sides. The detractors hold out hands, the apostles withdraw them, when such listeners regret Grieg's tendency to over-emphasis as though he were never quite sure that his thoughts and moods in music would speak for themselves, or hint that not a few measures in the concerto now sound empty and inflated. The advocates are kindly, the opponents resentful, when those same moderates find pleasure in the springy melodies, the spirited rhythms, the happy up-leapings of the finale or in the moody charm and romantic glamor of the slow movement. All three can agree only that in the concerto Grieg is adroit in fusing or contrasting such opposed voices as those of piano and orchestra and that in the whole piece he is more sustained and less fitful of speech than was his later wont.

Again, moreover, the music seemed somewhat dryly played, with Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra faithful, sensitive, supple in accompaniment, but with Mme. Samaroff foregoing her usual nervous energy. Of old it was her most characteristic possession as pianist. Often it tipped her playing with fire, touched it, even, with brilliance. There were hints, indeed, yesterday, of this animating glow in the rhythmic verve and quick plasticity of her playing of the finale; but in the first movement she was content with little more than exposition of the music in hand. Dry was her touch; brittle was her tone. Even in the slow song, when Grieg seemed to soften her fingers, round her tone, mould and melt her phrases, the listener still heard the piano less as the transfigured voice of music than as an instrument in which little felt hammers fall upon vibrating wires at the touch of keys.

H. T. P.

Traveler Nov. 23

SAMAROFF PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

One of the largest audiences of the season filled Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the regular Friday afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program was an attractive one: Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Grieg's Concerto in A-Minor for Pianoforte, and Saint-Saens's C-Minor Symphony. But it was evident something more than the program accounted for the increased attendance. That something developed when Mme. Samaroff, pianist, the soloist of the afternoon, came on the stage. Instantly the whole house was attention, and was so pleased with her playing of the Grieg selection it recalled and recalled her at the close of the number.

Mr. Rabaud's reading of Schubert was so well liked he had to return to the stage several times before the applause could be silenced.

For many, however, the Saint-Saens number, with Albert Snow at the organ and Alfred De Voto at the piano, was the number of the afternoon. It was exceptionally well given and fully merited the enthusiasm it aroused.

Globe Nov. 23

RABAUD LEADS FINE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme Samaroff Pleases in Grieg Concerto

Mr Rabaud gave further proof of the fine qualities of his conducting yesterday. His "unfinished" symphony was exquisite romantic lyricism. The orchestra, attuning its voice to sheer and transparent beauty, sang the heavenly melodies of Schubert with tenderness, with grace, with a vernal freshness and animation, always as though with devotion. The strand was finely woven, one instrument taking with gallantry or with a curtsy the theme from the mouth of another, and spinning it into new loveliness. The slow movement was enchanting in its gentle melancholy, in the answering solace of its imperturbable calm, in a classic repose which by the plasticity and sympathy of Mr Rabaud's treatment became imaginative, even improvisational.

If the conductor brought to us Schubert as a charming and spontaneous singer, he only went from one romanticist to another of more modern idiom and palette in Grieg's piano concerto in A minor, for which Mme Olga Samaroff was the soloist. Mr Rabaud's reading of this poignantly imaginative score was one of many moments of happy appreciation and sympathy. How hauntingly beautiful the introduction to the adagio for muted strings, with the darkly impassioned song of the 'cellos, and how autobiographical of Grieg!

Again in Saint-Saens' organ symphony, Mr Rabaud took due note of the polished expression, the characteristic pomp in sonorities as in rhythmical figuration; the equally characteristic elegance which never fails the conductor's senior countryman, and on occasion becomes majestic, as in the pontifical entrance of the organ, the pedals supporting the pageantry of the strings and rearing in dim vastness the curve of the cathedral nave. The organ was played yesterday by Albert Snow with discreet and expressive registration, with precision and taste.

Mme Samaroff has now in her playing a warmer feeling for the poetic content. The interim has added imagination and perception to performance. Fortunately she is not a heroic pianist. May she never become one. Her playing suggests visions. That is enough for the piano. It need not claim dominion over the air, the land and the sea. There was distinction, a fine sense of proportion in the curve of many a phrase—in the rhythmically satisfying announcement of the first theme of the first movement, which the pianist developed admirably in the cadenza, in the lyric quality of the second, and in the sturdy dance figure of the last. While there are pianists who play louder or with more theatrical brilliance, Mme Samaroff has given very rewarding attention to some of the most vital phases of the great art of expression.

RECORD, NOVEMBER 15,

SAMAROFF RETURNS AS SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

OLGA SAMAROFF

Olga Samaroff, the pianist, will play for the first time in Boston in several seasons at the Symphony concerts the coming week. Since her marriage to Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, Mme. Samaroff has done comparatively little concert work. She will play the Grieg concerto in A minor. The orchestra will play Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and the "Organ" Symphony of Saint-Saens, the C minor, No. 3. In this number the organ will be played by Albert Snow.

The Sunday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall this week will be given by Josef Hoffmann. As is his custom, Mr. Hoffmann will play the entire program without leaving the stage. This he does so as not to break the trend of thought of his audience.

On his program stands a Chopin group and various pieces by Handel, Scarlatti, Beethoven, Rubinstein, Moszkowsky and Liszt.

Roland M. Hayes, tenor, assisted by W. S. Lawrence, pianist, and an orchestra, will give a recital at Symphony Hall Thursday evening, Nov. 21.

52

WEEK-END CONCERTS

A NOTABLE YOUNG VIOLINIST, AND OTHER INCIDENTS

The Symphony Orchestra and Its Public of Saturday Nights — The Uncommon Interest and Merit of Mr. Vidas, and the Clear Suggestion of Mr. Kreisler in His Playing—The Cerebral Miss Renard —Intermezzo for Mr. Hofmann and Self-Defence—Mr. Havens in Various Degrees

ON Saturday evenings, much more than on Friday afternoons, the number and the quality of the audience in Symphony Hall is test of the disposition of the public toward the Symphony Concerts. At the matinée, social cachet, the convenience of suburban folk and other extraneous factors increase the listening company; by night the hearers assemble only from the interest they feel in the concerts and in the pleasure they anticipate from them. The more, then, is it good to see these audiences of Saturday evenings regaining the numbers from which they declined last year until, often, the hall was but thinly peopled. So far this autumn, through the two concerts conducted by Mr. Monteux, through the two led by Mr. Rabaud, it has seemed, on the contrary, well filled. True, the audiences of Saturday have not risen to the dimensions they maintained in the season before the United States entered the late war; but the optimistic believe they will; while the pessimistic may note the present evidence of increasing numbers. For too long, it has been just reproach to Boston that, while in other cities, regularly visited, the Symphony Orchestra could fill large halls to the last sitting or standing room, at home, on Saturday evenings it played to visible empty chairs. In these things, as it also happens, not only is the prestige of the Symphony Concerts at stake, but in a sense also the continuance of them. Often in his day, Mr. Higginson said that he would not have maintained them, had the public failed to respond to them. Presumably, the present trustees are like-minded. Moreover, as not a few know, there were those in New York, last spring, ready and also able to transfer thither the Symphony Orchestra en bloc, had Boston failed to reconstitute and preserve it. Presumably again, they continue in this state of mind and resources. The more stimulating, thus, is the present increase in the audiences of Saturday and the more desirable is it that the expansion continue.

To note these audiences of the evening is to discover speedily that the lowest priced seats are proportionately the best tenanted. At the back of the second balcony, farthest from the stage, there is for example, not a vacant seat; while the ratio of empty places is lower in the rows of medium price than in those where sitting sell dearest. As clearly as outward signs may indicate, the public of Saturday evenings at Symphony Hall is becoming a public of moderate means, assembling out of interest in the music and the performance and deserving to be encouraged as such. Upon this public, even, essentially young, keen and fast, sure to widen if it is cultivated wisely, the future of the Symphony Concerts and of the Symphony Orchestra in Boston depends. Social sanctities now bring into Symphony Hall on Saturday evening not many more come thither because at the back of their heads is a notion that they are sustaining a "Boston institution." The elder generation of the eighties and the nineties is unmistakably passing; the new has no other incentive than the quality and the pleasure of the concerts. The more the reason, then, that trustees and management should maintain both at the highest possible level and cultivate with the utmost care so well disposed a public. Relatively inexpensive seats are in numerous on Saturday evenings; but knowledge of them is not so widespread among possible comers as it well might be.

Traveler Nov. 16

RABAUD TO GIVE THE "UNFINISHED"

Henri Rabaud offers a striking program for the fourth pair of Symphony concerts, next week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished." Then there will be Grieg's Concerto in A minor, with Madame Olga Samaroff at the piano and the "Organ" symphony of Saint-Saens with Albert Snow at the organ.

Madame Samaroff has not appeared on the concert stage in this city since her marriage to Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra. Mr. Snow is organist and choirmaster at Emmanuel Church.

Herald Nov. 24

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will begin with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." The brilliant performance of this favorite overture at the last Cambridge concert led by Mr. Rabaud aroused enthusiasm. Mozart's "Jubilee" symphony will follow, for Mr. Rabaud is by no means Chauvenistic in his choice of compositions. Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" will be the third number. It will be interesting to hear this distinctively French composition conducted by a Frenchman. Borodin's superbly wild and barbaric symphony in B minor will bring the concert to an end.

A week from tonight the orchestra leave Boston for its second trip

e Journal
PHONY CONCERT
the Journal: of Providence should ganized Boston Symrousing welcome; as timely editorial in is an appeal that ed often before Tues-winning of her great mes the leader of na-assumes henceforth ibility than was ever heretofore. This new des not only the deal, economic and so-the development of

We cannot hold our
velop our every side;
to expose any weak-vilization. This coun-lead in art, in music

neral interest in music, to show itself in such munity singing, municts, municipal organs, proof of increasing movements will not ntry on any definite ltivation of the highest art, such as is reprenic music, can any debe maintained. Pre-
the Boston Symphony
ecorded by critics the
a place as any orchesnd with the new per-
M. Rabaud and sup-w management it can enviable position pro-kill support by their thusiasm the concerts enuinely American or-
EDWIN E. WILDE.
16.

MBER 8

M ics elephone over 6514

nd the like, such actually taken be compensating adjustments.

d Credit

e firmer yesterday
ment withdrawals anks. Nearly $70,- wn yesterday and
vious day, it was f the government easing in money
d the payment of on the fourth Lib-ng rate on mixed

o make us feel a invigorated atmos-agic is accomplished means, aided but bal programme. But matic title make the nese critic once pro-dreadful thing as had been suggest-tening for the first
y's violin concerto;
a literary trick
erman æsthetician some pictures had
ve. Here criticism
ay as the performdeavoring to reprouts, and we smell
y's so-called "im-do is to recognize s and melodies of been put together manner so ingensophisticated lises based on exotic
redolent of sweet be themes frank-familiar diatonic be made odorous ovel combinations

concert rooms was Dukas, which was ve years ago, when its proper adjuncts
d pantomime. It ifferent impression listeners been perot merely imagine s Mr. Hale tells us let Theatre, "gold valleys and trees
" and also to withic acting ("mimince the Russian elations to young moiselle Trouhan-
e hope, is better
name. The story

POST NOVEMBER 23

SYMPHONY PRESENTS EXTREMES

Sweet Lyrical and Ultra Modern Words Heard

BY OLIN DOWNES

The fourth programme of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, was soloist, playing the Grieg concerto. The purely orchestral compositions were Schubert's symphony in B minor and Saint-Saen's symphony in C minor, for big modern orchestra including the organ and piano, four hands.

WIDELY SEPARATED WORKS

No juxtaposition of two symphonies could have offered a more provocative comparison—on the one hand, the lyrical and profoundly emotional outpouring of the dreamer, Schubert, who left in the tragically uncomplete work the record of his last days as an artist, on the other, the elaborate architecture of Saint-Saens, an intellectual, a man of the world, author of a symphony which embodies modern ideas of musical development of which the simple Schubert surely never dreamed.

Neither man could have come remotely within distance of the other. Therefore it is the more interesting to consider the manner in which Saint-Saens treats a theme which has its genesis in a musical figure having more than a remote resemblance to a figure heard at the beginning of the symphony of Schubert!

Saint-Saens' Masterpiece

Saint-Saens would have understood Schubert's symphony better than the unsophisticated and comparatively unlearned Schubert would have understood the symphony of Saint-Saens. The symphony of Schubert is of course greater music, while as a musical edifice the symphony of Saint-Saens is considerably the more significant work of the two. Saint-Saens' themes assume a Proteus-like variety of manifestation. They are transformed, lengthened, broken apart, and one pitted against the other. At last the thematic fragments cohere and combine in a sonorous and impressive final. The structure is a colossal one. If of the ideas are not in themselves worthy of the composer's intention, his skill in manipulating and building with them is past the praise of a dilettante who writes on a newspaper.

One realizes not only the breadth of Saint-Saens' musical knowledge and taste, but the profound earnestness shown by him in his desire to produce a French orchestral work worthy of the highest traditions of the symphonic form. Everything that modern composers had discovered when this work was written is exemplified in it. And yet—when a man writes music his heart cannot be greater than his heart. Saint-Saens' symphony has everything except the all-compelling spiritual urge that begets enduring masterpiece. The symphony of Schubert says things more personal, more profound, and much more romantic.

It is curious. The latter work is almost exactly in the symphonic mould as proved by the strict formulas, large cast off today, of the early 19th century, yet it is subjective romanticism itself in tones. The symphony of Saint-Saens confesses its indebtedness to Liszt in particular, to Beethoven, to half a dozen others by whose discoveries and experiments the later composer profited. Yet this modern and eleborate symphony, comparatively free in its form, full of rich colors, and striking effects, seems today a classic of the most strictly classic sort, a monument of proportion, emotional restraint, enduring tradition.

It may be added that Saint-Saens' work had not been dreamed of as possessing so much force and form and grandeur as it was seen to have under Mr. Rabaud's baton yesterday. His performance was literally a revelation of the composition, which Dr. Muck played here under the eye of Saint-Saens himself in 1906. Mr. Rabaud's reading was a memorable one, and one which we are certain Saint-Saens himself would have gratefully applauded had he been present. Mr. Snow gave an admirable performance of the organ part.

Much could be said of the slow movement of Schubert's symphony, a movement in which every phrase was exquisitely moulded, when the orchestra played with that beauty of tone, and of individual parts—notably Mr. Longy's oboe—for which it has long been famous.

Mme. Samaroff's Playing

Mr. Rabaud grows on one as a conductor. His reading of standard orchestral works is never slavish routine and always distinguished by the utmost conviction and the finest taste. He will be heard next week in more modern music. His performances of yesterday afternoon were of the most admirable quality—this though the tone of the horn choir was lacking at times in clearness and brilliancy.

Then there was Mme. Samaroff, flourishing her pretty paws in the Grieg concerto. She gave an [illegible] and often poetic rendering of the work. From a tendency to over-brilliancy and to a certain dryness of tone in the past she has gone over to a tone fuller, rounder and more singing than of yore, and a discretion in balancing with the orchestra, which was almost too pronounced on her part yesterday afternoon. She was recalled with much enthusiasm.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 23

Symphony Concert

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A TRANQUIL AND INTERESTING AFTERNOON

Mr. Rabaud and the Orchestra in a Remarkably Eloquent and Engrossing Performance of Saint-Saens's "Organ Symphony," but in a Somewhat Dry and Rigid Version of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" — Between, Grieg's Fading Concerto, with Mme. Samaroff Repressed

QUICKLY comes routine. To all appearances at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, Mr. Rabaud might have been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for two years instead of two weeks, with his hearers and his forces correspondingly accustomed to him. The usual applause greeted him as he came to his place; the usual playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner" ensued; for it is doubtful whether two ears in twenty in the audience note that Mr. Converse's arrangement is a new orchestral version of the hymn, stately and sonorous to its purpose. Conductor, orchestra and listeners then passed to a programme that might have been made for any Symphony Concert within the past twenty years—Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the concerto for piano by Grieg, Saint-Saëns's symphony in C minor with conspicuous organ part. The audience listened intently, applauded warmly—least for the concerto, most for the Parisian symphony. Outside a few restless spirits and tongues, few debated the quality of either the new orchestra or the new conductor. Every one stayed to the end; nearly every one departed content.

Not a ripple disturbed the tranquil pleasure of the day except, possibly, the watery green dress that clothed Mme. Samaroff, the pianist of the afternoon, as though she were come to play Ravel's aquatic "Undine" and not Grieg's high and dry concerto. There was even opportunity to speculate upon the seeming perplexities of the management in the arrangement of a United States flag above the stage. At the beginning of the season it hung pendant from the ceiling; a week ago it was outspread upon the pipes of the organ; yesterday it stood in perpendicular folds against them. So runs the calm record of a day that brought back recollection of the "soothing" quality once attributed to the Symphony Concerts by a well-intentioned man of business in a speech to a retiring conductor. The speaker meant to please; the conductor chose to be irritated—all of which is neither here nor there. Suffice it that yesterday the afternoon audience had regained nearly normal numbers—happy omen for the new régime if only the company assembling on Saturday evenings similarly mounts.

If every conductor must have a "speciality" as well as be the "all-'round" leader that the office implies, then Mr. Rabaud's, so far as two pairs of concerts have disclosed him, is the music of Saint-Saëns. A week ago, he and the orchestra wove with blended exactitude and elasticity the pattern of the Parisian's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," set the music in the clearest possible light, polished every detail of an assiduous workmanship, fused in perfect unity poetic imagery and tonal progress. Not within memory hereabouts has the cool music of Saint-Saëns been so artfully chiselled. Yesterday, with the symphony in C minor, Mr. Rabaud and his forces excelled even this achievement, not only continuing the chiselling, but actually warming the material and the method into emotional heat. For once a piece by Saint-Saëns not only interested the mind of the hearer, pleased his taste, intrigued his musical scholarship, but warmed his heart as well. Out of himself, as it seemed, out of a deep and congenial devotion, Mr. Rabaud often transformed what usually seems a music of calculation and reflection into a music of propulsive power and eloquence.

This symphony in C minor is no new thing. For years it has had intermittent place in the repertory of the Symphony Concerts, whoever the conductor. Every one who reads the programme-book—and who does not?—knows by this time the composer's somewhat proclamatory attitude with regard to it—his intention to enrich the orchestra, as enrichment went modestly in the eighties, with the swelling voice of the organ, the scintillant voice of the piano; his inclination to freedom of form, since these were the days in which Saint-Saëns was studious of the ways of Liszt and well disposed toward the procedures of Wagner. Hence the division of the symphony into two parts with a single pause, which is no more than discreet veiling and mild transmutation of orthodox process, since the first "part" obviously consists of slow introduction, concise allegro and more expansive slow movement; while the second leads as transparently through introduction and scherzo into sonorous finale. Hence, also, a Lisztian fondness for recurring motives as a means to unity and a snapping, scintillant scherzo with hint here and there of Lisztian deviltry. Hence, too, as in the more songful measures of the slow movement, an occasional clear Wagnerian tang. From his eighth to his eightieth year processes, workmanship have preoccupied Saint-Saëns. Being luminous, exact, sedulous with them, he would have them equally preoccupy his audiences. Possibly, by this very quality, his music endures the years so well, is heard so often. For upon style and the pleasures of style Time blunts its gnawing teeth.

Unlike many a predecessor with the symphony Mr. Rabaud was not content with lucid revelation of Saint-Saëns's design, clear exposition, cool manipulation and large cumulation of his melodies, dutiful and pointing heed to details, calm transmission of surface-voice and mood. Rather, he woke a music that can [illegible] all cerebral exactitude and superficial dexterity to an inner and emotional life of its own. He achieved these remarkable things to his more sophisticated auditors they were such—by a pace that vitalized Saint-Saëns's motives into melody, that imparted to them a clear ardor of progress; by a rhythmic zest that heightened their vitality and motion; by incisiveness of accent and warmth of color as the music variously bade; by play of large design and upswelling climax; by sincere emotional response to a music often presumed to bear no emotion except that of a symphonic scheme well planned and well accomplished. With the orchestra yielding him a sensuous, elastic, euphonious and expressive tone, he gave the slow movement with which the first part ends, a veritable beauty, dry if the listener will, but beauty still and beauty born of as veritable a contemplative emotion. For once, albeit in his own way, Saint-Saëns was scaling the heavens and bearing his hearers on his quest. If the Parisian may not write a mystical tonal poetry in the manner of Franck, he may at least achieve a mystical tonal prose. Again with the scherzo of the second part, Mr. Rabaud gained a fantastic diablerie of mood, fancy, stroke, which was no mere technical jugglery with showering arpeggi, slithering scales and chopped rhythms. Then the finale, in which the conductor attained the long, spacious, ardent advance, the mighty outspreading and enfolding cumulation that elsewhere have proved him a master of climax. So the symphony sounded by no small addition of Henri Rabaud to Camille Saint-Saëns.

On the other hand, with the fragment that is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, neither conductor nor orchestra succeeded so well. Especially in the more strenuous measures of the allegro moderato, the instrumental voices sounded coarse, opaque, needlessly heavy-footed; again in the songful andante, they lacked the transparency, the elasticity, the edgeless flow of Schubert lyric, even sentimental. For the first time in Boston, the band seemed to be playing as report says it played on those two beset days in New York. Particularly in the slow movement, somewhere beween conductor and orchestra, the fine ear essential to the full beauty and charm of Schubert's music was missing. Moreover, was not Mr. Rabaud, in curious contrast to the Rabaud of Saint-Saëns's symphony, somewhat too cerebral, too austere with the whole music? Agreed that this gravity, this force suits the more impassioned voice, the occasional grimness even, of many a period, of many a solemn intervention in the first movement. Here, unmistakably, is music of a Schubert deepening, capable of tragic mood, courting power in the expression of it. Granted the elegiac, the mourning vein of other measures varying, continuing such mood. Yet soon emerges Schubert, the long-breathed singer for the sake of song, wreathing it in flowing counterpoint, smiling, almost, in innocent delight with spontaneous process, even when the mood behind is as troubled as that of this allegro moderato. The zest of music-making softens, as the movement proceeds, even a tragically-minded Schubert, while Mr. Rabaud would hold him grim to the end.

Still more with the succeeding andante of pure lyric flow, of melody welling from one choir to another, almost from instrument to instrument, ever finding new garlands of counterpoint or ornament, modulated as by a hundred quick impulses, warmed by the sentiment that in Schubert breeds song. The outcome is the loveliness of such sound upon ear and fancy. The mind does not measure, but sensation and sentiment stir in the hearer no less than in the composer. Now, as it seemed yesterday, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra stopped short at painstaking exposition of this second movement; they missed grace, charm, spontaneity, euphonious flow. They were dry and firm where they should have been lissome, transparent. A sentimental music of the heart and impulse is such and nothing else. There is no making it music of the brain and meditation and not stripping it thereby out of a sun-shot poetry into a lustreless prose. There have been better days than yesterday for Schubert at the Symphony Concerts.

Between the two symphonies, alike in the sequence of the programme and the quality of the performance, stood Grieg's concerto. The enthusiasts, either for praise or dispraise of Greig's music, will allow mere detached listeners to it no privilege of middle ground. Like all the rest of the Norwegian's pieces in their ears, this concerto is either a work of plenary inspiration from shadowy beginning to vociferous close, or else a dull, halting, threadbare thing on the way to deserved oblivion. The more precarious, then, the footing of those who will not take sides. The detractors hold out hands, the apostles withdraw them, when such listeners regret Grieg's tendency to over-emphasis as though he were never quite sure that his thoughts and moods in music would speak for themselves, or hint that not a few measures in the concerto now sound empty and inflated. The advocates are kindly, the opponents resentful, when those same moderates find pleasure in the springy melodies, the spirited rhythms, the happy up-leapings of the finale or in the moody charm and romantic glamor of the slow movement. All three can agree only that in the concerto Grieg is adroit in fusing or contrasting such opposed voices as those of piano and orchestra and that in the whole piece he is more sustained and less fitful of speech than was his later wont.

Again, moreover, the music seemed somewhat dryly played, with Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra faithful, sensitive, supple in accompaniment, but with Mme. Samaroff foregoing her usual nervous energy. Of old it was her most characteristic possession as pianist. Often it tipped her playing with fire, touched it, even, with brilliance. There were hints, indeed, yesterday, of this animating glow in the rhythmic verve and quick plasticity of her playing of the finale; but in the first movement she was content with little more than exposition of the music in hand. Dry was her touch; brittle was her tone. Even in the slow song, when Grieg seemed to soften her fingers, round her tone, mould and melt her phrases, the listener still heard the piano less as the transfigured voice of music than as an instrument in which little felt hammers fall upon vibrating wires at the touch of keys.

H. T. P.

Traveler Nov. 23

SAMAROFF PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

One of the largest audiences of the season filled Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the regular Friday afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program was an attractive one: Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Grieg's Concerto in A-Minor for Pianoforte, and Saint-Saens's C-Minor Symphony. But it was evident something more than the program accounted for the increased attendance. That something developed when Mme. Samaroff, pianist, the soloist of the afternoon, came on the stage. Instantly the whole house was attention, and was so pleased with her playing of the Grieg selection it recalled and recalled her at the close of the number.

Mr. Rabaud's reading of Schubert was so well liked he had to return to the stage several times before the applause could be silenced.

For many, however, the Saint-Saens number, with Albert Snow at the organ and Alfred De Voto at the piano, was the number of the afternoon. It was exceptionally well given and fully merited the enthusiasm it aroused.

Globe Nov. 23

RABAUD LEADS FINE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme Samaroff Pleases in Grieg Concerto

Mr Rabaud gave further proof of the fine qualities of his conducting yesterday. His "unfinished" symphony was exquisite romantic lyricism. The orchestra, attuning its voice to sheer and transparent beauty, sang the heavenly melodies of Schubert with tenderness, with grace, with a vernal freshness and animation, always as though with devotion. The strand was finely woven, one instrument taking with gallantry or with a curtsy the theme from the mouth of another, and spinning it into new loveliness. The slow movement was enchanting in its gentle melancholy, in the answering solace of its imperturbable calm, in a classic repose which by the plasticity and sympathy of Mr Rabaud's treatment became imaginative, even improvisational.

If the conductor brought to us Schubert as a charming and spontaneous singer, he only went from one romanticist to another of more modern idiom and palette in Grieg's piano concerto in A minor, for which Mme Olga Samaroff was the soloist. Mr Rabaud's reading of this poignantly imaginative score was one of many moments of happy appreciation and sympathy. How hauntingly beautiful the introduction to the adagio for muted strings, with the darkly impassioned song of the 'cellos, and how autobiographical of Grieg!

Again in Saint-Saens' organ symphony, Mr Rabaud took due note of the polished expression, the characteristic pomp in sonorities as in rhythmical figuration; the equally characteristic elegance which never fails the conductor's senior countryman, and on occasion becomes majestic, as in the pontifical entrance of the organ, the pedals supporting the pageantry of the strings and rearing in dim vastness the curve of the cathedral nave. The organ was played yesterday by Albert Snow with discreet and expressive registration, with precision and taste.

Mme Samaroff has now in her playing a warmer feeling for the poetic content. The interim has added imagination and perception to performance. Fortunately she is not a heroic pianist. May she never become one. Her playing suggests visions. That is enough for the piano. It need not claim dominion over the air, the land and the sea. There was distinction, a fine sense of proportion in the curve of many a phrase—in the rhythmically satisfying announcement of the first theme of the first movement, which the pianist developed admirably in the cadenza, in the lyric quality of the second, and in the sturdy dance figure of the last. While there are pianists who play louder or with more theatrical brilliance, Mme Samaroff has given very rewarding attention to some of the most vital phases of the great art of expression.

RECORD, NOVEMBER 15,

SAMAROFF RETURNS AS SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

OLGA SAMAROFF

Olga Samaroff, the pianist, will play for the first time in Boston in several seasons at the Symphony concerts the coming week. Since her marriage to Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, Mme. Samaroff has done comparatively little concert work. She will play the Grieg concerto in A minor. The orchestra will play Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and the "Organ" Symphony of Saint-Saens, the C minor, No. 3. In this number the organ will be played by Albert Snow.

The Sunday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall this week will be given by Josef Hoffmann. As is his custom, Mr. Hoffmann will play the entire program without leaving the stage. This he does so as not to break the trend of thought of his audience.

On his program stands a Chopin group and various pieces by Handel, Scarlatti, Beethoven, Rubinstein, Moszkowsky and Liszt.

Roland M. Hayes, tenor, assisted by W. S. Lawrence, pianist, and an orchestra, will give a recital at Symphony Hall Thursday evening, Nov. 21.

WEEK-END CONCERTS

A NOTABLE YOUNG VIOLINIST, AND OTHER INCIDENTS

The Symphony Orchestra and Its Public of Saturday Nights — The Uncommon Interest and Merit of Mr. Vidas, and the Clear Suggestion of Mr. Kreisler in His Playing—The Cerebral Miss Renard—Intermezzo for Mr. Hofmann and Self-Defence—Mr. Havens in Various Degrees

ON Saturday evenings, much more than on Friday afternoons, the number and the quality of the audience in Symphony Hall is test of the disposition of the public toward the Symphony Concerts. At the matinée social cachet, the convenience of suburban folk and other extraneous factors increase the listening company; by night the hearers assemble only from the interest they feel in the concerts and in the pleasure they anticipate from them. The more, then, is it good to see these audiences of Saturday evenings regaining the numbers from which they declined last year until, often, the hall was but thinly peopled. So far this autumn, through the two concerts conducted by Mr. Monteux, through the two led by Mr. Rabaud, it has seemed, on the contrary, well filled. True, the audiences of Saturday have not risen to the dimensions they maintained in the season before the United States entered the late war; but the optimistic believe they will; while the pessimistic may note the present evidence of increasing numbers. For too long, it has been just reproach to Boston that, while in other cities, regularly visited, the Symphony Orchestra could fill large halls to the last sitting or standing room, at home, on Saturday evenings it played to visible empty chairs. In these things, as it also happens, not only is the prestige of the Symphony Concerts at stake, but in a sense also the continuance of them. Often in his day, Mr. Higginson said that he would not have maintained them, had the public failed to respond to them. Presumably, the present trustees are like-minded. Moreover, as not a few know, there were those in New York, last spring, ready and also able to transfer thither the Symphony Orchestra en bloc, had Boston failed to reconstitute and preserve it. Presumably again, they continue in this state of mind and resources. The more stimulating, thus, is the present increase in the audiences of Saturday and the more desirable is it that the expansion continue.

To note these audiences of the evening is to discover speedily that the lowest priced seats are proportionately the best tenanted. At the back of the second balcony, farthest from the stage, there is for example, not a vacant seat; while the ratio of empty places is lower in the rows of medium price than in those where sitting sell dearest. As clearly as outward signs may indicate, the public of Saturday evenings at Symphony Hall is becoming a public of moderate means, assembling out of interest in the music and the performance and deserving to be encouraged as such. Upon this public, even, essentially young, keen and fair, sure to widen if it is cultivated wisely, the future of the Symphony Concerts and of the Symphony Orchestra in Boston depends. Social sanctities now bring into Symphony Hall on Saturday evenings not many more come thither because at the back of their heads is a notion that they are sustaining a "Boston institution." The elder generation of the eighties, the nineties is unmistakably passing; the new has no other incentive than the quality and the pleasure of the concerts. The more the reason, then, that trustees and management should maintain both at the highest possible level and cultivate with the utmost care so well disposed a public. Relatively inexpensive seats are in numerous on Saturday evenings; but knowledge of them is not so widespread and possible comers as it well might be.

Travelar Nov. 16

RABAUD TO GIVE THE "UNFINISHED"

Henri Rabaud offers a striking program for the fourth pair of Symphony concerts, next week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished." Then there will be Grieg's Concerto in A minor, with Madame Olga Samaroff at the piano and the "Organ" symphony of Saint-Saens with Albert Snow at the organ.

Madame Samaroff has not appeared on the concert stage in this city since her marriage to Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra. Mr. Snow is organist and choirmaster at Emmanuel Church.

Herald Nov. 24

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will begin with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." The brilliant performance of this favorite overture at the last Cambridge concert led by Mr. Rabaud aroused enthusiasm. Mozart's "Jubilee" symphony will follow, for Mr. Rabaud is by no means Chauvenistic in his choice of compositions. Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" will be the third number. It will be interesting to hear this distinctively French composition conducted by a Frenchman. Borodin's superbly wild and barbaric symphony in B minor will bring the concert to an end.

A week from tonight the orchestra will leave Boston for its second trip

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

INFORMATION OBSCURED

NOVEMBER 20

...N SYMPHONY GETS AN OVATION AT INFANTRY HAL...

Rejuvenated and Galliciz... Orchestra Brilliantly Con... ducted by Henri Rabaud

The first concert of the Bosto... Symphony Orchestra at Infantr... Hall last evening was a more men... orable occasion than the season... salutatory of one of the finest o... ganizations in its class in the worl... Seldom, if ever, was a concert give... by this popular organization a... corded such an enthusiastic recep... tion.

But it marked the emergence o... this splendid orchestra from th... shadows of gradually dominatin... alien influences and un-American a... tistic bigotries, and it signalize... the regeneration of a great musica... institution in the spirit and tend... ency of momentous times; and ... was apparently with such thought... that the big audience began its dem... onstrations of enthusiasm the mo... ment Conductor Henri Rabaud mad... his appearance at the leader's desk...

When the Boston Orchestra aros... and struck up the strains of th... "Star Spangled Banner," there wer... more exalting thoughts of the ugly... because disloyal, incidents of th... Muck regime, now happily past, i... not forgotten. Never was it bette... played and never before, certainl... not at a Symphony concert, was i... so enthusiastically cheered an... madly applauded. It might hav... been the all-pervading desire to con... tinue the celebration of the arriva... of peace which entered into the per... sistent clamor of cheers and hand... clapping.

With genuine suitability M. Ra... baud close Beethoven's "Erocia... symphony as the salutatory number... easing its supreme mellifluence... along with the most effective de... pendance upon the perfectly co-op... erative string and small reed sectio... of any orchestra of the season. The... change from the Muck manner of... reading and directing was instantly... apparent in an indescribable verve,... alacrity and almost emotional re... sponse to the baton, which became... delightfully more apparent in Web... er's overture to "Euryanthe," with... lace-like fragility, its tenuous... beauty, its musical conversations,... which become at times almost in... strumental persiflage, playing rip... pling repartee between the muted... strings, the lesser reeds and the re... currently sympathetic horns.

Perhaps the Gallicized Boston... Symphony Orchestra showed at its... inspired best in Saint Saens' brilliant... symphonic poem, "Le Jeunesse... d'Heroule." The extreme beauty of... this composition and the utter... finesse displayed by M. Rabaud in... eliciting all of its difficult and some... times remote values won memorable... applause from a musically alert au... dience. This number, without doubt,... proved the golden feature of the eve... ning, the various movements demon... strating the complete and effortless... unanimity and sectional response... of a most admirably trained band.... It was eminently fitted to express... the new French influence now domi... nant in the Boston organization and... M. Rabaud was forced to respond re... peatedly to the enthusiastic applause... which followed this selection.

Madame Merle Alcock, contralto,... was the soloist of the evening and... she, too, shared in the welcome re... ception tendered to the rejuvenated... orchestra. Mme. Alcock's first num... ber was Handel's Largo and the... aria, which she sang with virile... spirit and wonderful fluid tonal... ease. Verdi's aria, "O Don Fatale,"... from the opera "Don Carlos,"... was Mme. Alcock's other selection... and she delivered it with graceful... unction and fine artistic sincerity.

TRAV. Nov 23

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY

The program for the Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Weber's "Euryanthe," overture, Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the Borodin Symphony No. 2.

...m PUBLIC LEDGER

...dress Philadelphia, Pa.

...e NOV 17 1918

General Manager Giulio Gatti-Casazza will open the Philadelphia season of the Metropolitan Opera Company next Tuesday evening, November 19, with a French novelty, "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo," the book based on a tale from the "Arabian Nights," and the most successful work of the modern French school that has been presented since "Louise" and "Pelleas et Melisande." It is by Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and had its American premiere in New York, December 19, 1917. The cast, with a few changes in minor parts, will be the same as on that occasion, as follows:

The Princess	Frances Alda
Fatimah	Kathleen Howard
Marouf	Giuseppe De Luca
The Sultan	Leon Rothier
The Vizier	Andrea de Segurola
Ali	Thomas Chalmers
The Cadi	Giulio Rossi
The Pastry Cook	Paolo Ananian
The Donkey Driver	Pietro Audisio
The Fellah / First Merchant / Second Muezzin	Angelo Bada
The Chief of the Sailors	Albert Reiss
First Muezzin	Giordano Paltrinieri
Second Merchant	Pompilio Malatesta
Sheik of Islam	M. Alexander
Conductor	Pierre Monteux

The scenery is from the brush of the well known Franco-American scenic artist, Ernest Gros. The stage director is Richard Ordynski, and the chorus master, Giulio Setti. An important feature of the opera is the gorgeous Oriental ballet in the sultan's palace in the third act, arranged by Mme. Verhoeven, which is to be led by Rosina Galli and Mr. Bonfiglio.

"Marouf" was first produced at the Opéra Comique in Paris, in May, 1914. It was enthusiastically greeted by French critics, both "moderns" and "conservatives," and thereafter had a great success in Paris and in many other cities even after the onset of war. The story of "Marouf," as has been made known already, is taken from the "Arabian Nights Tales"—"The Thousand Nights and a Night," as they prefer to call them now. Marouf is the henpecked cobbler who seeks escape from his trials by shipping as a sailor, is wrecked and rescued and is found by a rich merchant friend who undertakes to give him what is known as "the time of his life" by introducing him to the Sultan as the richest man in the world, with a wonderful caravan coming. The Sultan offers him his daughter in marriage, and entertains him lavishly. Marouf finally confesses to the Princess that it is all a hoax and the two flee. They reach the desert and find one of those iron rings in the ground that are so common in the "Arabian Nights," and so seldom anywhere else, which on being rubbed, calls forth a genie, who supplies incalculable treasure as genie are expected to do. It is just in time, for the Sultan is in pursuit. He arrives, and simultaneously appears a great caravan, provided by the genie for Marouf. The cobbler triumphs and all are made happy except the suspicious Vizier, who is thrashed.

...om ENQUIRER

...dress: Philadelphia, Pa.

...e NOV 10

The Metropolitan Opera Season

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Henri Rabaud as conductor, interest will be increased in the announcement by General Manager Gatti-Casazza that he will open the Metropolitan Opera season her on Tuesday evening, November 19, with Rabaud's spectacular opera "Marouf."

From all accounts "Marouf," which had its premiere in Paris not long before the outbreak of the world war, has been pronounced the most popular French work produced in many years. It is sentimental, humorous, picturesque and fantastic, based on an episode in the "Arabian Nights."

"Marouf" will be conducted by Mr. Rabaud's friend, Mr. Pierre Monteux, who has been directing the Boston symphonists until Mr. Rabaud's arrival. Mr. De Luca will have the title role, while Mme. Frances Alda will impersonate the Princess who falls in love with the Cobbler, with whom she elopes disguised as a boy.

A Great Sing for Victory

Seven million patriotic women are pushing a movement to make the coming Thanksgiving Day the most momentous in American history. These women, members of the National Council of Women, have issued a call to the country urging every citizen of the United States, both at home and overseas; civilian, military and naval, to join in a great "Sing for Victory" at 4 P. M. sharp on that day.

This world-wide "Liberty Sing" is being arranged under the direction of Mrs. Philip North Moore, president of the National Council of Women, assisted by the officers and members of the National Federation of Music Clubs, the National Supervisors' Association and the National Association of Music Teachers, who are uniting in the effort to create a wave of victory song, which swelling from countless millions of throats, will encircle the earth.

Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, vice chairman of the field division of the Council of National Defense, is honorary chairman of the committee having charge of the celebration, and Mrs. David Allen Campbell, head of the Community Music Department of the National Council of Women, is active chairman, assisted by noted men and women from every part of the country.

A FRENCH LEADER FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

INTEREST HAS BEEN ACUTE in the musical world to know who would guide the coming seasons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Karl Muck being safely disposed of, it was out of the question to choose any one who could possibly plunge this great musical organization into another such plight. To go abroad seemed safer, though musicians of sufficient caliber were doubtless already on this side of the ocean. For a time it was thought that Sir Henry Wood might be the one, and London papers had even sounded a note of mournful farewell, when their fears were set at rest by the conductor's reversal of his decision. Now it is definitely announced that France is to furnish the man, and "one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers," Mr. Henri Rabaud, is he. The French Ministry of Fine Arts expresses its appreciation of the appointment, and cities like Philadelphia, New York, and others which the orchestra visits feel no doubt that while he wields the baton the Boston Symphony concerts will renew their old popularity. The Philadelphia Press declares that the Symphony trustees "have not only secured a musician of first rank, but they have done much to wipe out whatever unpleasant associations the public mind may still have attributed to the orchestra since its former conductor's pro-German activities were alleged." To the Boston Transcript we turn for further introduction to the expected visitor:

"Americans who have frequented the Opéra, the Opéra-Comique, and symphony concerts in Paris will readily recall Mr. Rabaud—an unusual and pictorial figure, whether he was conductor or only intent listener, tall, gaunt, bearded, olive-skinned, grave of glance and quick of gesture, oriental rather than Parisian in impression to the eye. None the less, he was born in Paris in 1873, the son of a professor at the Conservatoire. In that school he was educated as a musician and in the nineties began the practise of his calling in Paris. As conductor he served with increasing skill and reputation at the Opéra, at the Opéra-Comique, and in occasional orchestral concerts. As composer, he wrote symphonies, tone-poems, operas, and a single oratorio, 'Job.' The second of his two symphonies has been heard relatively often in America—at the hands of the Boston Orchestral Club under Mr. Longy, of the New York Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Damrosch, of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski, and at the Worcester Festival last autumn. His symphonic poem, 'La Procession Nocturne,' has been less frequently played in the United States, but Mr. Longy ventured it several years ago in Boston, and it is announced for performance next month at the Symphony concerts. Of his three operas, only one, 'Marouf, Savetier du Caire,' produced at the Metropolitan last December, is known by actual representation in America. The other two, 'La Fille de Roland' and 'Par le Glaive'—heroic pieces drawn from the like-named plays of de Bornier and Richepin—have been heard only in Paris and, possibly, Brussels. In contrast, 'Marouf' recounts with no little humor and fantasy a fable from 'The Arabian Nights.'

"As composer, Mr. Rabaud is neither academic nor ultra-modern. Rather, as his music for both the theater and the concert-hall suggests, he is eclectic, following no formula, but seeking such forms and procedures as best suit the substance, mood, and progress of his music. . . . . .

"'Marouf,' in the performance at the Metropolitan Opera-house, with Mr. Monteux as conductor and with a serviceable cast, made like impression of an eclectic mind and spirit in the composer. Again the reviewer for The Transcript wrote:

"'If from time to time the hearer finds himself in doubt whether to take the piece as burlesque, or romantic comedy, or romantic tragedy, the fault lies with the music, which, when it remains one thing for any single extended passage, is usually capital. In the narrower, technical matters of modulation and orchestration, Rabaud seems impeccable. But in the problems of taste, of style, and manner, and in general of musical creation, he is strangely at sea. One can enumerate half a dozen distinct strains of which the music is composed—a process never quite cricket and sometimes misleading, but in the present case unescapable. Massenet, Puccini, and the Russians, Lalo, Franck, and Charpentier, are all there, and in nearly equal proportions. The music is now suave with "Thaïs"-like melody, now sparkling with the intricate harmonies of Dukas, now throbbing with the breathlike accompaniment which we associate with "Pelléas." And except in a few passages, it never remains the same for more than a few successive seconds.

"'In the problem of style, no less than this problem of manner, Rabaud seems to be at a loss to come to a clear realization of what he wishes to do. There are moments when the music seems to sparkle as in the old opera-bouffe of Lecocq and Audran. Yet even the early Wagner could not be more thunderously expressive than is the composer in the passages, such as that of the threat to the vizier, which he chooses to take as dramatic. Again, Thaïs and Louise never told their loves more ardently than does the Princess in her air in the fourth act. Whether the piece is to be dramatic, or pictorial, or humorous, or exotic, or frankly romantic, the composer never seems able to decide. Now he seeks florid expression, now the literalness of realistic comment in voice and orchestra, and again an accompaniment of symphonic breadth and proportions. It is in this latter style that he seems most happy, especially in the really brilliant passage describing the approach of the caravan in the last act.'"

LEADER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Clear skies await the great orchestra under its new conductor Henri Rabaud, the French composer and leader of the Paris Opéra orchestra.

But if Mr. Parker finds Rabaud myriad-minded as a composer, he has no fears for him as a conductor:

"Mr. Rabaud, like many of his predecessors, will come to the Symphony Orchestra from the opera-house rather than the concert-hall. Deservedly his Parisian reputation as orchestral leader is high, if not signal; while here in Boston he will have forces, freedom, and opportunity such as he has never enjoyed before and such as are sure to stimulate him. He is a practised master of orchestral routine; he is diligent in rehearsal; he wins the respect and the good-will of his men, as he does, indeed, of all who come into close contact with him. By the warrant of his eclectic music his programs through twenty pairs of concerts with the Symphony Orchestra should be catholic enough to please the most exacting. Clearly, in all that pertains to music, he is open-minded. As plainly, by the token of his symphonic pieces and his opera of 'Marouf,' he lacks neither sense of rhythm nor sense of color—both essential qualities in a conductor. Above all, by many a sign on the pages of his music, Mr. Rabaud has a true Gallic lucidity of mind. He sets down unmistakably what he would say in tones and indicates as precisely the manner in which it should be said. A like sense of design, procedure, result, presumably distinguishes him as conductor. In the familiar phrase that orchestras apply to leaders whom they serve willingly, 'he will know what he wants and get it.'"

AMERICAN NOVEMBER 3 GLOBE—DECEMBER 8,

VARIED BILL IS SYMPHONY OFFERING

The program of the Symphony Orchestra this week consists of the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart, Borodin's Second Symphony, Dukas' tone poem, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Weber's overture to Euryanthe.

The Borodino Symphony had not been played in Boston for some years and such an imaginative and thrilling reading of this truly original Russian work was immensely enjoyable. Rabaud is a profound admirer of the group of Russian composers, among whom Borodin is very conspicuous, and he drove his orchestra through the frenzied music like a great conductor.

The sweetness, serenity and loveliness of the first three movements of the Mozart Symphony was well mirrored, but the famous fugue finale was laboriously instead of brilliantly played and there were several technical slips at various desks which marred the work.

On the other hand Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" has been a favorite with our German conductors, but I cannot remember a performance in which the waggishness, the impishness, and the marvelous tonal effects of the music were so evident.

The performance of the "Star Spangled Banner" which, like a religious rite precedes all Symphony programs is also worthy of comment. Mr. Rabaud plays it with the greatest feeling. He makes his orchestra sing it. But it would seem as though an orchestral arrangement with more foundation, more effective harmonies could be secured for performance by such a big orchestra.

Joseph Bonnet, Organist, Symphony Soloist This Week

Mr Rabaud's program for the Symphony concerts this week includes another Beethoven symphony, this time the 8th; Mr Converse's Orchestral Fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," and Guilmant's symphony in D minor, No. 1, for organ and orchestra. Joseph Bonnet, the brilliant French organist, happily remembered here for his enjoyable recitals at the New Old South Church and Symphony Hall, will be the soloist. He will play his own cadenza.

Mr Bonnet was born at Bordeaux in 1884 and showed talent from his earliest days. At 14 he became organist at the Church of St Nicholas. Coming to Paris he went to the Conservatoire and studied under Guilmant, gaining after few years the first prize for organ playing by his magnificent performance of Liszt's great Fantasia on the chorale "Ad nos ad salutarem undam." So thereafter he was chosen organist of Eustache, in Paris. In that city he has played concerts under the auspices of the leading organizations. In other European countries he has triumphed no less brilliantly. He was elected Fellow of the Royal College of Organists in London at the time of the 50th anniversary; also honorary member of the Organ Players' Club of Philadelphia. His compositions are musically admirable and very popular and his "Variations de Concert" was chosen as test piece at the Royal College of Organists in London Summer before last. The distinguished French organist's record of 40 recitals at St Eustache without music and without a single number repeated evidences his memory and musicianship.

...om The

...dress PHILADELPHIA,

...te NOV 19

...ler such very ...

FREDERIC FRADKIN, an American violinist, twenty-six years of age, born in New York, of Russian parents, and educated under Henry Schradieck, Max Bendix, Remy, Joseph White, Lefort and others, has been appointed the concertmaster of the organized Boston Symphony Orchestra. Fradkin received the first prize for violin playing at the Paris Conservatoire, in 19... Among the judges were Faure, Colonne, Widal, Taudaud, Lalo. Later he went to study with Ysaye and made his debut at Carnegie Hall in 1911 with the New York Philharmonic under the baton of the late Gustave Mahler. Later he made appearances in London, Germany and Austria with great success. This coming the soloist for he will be ... a very enviable post ... and THE ETUDE offers its congratulations and best wishes to the young ... Fradkin.

MONITOR

MUSIC

Specially for The ... Boston Symph... Rabaud, conduct... thirty-eighth sea... Boston, afternoon... Samaroff, pianist, ... Schubert, "Unfini... minor; Grieg, Co... pianoforte, Op. 1... phony in C minor, ... Snow, organist).

BOSTON, Mass

Mme. Olga San... Grieg piano Con... rendering more ... haps than in ... Rabaud gave wh... gratifying accom... although in this ... notably deferred ... proceeding wh... gained most of ...

On Sunday, N... appeared in pia... familiar progran... included the Rub... —with great po... fashion. Mr. R... pick out and e... phrases of a com... Rubinstein "Mel... recital by him ... both in an educ... able sense.

As a result o... sonnel and ma... ton Symphony ... Club of wind ... be reorganize... Longy, the lea... certs are in co... of players ap... name and dr... he Longy Sc...

INFORMATION OBSCURED

PROVIDENCE NEWS,
NOVEMBER 20

ON SYMPHONY GETS AN OVATION AT INFANTRY HAL

Rejuvenated and Galliciz Orchestra Brilliantly Con ducted by Henri Rabaud

The first concert of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra at Infantr Hall last evening was a more men orable occasion than the season salutatory of one of the finest o ganizations in its class in the worl Seldom, if ever, was a concert give by this popular organization ac corded such an enthusiastic recep tion.

But it marked the emergence c this splendid orchestra from th shadows of gradually dominatin alien influences and un-American a tistic bigotries, and it signalize the regeneration of a great musica institution in the spirit and tend ency of momentous times; and was apparently with such thought that the big audience began its dem onstrations of enthusiasm the mo ment Conductor Henri Rabaud mad his appearance at the leader's desk

When the Boston Orchestra aros and struck up the strains of th "Star Spangled Banner," there wer more exulting thoughts of the ugly because disloyal, incidents of th Muck regime, now happily past, i not forgotten. Never was it bette played and never before, certainl not at a Symphony concert, was i so enthusiastically cheered an madly applauded. It might hav been the all-pervading desire to con tinue the celebration of the arriva of peace which entered into the per sistent clamor of cheers and hand clapping.

With genuine suitability M. Ra baud close Beethoven's "Erocia' symphony as the salutatory number easing its supreme mellifluence along with the most effective de pendance upon the perfectly co-op erative string and small reed sectio of any orchestra of the season. The change from the Muck manner of reading and directing was instantly apparent in an indescribable verve, alacrity and almost emotional response to the baton, which became delightfully more apparent in Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," with lace-like fragility, its tenuous beauty, its musical conversations, which become at times almost instrumental persiflage, playing rippling repartee between the muted strings, the lesser reeds and the recurrently sympathetic horns.

Perhaps the Gallicized Boston Symphony Orchestra showed at its inspired best in Saint Saens' brilliant symphonic poem, "Le Jeunesse d'Heroule." The extreme beauty of this composition and the utter finesse displayed by M. Rabaud in eliciting all of its difficult and sometimes remote values won memorable applause from a musically alert audience. This number, without doubt, proved the golden feature of the evening, the various movements demonstrating the complete and effortless unanimity and sectional response of a most admirably trained band. It was eminently fitted to express the new French influence now dominant in the Boston organization and M. Rabaud was forced to respond repeatedly to the enthusiastic applause which followed this selection.

Madame Merle Alcock, contralto, was the soloist of the evening and she, too, shared in the welcome reception tendered to the rejuvenated orchestra. Mme. Alcock's first number was Handel's Largo and the aria, which she sang with virile spirit and wonderful fluid tonal ease. Verdi's aria, "O Don Fatale," from the opera "Don Carlos," was Mme. Alcock's other selection and she delivered it with graceful unction and fine artistic sincerity.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY

The program for the Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Weber's "Euryanthe," overture, Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the Borodin Symphony No. 2.

m PUBLIC LEDGER
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
e

General Manager Giulio Gatti-Casazza will open the Philadelphia season of the Metropolitan Opera Company next Tuesday evening, November 19, with a French novelty, "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo," the book based on a tale from the "Arabian Nights," and the most successful work of the modern French school that has been presented since "Louise" and "Pelleas et Melisande.' It is by Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and had its American premiere in New York, December 19, 1917. The cast, with a few changes in minor parts, will be the same as on that occasion, as follows:

The Princess	Frances Alda
Fatimah	Kathleen Howard
Marouf	Giuseppe De Luca
The Sultan	Leon Rothier
The Vizier	Andrea de Segurola
Ali	Thomas Chalmers
The Cadi	Giulio Rossi
The Pastry Cook	Paolo Ananian
The Donkey Driver	Pietro Audisio
The Fellah / First Merchant / Second Muezzin	Angelo Bada
The Chief of the Sailors	Albert Reiss
First Muezzin	Giordano Paltrinieri
Second Merchant	Pompilio Malatesta
Sheik of Islam	M. Alexander
Conductor	Pierre Monteux

The scenery is from the brush of the well known Franco-American scenic artist, Ernest Gros. The stage director is Richard Ordynski, and the chorus master, Giulio Setti. An important feature of the opera is the gorgeous Oriental ballet in the sultan's palace in the third act, arranged by Mme. Verhoeven, which is to be led by Rosina Galli and Mr. Bonfiglio.

"Marouf" was first produced at the Opéra Comique in Paris, in May, 1914. It was enthusiastically greeted by French critics, both "moderns" and "conservatives," and thereafter had a great success in Paris and in many other cities even after the onset of war. The story of "Marouf," as has been made known already, is taken from the "Arabian Nights Tales"—"The Thousand Nights and a Night," as they prefer to call them now. Marouf is the henpecked cobbler who seeks escape from his trials by shipping as a sailor, is wrecked and rescued and is found by a rich merchant friend who undertakes to give him what is known as "the time of his life" by introducing him to the Sultan as the richest man in the world, with a wonderful caravan coming. The Sultan offers him his daughter in marriage, and entertains him lavishly. Marouf finally confesses to the Princess that it is all a hoax and the two flee. They reach the desert and find one of those iron rings in the ground that are so common in the "Arabian Nights," and so seldom anywhere else, which on being rubbed, calls forth a genie, who supplies incalculable treasure as genie are expected to do. It is just in time, for the Sultan is in pursuit. He arrives, and simultaneously appears a great caravan, provided by the genie for Marouf. The cobbler triumphs and all are made happy except the suspicious Vizier, who is thrashed.

om ENQUIRER
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.
e

The Metropolitan Opera Season

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Henri Rabaud as conductor, interest will be increased in the announcement by General Manager Gatti-Casazza that he will open the Metropolitan Opera season here on Tuesday evening, November 19, with Rabaud's spectacular opera "Marouf."

From all accounts "Marouf," which had its premiere in Paris not long before the outbreak of the world war, has been pronounced the most popular French work produced in many years. It is sentimental, humorous, picturesque and fantastic, based on an episode in the "Arabian Nights."

"Marouf" will be conducted by Mr. Rabaud's friend, Mr. Pierre Monteux, who has been directing the Boston symphonists until Mr. Rabaud's arrival. Mr. De Luca will have the title role, while Mme. Frances Alda will impersonate the Princess who falls in love with the Cobbler, with whom she elopes disguised as a boy.

A Great Sing for Victory

Seven million patriotic women are pushing a movement to make the coming Thanksgiving Day the most momentous in American history. These women, members of the National Council of Women, have issued a call to the country urging every citizen of the United States, both at home and overseas; civilian, military and naval, to join in a great "Sing for Victory" at 4 P. M. sharp on that day.

This world-wide "Liberty Sing" is being arranged under the direction of Mrs. Philip North Moore, president of the National Council of Women, assisted by the officers and members of the National Federation of Music Clubs, the National Supervisors' Association and the National Association of Music Teachers, who are uniting in the effort to create a wave of victory song, which swelling from countless millions of throats, will encircle the earth.

Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, vice chairman of the field division of the Council of National Defense, is honorary chairman of the committee having charge of the celebration, and Mrs. David Allen Campbell, head of the Community Music Department of the National Council of Women, is active chairman, assisted by noted men and women from every part of the country.

A FRENCH LEADER FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

INTEREST HAS BEEN ACUTE in the musical world to know who would guide the coming seasons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Karl Muck being safely disposed of, it was out of the question to choose any one who could possibly plunge this great musical organization into another such plight. To go abroad seemed safer, though musicians of sufficient caliber were doubtless already on this side of the ocean. For a time it was thought that Sir Henry Wood might be the one, and London papers had even sounded a note of mournful farewell, when their fears were set at rest by the conductor's reversal of his decision. Now it is definitely announced that France is to furnish the man, and "one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers," Mr. Henri Rabaud, is he. The French Ministry of Fine Arts expresses its appreciation of the appointment, and cities like Philadelphia, New York, and others which the orchestra visits feel no doubt that while he wields the baton the Boston Symphony concerts will renew their old popularity. The Philadelphia Press declares that the Symphony trustees "have not only secured a musician of first rank, but they have done much to wipe out whatever unpleasant associations the public mind may still have attributed to the orchestra since its former conductor's pro-German activities were alleged." To the Boston Transcript we turn for further introduction to the expected visitor:

"Americans who have frequented the Opéra, the Opéra-Comique, and symphony concerts in Paris will readily recall Mr. Rabaud an unusual and pictorial figure, whether he was conductor or only intent listener, tall, gaunt, bearded, olive-skinned, grave of glance and quick of gesture, oriental rather than Parisian in impression to the eye. None the less, he was born in Paris in 1873, the son of a professor at the Conservatoire. In that school he was educated as a musician and in the nineties began the practise of his calling in Paris. As conductor he served with increasing skill and reputation at the Opéra, at the Opéra-Comique, and in occasional orchestral concerts. As composer, he wrote symphonies, tone-poems, operas, and a single oratorio, 'Job.' The second of his two symphonies has been heard relatively often in America—at the hands of the Boston Orchestral Club under Mr. Longy, of the New York Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Damrosch, of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski, and at the Worcester Festival last autumn. His symphonic poem, 'La Procession Nocturne,' has been less frequently played in the United States, but Mr. Longy ventured it several years ago in Boston, and it is announced for performance next month at the Symphony concerts. Of his three operas, only one, 'Marouf, Savetier du Caire,' produced at the Metropolitan last December, is known by actual representation in America. The other two, 'La Fille de Roland' and 'Par le Glaive'—heroic pieces drawn from the like-named plays of de Bornier and Richepin—have been heard only in Paris and, possibly, Brussels. In contrast, 'Marouf' recounts with no little humor and fantasy a fable from 'The Arabian Nights.'

"As composer, Mr. Rabaud is neither academic nor ultra-modern. Rather, as his music for both the theater and the concert-hall suggests, he is eclectic, following no formula, but seeking such forms and procedures as best suit the substance, mood, and progress of his music. . . . . .

"'Marouf,' in the performance at the Metropolitan Opera-house, with Mr. Monteux as conductor and with a serviceable cast, made like impression of an eclectic mind and spirit in the composer. Again the reviewer for The Transcript wrote:

"'If from time to time the hearer finds himself in doubt whether to take the piece as burlesque, or romantic comedy, or romantic tragedy, the fault lies with the music, which, when it remains one thing for any single extended passage, is usually capital. In the narrower, technical matters of modulation and orchestration, Rabaud seems impeccable. But in the problems of taste, of style, and manner, and in general of musical creation, he is strangely at sea. One can enumerate half a dozen distinct strains of which the music is composed—a process never quite cricket and sometimes misleading, but in the present case unescapable. Massenet, Puccini, and the Russians, Lalo, Franck, and Charpentier, are all there, and in nearly equal proportions. The music is now suave with "Thaïs"-like melody, now sparkling with the intricate harmonies of Dukas, now throbbing with the breathlike accompaniment which we associate with "Pelléas." And except in a few passages, it never remains the same for more than a few successive seconds.

"'In the problem of style, no less than this problem of manner, Rabaud seems to be at a loss to come to a clear realization of what he wishes to do. There are moments when the music seems to sparkle as in the old opera-bouffe of Lecocq and Audran. Yet even the early Wagner could not be more thunderously expressive than is the composer in the passages, such as that of the threat to the vizier, which he chooses to take as dramatic. Again, Thaïs and Louise never told their loves more ardently than does the Princess in her air in the fourth act. Whether the piece is to be dramatic, or pictorial, or humorous, or exotic, or frankly romantic, the composer never seems able to decide. Now he seeks florid expression, now the literalness of realistic comment in voice and orchestra, and again an accompaniment of symphonic breadth and proportions. It is in this latter style that he seems most happy, especially in the really brilliant passage describing the approach of the caravan in the first act.'"

LEADER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Clear skies await the great orchestra under its new conductor Henri Rabaud, the French composer and leader of the Paris Opera orchestra.

But if Mr. Parker finds Rabaud myriad-minded as a composer, he has no fears for him as a conductor:

"Mr. Rabaud, like many of his predecessors, will come to the Symphony Orchestra from the opera-house rather than the concert-hall. Deservedly his Parisian reputation as orchestral leader is high, if not signal; while here in Boston he will have forces, freedom, and opportunity such as he has never enjoyed before and such as are sure to stimulate him. He is a practised master of orchestral routine; he is diligent in rehearsal; he wins the respect and the good-will of his men, as he does, indeed, of all who come into close contact with him. By the warrant of his eclectic music his programs through a variety pass of concerts with the Symphony Orchestra should be catholic enough to please the most exacting. Clearly, in all that pertains to music, he is open-minded. As plainly, by the token of his symphonic pieces and his opera of 'Marouf,' he has neither sense of rhythm nor sense of color—both essential qualities in a conductor. Above all, by many a sign on the pages of his music, Mr. Rabaud has a true Gallic lucidity of mind. He sets down unmistakably what he would say in tone and indicates as precisely the manner in which it should be said. A like sense of design, procedure, result, presumably distinguishes him as conductor. In the familiar phrase that orchestras apply to leaders whom they serve willingly, 'he will know what he wants and get it.'"

AMERICAN NOVEMBER 3 GLOBE—DECEMBER 8.

VARIED BILL IS SYMPHONY OFFERING

The program of the Symphony Orchestra this week consists of the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart, Borodin's Second Symphony, Dukas' tone poem, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Weber's overture to Euryanthe.

The Borodino Symphony had not been played in Boston for some years and such an imaginative and thrilling reading of this truly original Russian work was immensely enjoyable. Rabaud is a profound admirer of the group of Russian composers, among whom Borodin is very conspicuous, and he drove his orchestra through the frenzied music like a great conductor.

The sweetness, serenity and loveliness of the first three movements of the Mozart Symphony was well mirrored, but the famous fugue finale was laboriously instead of brilliantly played and there were several technical slips at various desks which marred the work.

On the other hand Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" has been a favorite with our German conductors, but I cannot remember a performance in which the waggishness, the impishness, and the marvelous tonal effects of the music were so evident.

The performance of the "Star Spangled Banner" which, like a religious rite precedes all Symphony programs is also worthy of comment. Mr. Rabaud plays it with the greatest feeling. He makes his orchestra sing it. But it would seem as though an orchestral arrangement with more foundation, more effective harmonies could be secured for performance by such a big orchestra.

Joseph Bonnet, Organist, Symphony Soloist This Week

Mr Rabaud's program for the Symphony concerts this week includes another Beethoven symphony, this time the 8th; Mr Converse's Orchestral Fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," and Guilmant's symphony in D minor, No. 1, for organ and orchestra. Joseph Bonnet, the brilliant French organist, happily remembered here for his enjoyable recitals at the New Old South Church and Symphony Hall, will be the soloist. He will play his own cadenza.

Mr Bonnet was born at Bordeaux in 1884 and showed talent from his earliest days. At 14 he became organist at the Church of St Nicholas. Coming to Paris he went to the Conservatoire and studied under Guilmant, gaining after a few years the first prize for organ playing by his magnificent performance of Liszt's great Fantasia on the chorale "Ad nos ad salutarem undam." Soon thereafter he was chosen organist of St Eustache, in Paris. In that city he has played concerts under the auspices of the leading organizations. In other European countries he has triumphed no less brilliantly. He was elected Fellow of the Royal College of Organists in London at the time of the 50th anniversary; also honorary member of the Organ Players' Club of Philadelphia. His compositions are musically admirable and very popular and his "Variations de Concert" was chosen as test piece at the Royal College of Organists in London Summer before last. The distinguished French organist's record of 40 recitals at St Eustache without music and without a single number repeated evidences his memory and musicianship.

om PHILADELPHIA,
dress
te NOV 19

MONITOR
MUSIC IN Specially for The Chr
Boston Symphon
Rabaud, conductor thirty-eighth seaso
Boston, afternoon o
Samaroff, pianist, so Schubert, "Unfinishe minor; Grieg, Conc pianoforte, Op. 16;
phony in C minor, N
Snow, organist).
BOSTON, Massach

Mme. Olga Sama
Grieg piano Concer rendering more not haps than in int
Rabaud gave what gratifying accompa although in this i notably deferred t proceeding where gained most of all.
On Sunday, Nov. appeared in piano familiar program—included the Rubins
—with great powe fashion. Mr. Hof pick out and emp phrases of a compo Rubinstein "Melody
recital by him m both in an educati able sense.
As a result of t sonnel and mana ston Symphony O
Club of wind inst
be reorganized,
Longy, the leader
certs are in cont
of players ap name and dr
he Longy So its unfinish

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

accompaniment which w as ept in a few passages, ne
a few successive seconds
ess than this problem of to come to a clear realiz are moments when th era-bouffe of Lecocq and ould not be more thun

BOSTON SYMPHONY.
stra under its new conductor, Henri
d leader of the Paris Opéra orchestra.

er in the passages, such as that ch he chooses to take as dramatic.
r told their loves more ardently air in the fourth act. Whether pictorial, or humorous, or exotic, poser never seems able to decide.
n, now the literalness of realistic tra, and again an accompaniment proportions. It is in this latter py, especially in the really brilliant ch of the caravan in the last act."

Rabaud myriad-minded as a comm as a conductor:

of his predecessors, will come to the
the opera-house rather than the is Parisian reputation as orchestral while here in Boston he will have unity such as he has never enjoyed to stimulate him. He is a practised
; he is diligent in rehearsal; he wins ill of his men, as he does, indeed, of ontact with him. By the warrant grams through twenty pairs of con-
Orchestra should be catholic enough
ng. Clearly, in all that pertains to
. As plainly, by the token of his opera of 'Marouf,' he lacks neither of color—both essential qualities in a
many a sign on the pages of his music, allic lucidity of mind. He sets down would say in tones and indicates, as which it should be said. A like sense sult, presumably distinguishes him as iliar phrase that orchestras apply to willingly, 'he will know what he wants

The E PHILADELPHIA,
NOV 191

FRADKIN, an American violinis years of age, born in Troy, Ne ssian parents, and educated unde
radieck, Max Bendix, Remy, Jo
Lefort and others, has been ap concertmaster of the reorganize mphony Orchestra. Fradkin re first prize for violin playing a Conservatoire, in 1909. Amon were Faure, Colonne, Vidal, Th
Later he went to study wit nade his debut in Carnegie Ha
h the New York Philharmoni nton of the late Gustave Mahle de appearances in London, Ge Austria with great success, be soloist for the ballet. This able post for so young a ma
TUDE offers its congratulation shes to the lucky Mr. Fradkin.

Om
Address New York City
ate NOV 9 1918

"CLEANING UP" THE ORCHESTRAS

MOST OF THE EXCITEMENT in the musical history of the past four years has been furnished by conductors instead of prima donnas. It is not suggested that jealousy of the long monopoly enjoyed by the sisterhood led the former to seize the international situation and make it their own. Certainly no prima donna from whatever impulse will find her acts so filling the historical page as those of Dr. Muck and Dr. Kunwald. They are now interned. Toscanini went back to Italy to lend his assistance to his native country, but the editor of The Musical Courier (New York) is responsible for the statement that "he stopt conducting a concert in Rome because the audience objected to the German numbers on his program." Mr. Josef Stransky, of the Philharmonic, has been the target for attack, but, as the same writer says, "he pointed to the fact that he has taken out American naturalization papers, and emphasized his Czecho-Slovak origin." Besides Mr. Stransky, Alfred Hertz, of the San Francisco Orchestra, and Arthur Bodansky, of the Metropolitan Opera, also "asked Uncle Sam for first papers of citizenship." Frederick Stock, of Chicago, finds himself in so anomalous a position that we give this extract from the Chicago Tribune, citing it in more detail:

"In a letter which expresses a very fine-spirited sense of responsibility and unselfish devotion to the Chicago Orchestra, its conductor, Mr. Frederick A. Stock, has tendered his resignation to the Orchestral Association.

"The tender has been accepted by the trustees for reasons which in no way reflect upon Mr. Stock, but are founded on the same careful regard for the welfare of the great institution they serve as has moved Mr. Stock's action.

"Mr. Stock feels, and the trustees accept his point of view, that his failure to perfect the legal formalities of citizenship by taking out his second papers lays him open, and possibly the orchestra likewise, to some public criticism. Technically Mr. Stock is an 'alien enemy,' and Mr. Stock, with very rare consideration, has felt that his continuance as conductor might be misconstrued and erected, however unjustly, into an offense against the institution. To avoid any possible shadow of affront to its patronage or the introduction of any sentiment which might deprive the concerts of their proper atmosphere, Mr. Stock and the trustees, on the former's generous initiative, have adopted the course taken.

"At the same time the trustees take occasion to make it clear that Mr. Stock's essential loyalty to the nation is fully recognized by them, as well as his years of faithful service to the orchestra. The resignation, therefore, will interrupt Mr. Stock's official connection with the orchestra, not finally sever it, for it is desired and expected that he will take up the baton again when the present legal objection has been removed. The feeling shown by the trustees has been earned by a devotion not often found in service, and it will be shared by the great majority, if not indeed all, of the orchestra patrons. It is proper for the public to know of the confidence felt by the trustees in Mr. Stock and to recognize the honorable motives which moved him. He retires with great credit and will be welcomed back with friendliness unabated, if not indeed increased."

The Boston Symphony situation, solved by the engagement of Henri Rabaud, was treated in this department October 26. The Musical Courier's editor points out that the intern before he begins his duties will be filled by Pierre Monteux, wo "when he first landed here refused to conduct a Richard Strauss work," but "he has just announced that during the month of is temporary conductorship of the Boston Symphony he wi program Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Liszt, and othr Austro-German classics." Nothing is said, tho, about Mr. Monteux's frequently stated discrimination between living and dead German composers. The editor's final observation is:

"After the Boston and Cincinnati sensations, a 'cleaning-up' process took place in all the American orchestras, and to-day it is fairly certain that if any pro-Germans exist in those bodies they are more silent than the well-known untalkative Sphinx."

MONITOR NOVEMBER 23,

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, fourth concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, Boston, afternoon of Nov. 22, 1918, Olga Samaroff, pianist, soloist. The program: Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor; Grieg, Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, Op. 16; Saint-Saëns, Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78. (Albert Snow, organist).

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Gradually his Boston public is coming to form a comprehensive and just estimate of Mr. Rabaud as it has opportunity to analyze his work. Previous to the concerts of this week, he had disclosed himself through Beethoven as a dignified, scholarly, yet fervid director. He had also shown remarkable skill as an accompanying conductor. This week he strengthened these impressions and gave in addition through the Homeric measures of Saint-Saëns, a glimpse of capabilities hitherto not in evidence. On the last occasion when Boston heard this symphony, the orchestra was under a constricting Teutonic domination; this time it had achieved a Gallic freedom and played with a warmth and spontaneity that the former rendition lacked. It was perhaps only to be expected that Mr. Rabaud should give a reading of his friend's work that should bear the stamp of authority; the breadth of vision and the depth of understanding he put into it, however, were welcome earnests of his unfolding genius.

It is a profitable topic for debate whether if Schubert had completed his B Minor Symphony it would have the degree of popularity which it enjoys in its unfinished state. Four move-

Mme. Olga Samaroff played the Grieg piano Concerto spiritedly, a rendering more notable in tone perhaps than in interpretation. Mr. Rabaud gave what must be a most gratifying accompaniment to a soloist, although in this instance the soloist notably deferred to the conductor, a proceeding whereby the composer gained most of all.

On Sunday, Nov. 17 Josef Hofmann appeared in piano recital, playing a familiar program—so familiar it even included the Rubinstein "Melody in F"—with great power and in scholarly fashion. Mr. Hofmann's ability to pick out and emphasize the salient phrases of a composition—even of the Rubinstein "Melody in F"—makes a recital by him musically profitable both in an educative and a pleasurable sense.

As a result of the changes in personnel and management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Longy Club of wind instruments has had to be reorganized, and Mr. Georges Longy, the leader, announces that concerts are in contemplation by a group of players appearing under the same name and drawn from the faculty of the Longy School of Music.

NEW YORK CITY
COMMERCIAL-HERALD
NOV 10 1918

54

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AGAIN EXPECT FRENCH CONDUCTOR TO RESTORE ORCHESTRA'S SUPREMACY

Herald's Critic Reviews Second Concert and Looks for Gradual Assimilation of New Artists in Reorganized Orchestra Under M. Ribaud.

53

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

After more than a quarter of a century of personal opinion that the Boston Symphony was one of the best, if not the best, orchestras in the world one listened almost aghast in half convinced wonderment to the playing of the orchestra last Thursday night. Critical promptings to exclaim "Eheu Fugaces," "Ichabod, Ichabod" and other comminatory comments were too insistent to be allowed expression, because no constructive critic aims or wishes to overturn idols or subvert ideals. For the Boston orchestra has been an undisturbed orchestral ideal to the American public for years.

Neither would any likeminded critic desire to support Colonel Higginson's dictum that none but a German conductor can conduct a symphony, or in any way indorse the notion that without German musicians no orchestra could continue to exist in this country.

The wonderful unison voice of this orchestra, in effect a magnificent single instrument, was a definite characteristic which made it almost unique. The playing together in personal contact, as it were, of so many men and so many instruments for so many years produced a unity of intent, impulse and actual tonal values unattainable in any other way.

Granting this, it is evident that any considerable change in the personnel of the orchestra, due to war requirements, would inevitably disturb for the time beinng at any rate previously existent orchestral conditions. I cannot but fell that the previous spirit and purpose of this great orchestra is still dominant—for nearly forty years of great tradition must mean something—and that all that is needed now is a gradual assimilation of and adaptation to new conditions under such a conductor as I hope Mr. Henri Rabaud may prove to easily restore the Boston orchestra to the former high and acknowledged orchestral supremacy to which its great traditions and lofty purposes entitle it.

Heard in New Programme.

The orchestra for so many years has been so supreme that slight technical imperfections, which might be passed over with any other organization, in this instance cannot remain unnoticed. The playing of the orchestra in the second concert of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was not such as to lead me to revise my former impression of Thursday. The classical definiteness of Händel's Concerto Grosso, No. 5, in D major, which opened the programme, after the vague and elusive meandering of the modern French school of late, was positively refreshing in its old time formality. The strings played with accuracy and precision, if without any suave roundness or nobility of tone, but it struck me that the solo part, as rendered by Messrs. Fradkin—the new concert master—and Noak, sounded both thin and unimportant—Mr. Malkin's, 'cello and Mr. Barrere's viola were much more impressive. The last movement allegro was by far the best played of the five movements of the work, as it possessed a life, finish, tonal and vocal quality seemingly lacking in the other four.

The Loeffler number, "La Bonne Chanson," already familiar to us, with its "Tristan" references was played with distinction, good balance and contrast of sonority, and marked, perhaps, the best work done by the orchestra thus far. Mr. Monteux, too, for once content to let things take their own way, did not fume and insist too far.

D'Indy's "Istar" Played.

Vincent d'Indy, whose symphonic variations, "Istar," followed, has always represented to me the maximum of self-conscious empiricism, froth and harmonic extravagance of the modern French school at its worst, as well as the minimum of melodic invention or spontaniety. In straightforwardness of musical thought in conception and expression d'Indy is, however, at his best in this work, as in the interpretation of its strongly insistent dramatic suggestion, which approaches the operatic, was also Mr. Monteux, who conducted with picturesque appreciation and effect. The breadth and sonority of the strings was really imposing.

Mr. Monteau's interpretation of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which closed the programme, was somewhat perfunctorily and badly classical, a trifle blatant in the fortissimo and crudely unfinished in the softer passages; rather forcibly rythmic, but decidedly lacking in plasticity and charm. The two first movements were decidedly perfunctory, the lovely allegretto almost wholly without sentiment. The scherzo, read conventionally, was nevertheless played with spirit and rhythm, and the last movement was brilliant in a sort of rough and ready fashion. All honor to Mr. Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, who played this symphony at its last previous hearing. I look for important and welcome changes in the playing of Boston Orchestra before its after Mr. Rabaud takes hold.

New York Times
NOV 10

TWO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS PLAY

Pierre Monteux Again Conducts the Boston at Matinee in Carnegie Hall.

53

TRIUMPH FOR LEVITZKI

Young American Displays His Pianistic Prowess at Concert of the New York Symphony Society.

The first matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon before a large audience, which enthusiastically demanded the "Marseillaise" after Pierre Monteux had conducted the national anthem. It was delivered with accustomed Gallic gusto. Whether he be considered as a temporary conductor or as a skilled and versatile musician, M. Monteux deserves the gratitude of our musical public. Yesterday his brief connection with the band from Boston came to a close, and tomorrow evening we hope to see him in his familiar place at the head of the Metropolitan Opera forces. The music at the matinée went with more precision and spirit than at the opening concert last Thursday evening. And the musical scheme was more interesting. Handel, Loeffler, D'Indy and Beethoven. Two old-time Germans, one American and one Frenchman.

The tonality D major began and ended the matinée. Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, for string orchestra, was, no doubt, selected to show the paces of that particular department. It must be confessed that neither the reading nor the performance was distinguished. The Introduction and Allegro were rather wiry in tone, nor was the Largo ingratiating to the ear. The various solos were played by Frederick Fradkin, the new concert master; his colleague, S. Noack; C. Barrier, viola, and J. Malkin, violoncello.

The absence of elasticity in the strings did not cease with the Handel number, for "La Bonne Chanson," by Charles Martin Loeffler, which followed, lacked an eloquent interpretation for patent reasons. This orchestral poem has not been heard here for years. Since then the composer has revised the score and reconstructed it. He has employed as his motto the fifth poem in the Paul Verlaine's delicate and tender "La Bonne Chanson." Loeffler is a tone painter doubled by a poet; even if he were not a musician he could not have escaped the temptation to drop into verse, like Silas Wegg. His score is rich in sentiment and shifting moods, its coloring ranging from sombre purple to the violet rays. The Loeffler palette is red with brains and lovely hues. This work was originally presented in company with the composer's "Villanelle du Diable."

The Symphonic Variations, by Vincent D'Indy, "Istar," the Oriental young woman who is divested of her harmonic lingerie coram publico, had the proper atmospheric quality. It is cerebral music at the best, and it reveals the frigidity of an Academic nude by Jules Lefebvre. But enormously clever. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony closed a pleasant afternoon, though there was nothing of note in the performance except that the Allegretto was the high-water mark of the program, while a word is not amiss concerning the dash of the finale. As a whole, there were rough spots and tonal dryness. M. Monteux was warmly received and, considering the task he essayed at such short notice he admirably succeeded. The rôle of a stop-gap is ever thankless.

The young American pianist, Mischa Levitzki, enjoyed a genuine triumph at Carnegie Hall last night. It wa sat the

Om RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
ate NOV 13 19

IN THE PROVINCES THINGS COME SLOW

Yet They Do Eventually Arrive, as Witness, Par Exemple, "Marouf."

AN ELDERLY VERDI OPERA

"Forza del Destino," Revival, Is Nearest Thing to Opening Novelty.

WELL, after all, it seems, we provincials are to have an opportunity to hear 'Marouf.' To be sure, we will be about a year behind the fair. But, never mind. If the thing is worth waiting for, nobody will complain.

Certainly the fact that the opera's distinguished composer is now established in this country will not in any way hurt the performance for us. Soon we shall also have an opportunity to behold M. Rabaud swing the conductor's baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And Monteux, the present conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will then swing the baton over singers and players on the opening "Marouf" night. This is interchangeableness with a vengeance—and complexity, and real Gallic invasion, and a few other trifling matters! The events of the great war, we should hazard, have not an absolute monopoly of our strained attention.

In short, welcome to our staid midst, Arabian Nights "Marouf." May you be as gay and high-colored a piece of bizarrerie as another Arabian Nights morsel we remember having applauded more than ever on that same stage of the Metropolitan Opera House! We mean "Scheherazade," of course.

GLOBE NOVEMBER 23

RABAUD LEADS FINE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme Samaroff Pleases in Grieg Concerto

Mr Rabaud gave further proof of the fine qualities of his conducting yesterday. His "unfinished" symphony was exquisite romantic lyricism. The orchestra, attuning its voice to sheer and transparent beauty, sang the heavenly melodies of Schubert with tenderness, with grace, with a vernal freshness and animation, always as though with devotion. The strand was finely woven, one instrument taking with gallantry or with a curtsy the theme from the mouth of another, and spinning it into new loveliness. The slow movement was enchanting in its gentle melancholy, in the answering solace of its imperturbable calm, in a classic repose which by the plasticity and sympathy of Mr Rabaud's treatment became imaginative, even improvisational.

If the conductor brought to us Schubert as a charming and spontaneous singer, he only went from one romanticist to another of more modern idiom and palette in Grieg's piano concerto in A minor, for which Mme Olga Samaroff was the soloist. Mr Rabaud's reading of this poignantly imaginative score was one of many moments of happy appreciation and sympathy. How hauntingly beautiful the introduction to the adagio for muted strings, with the darkly impassioned song of the 'cellos, and how autobiographical of Grieg!

Again in Saint-Saens' organ symphony, Mr Rabaud took due note of the polished expression, the characteristic pomp in sonorities as in rhythmical figuration; the equally characteristic elegance which never fails the conductor's senior countryman, and on occasion becomes majestic, as in the pontifical entrance of the organ, the pedals supporting the pageantry of the strings and rearing in dim vastness the curve of the cathedral nave. The organ was played yesterday by Albert Snow with discreet and expressive registration, with precision and taste.

Mme Samaroff has now in her playing a warmer feeling for the poetic content. The interim has added imagination and perception to performance. Fortunately she is not a heroic pianist. May she never become one. Her playing suggests visions. That is enough for the piano. It need not claim dominion over the air, the land and the sea. There was distinction, a fine sense of proportion in the curve of many a phrase—in the rhythmically satisfying announcement of the first theme of the first movement, which the pianist developed admirably in the cadenza in th

HERALD NOVEMBER 28,

CONCERTS, LECTURES

The program of the Symphony concerts, Mr. Rabaud conductor, in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night will include Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, DuKas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Borodin's Symphony No. 2, B minor. There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will be absent. The program of the concerts of Dec. 13, 14 is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Converse, Symphonic Poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter" (after Walt Whitman); Guilmant, Symphony No. 1 for organ and orchestra (Joseph Bonnet, organist.)

Mr. Newman's illustrated Traveltalk in Symphony Hall tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon will treat of "Wartime Italy."

The concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock will be given by Josef Rosenblatt, the celebrated accompaniment which we as cept in a few passages, it ne

a few successive seconds
less than this problem of man to come to a clear realizatio are moments when the m era-bouffe of Lecocq and Aud ould not be more thunder

BOSTON SYMPHONY.
stra under its new conductor, Henri
d leader of the Paris Opéra orchestra.

oser in the passages, such as ich he chooses to take as dramat er told their loves more ar r air in the fourth act. Whe or pictorial, or humorous, or mposer never seems able to d ion, now the literalness of r estra, and again an accompan proportions. It is in this la ppy, especially in the really brilliant ach of the caravan in the last act."

Rabaud myriad-minded as im as a conductor:

of his predecessors, will come to the
the opera-house rather than the his Parisian reputation as orchestral
l; while here in Boston he will have rtunity such as he has never enjoyed to stimulate him. He is a practised
e; he is diligent in rehearsal; he wins will of his men, as he does, indeed, of contact with him. By the warrant rograms through twenty pairs of con-
Orchestra should be catholic enough
ing. Clearly, in all that pertains to
d. As plainly, by the token of his s opera of 'Marouf,' he lacks neither of color—both essential qualities in a
many a sign on the pages of his music,
allic lucidity of mind. He sets down would say in tones and indicates as which it should be said. A like sense
sult, presumably distinguishes him as iliar phrase that orchestras apply to willingly, 'he will know what he wants

The Ev
PHILADELPHIA,
NOV 191

Fradkin, an American violinist years of age, born in Troy, New ssian parents, and educated under radieck, Max Bendix, Remy, Jac
Lefort and others, has been ap concertmaster of the reorganized mphony Orchestra. Fradkin r first prize for violin playing at Conservatoire, in 1909. Amo were Faure, Colonne, Vidal. The Later he went to study with made his debut in Carnegie Hall
th the New York Philharmonic ston of the late Gustave Mahler de appearances in London, Co
Austria with great success, be soloist for the ballet. This able post for so young a man
TUDE offers its congratulations
shes to the lucky Mr. Fradkin.

om EVENING LEDGER
ddress New York City
ate NOV 9 1918

"CLEANING UP" THE ORCHESTRAS

MOST OF THE EXCITEMENT in the musical history of the past four years has been furnished by conductors instead of prima donnas. It is not suggested that jealousy of the long monopoly enjoyed by the sisterhood led the former to seize the international situation and make it their own. Certainly no prima donna fr whatever impulse will find her acts so filling the historical pag as those of Dr. Muck and Dr. Kunwald. They are now inter ed. Toscanini went back to Italy to lend his assistance to his native country, but the editor of The Musical Courier (New York) is responsible for the statement that "he stopt conducting a concert in Rome because the audience objected to the German numbers on his program." Mr. Josef Stransky, of the Philharmonic, has been the target for attack, but, as the same writer says, "he pointed to the fact that he has taken out American naturalization papers, and emphasized his Czecho-Slovak origin." Besides Mr Stransky, Alfred Hertz, of the San Francisco Orchestra, and Arthur Bodansky, of the Metropolitan Opera, also "asked Uncle Sam for first papers of citizenship." Frederick Stock, of Chicago, finds himself in so anomalous a position that we give this extract from the Chicago Tribune, citing it in more detail:

"In a letter which expresses a very fine-spirited sense of responsibility and unselfish devotion to the Chicago Orchestra, its conductor, Mr. Frederick A. Stock, has tendered his resignation to the Orchestral Association.

"The tender has been accepted by the trustees for reasons which in no way reflect upon Mr. Stock, but are founded on the same careful regard for the welfare of the great institution they serve as has moved Mr. Stock's action.

"Mr. Stock feels, and the trustees accept his point of view, that his failure to perfect the legal formalities of citizenship by taking out his second papers lays him open, and possibly the orchestra likewise, to some public criticism. Technically Mr. Stock is an 'alien enemy,' and Mr. Stock, with very rare consideration, has felt that his continuance as conductor might be misconstrued and erected, however unjustly, into an offense against the institution. To avoid any possible shadow of affront to its patronage or the introduction of any sentiment which might deprive the concerts of their proper atmosphere, Mr. Stock and the trustees, on the former's generous initiative, have adopted the course taken.

"At the same time the trustees take occasion to make it clear that Mr. Stock's essential loyalty to the nation is fully recognized by them, as well as his years of faithful service to the orchestra. The resignation, therefore, will interrupt Mr. Stock's official connection with the orchestra, not finally sever it, for it is desired and expected that he will take up the baton again when the present legal objection has been removed. The feeling shown by the trustees has been earned by a devotion not often found in service, and it will be shared by the great majority, if not indeed all, of the orchestra patrons. It is proper for the public to know of the confidence felt by the trustees in Mr. Stock and to recognize the honorable motives which moved him. He retires with great credit and will be welcomed back with friendliness unabated, if not indeed increased."

The Boston Symphony situation, solved by the engagement of Henri Rabaud was treated in this department October 26. The Musical Courier's editor points out that the intern before he begins his duties will be filled by Pierre Monteux, who "when he first landed here refused to conduct a Richard Strauss work," but "he has just announced that during the month of is temporary conductorship of the Boston Symphony he wi program Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Liszt, and oth Austro-German classics." Nothing is said, tho, about Mr. Monteux's frequently stated discrimination between living and dead German composers. The editor's final observation is:

"After the Boston and Cincinnati sensations, a 'cleaning-up' process took place in all the American orchestras, and to-day it is fairly certain that if any pro-Germans exist in these bodies they are more silent than the well-known untalkative Sphinx."

MONITOR NOVEMBER 23,

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, fourth concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, Boston, afternoon of Nov. 22, 1918, Olga Samaroff, pianist, soloist. The program: Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor; Grieg, Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, Op. 16; Saint-Saëns, Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78. (Albert Snow, organist).

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Gradually his Boston public is coming to form a comprehensive and just estimate of Mr. Rabaud as it has opportunity to analyze his work. Previous to the concerts of this week, he had disclosed himself through Beethoven as a dignified, scholarly, yet fervid director. He had also shown remarkable skill as an accompanying conductor. This week he strengthened these impressions and gave in addition through the Homeric measures of Saint-Saëns, a glimpse of capabilities hitherto not in evidence. On the last occasion when Boston heard this symphony, the orchestra was under a constricting Teutonic domination; this time it had achieved a Gallic freedom and played with a warmth and spontaneity that the former rendition lacked. It was perhaps only to be expected that Mr. Rabaud should give a reading of his friend's work that should bear the stamp of authority; the breadth of vision and the depth of understanding he put into it, however, were welcome earnests of his unfolding genius.

It is a profitable topic for debate whether if Schubert had completed his B Minor Symphony it would have the degree of popularity which it enjoys in its unfinished state. Four ove-

Mme. Olga Samaroff played the Grieg piano Concerto spiritedly, a rendering more notable in tone perhaps than in interpretation. Mr. Rabaud gave what must be a most gratifying accompaniment to a soloist, although in this instance the soloist notably deferred to the conductor, a proceeding whereby the composer gained most of all.

On Sunday, Nov. 17 Josef Hofmann appeared in piano recital, playing a familiar program—so familiar it even included the Rubinstein "Melody in F"—with great power and in scholarly fashion. Mr. Hofmann's ability to pick out and emphasize the salient phrases of a composition—even of the Rubinstein "Melody in F"—makes a recital by him musically profitable both in an educative and a pleasurable sense.

As a result of the changes in personnel and management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Longy Club of wind instruments has had to be reorganized, and Mr. Georges Longy, the leader, announces that concerts are in contemplation by a group of players appearing under the same name and drawn from the faculty of the Longy School of Music.

NEW YORK CITY,
COMMERCIAL-HERALD
NOV 10 '918

54

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AGAIN EXPECT FRENCH CONDUCTOR TO RESTORE ORCHESTRA'S SUPREMACY

Herald's Critic Reviews Second Concert and Looks for Gradual Assimilation of New Artists in Reorganized Orchestra Under M. Ribaud.

53

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

After more than a quarter of a century of personal opinion that the Boston Symphony was one of the best, if not the best, orchestras in the world one listened almost aghast in half convinced wonderment to the playing of the orchestra last Thursday night. Critical promptings to exclaim "Ebeu Fugaces," "Ichabod, Ichabod" and other comminatory comments were too insistent to be allowed expression, because no constructive critic aims or wishes to overturn idols or subvert ideals. For the Boston orchestra has been an undisturbed orchestral ideal to the American public for years.

Neither would any likeminded critic desire to support Colonel Higginson's dictum that none but a German conductor can conduct a symphony, or in any way indorse the notion that without German musicians no orchestra could continue to exist in this country.

The wonderful unison voice of this orchestra, in effect a magnificent single instrument, was a definite characteristic which made it almost unique. The playing together in personal contact, as it were, of so many men and so many instruments for so many years produced a unity of intent, impulse and actual tonal values unattainable in any other way.

Granting this, it is evident that any considerable change in the personnel of the orchestra, due to war requirements, would inevitably disturb for the time being at any rate previously existent orchestral conditions. I cannot but feil that the previous spirit and purpose of this great orchestra is still dominant—for nearly forty years of great tradition must mean something—and that all that is needed now is a gradual assimilation of and adaptation to new conditions under such a conductor as I hope Mr. Henri Rabaud may prove to easily restore the Boston orchestra to the former high and acknowledged orchestral supremacy to which its great traditions and lofty purposes entitle it.

Heard in New Programme.

The orchestra for so many years has been so supreme that slight technical imperfections, which might be passed over with any other organization, in this instance cannot remain unnoticed. The playing of the orchestra in the second concert of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was not such as to lead me to revise my former impression of Thursday. The classical definiteness of Händel's Concerto Grosso, No. 5, in D major, which opened the programme, after the vague and elusive meandering of the modern French school of late, was positively refreshing in its old time formality. The strings played with accuracy and precision, if without any suave roundness or nobility of tone, but it struck me that the solo part, as rendered by Messrs. Fradkin—the new concert master—and Noak, sounded both thin and unimportant—Mr. Malkin's, 'cello and Mr. Barrere's viola were much more impressive. The last movement allegro was by far the best played of the five movements of the work, as it possessed a life, finish, tonal and vocal quality seemingly lacking in the other four.

The Loeffler number, "La Bonne Chanson," already familiar to us, with its "Tristan" references was played with distinction, good balance and contrast of sonority, and marked, perhaps, the best work done by the orchestra thus far. Mr. Monteux, too, for once content to let things take their own way, did not fume and insist too far.

D'Indy's "Istar" Played.

Vincent d'Indy, whose symphonic variations, "Istar," followed, has always represented to me the maximum of self-conscious empiricism, froth and harmonic extravagance of the modern French school at its worst, as well as the minimum of melodic invention or spontaniety. In straightforwardness of musical thought in conception and expression d'Indy is, however, at his best in this work, as in the interpretation of its strongly insistent dramatic suggestion, which approaches the operatic, was also Mr. Monteux, who conducted with picturesque appreciation and effect. The breadth and sonority of the strings was really imposing.

Mr. Monteau's interpretation of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which closed the programme, was somewhat perfunctorily and badly classical, a trifle blatant in the fortissimo and crudely unfinished in the softer passages; rather forcibly rythmic, but decidedly lacking in plasticity and charta. The two first movements were decidedly perfunctory, the lovely allegretto almost wholly without sentiment. The scherzo, read conventionally, was nevertheless played with spirit and rhythm, and the last movement was brilliant in a sort of rough and ready fashion. All honor to Mr. Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, who played this symphony at its last previous hearing. I look for important and welcome changes in the playing of Boston Orchestra before its after Mr. Rabaud takes hold

New York Times
NOV. 10

TWO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS PLAY

Pierre Monteux Again Conducts the Boston at Matinee in Carnegie Hall.

53

TRIUMPH FOR LEVITZKI

Young American Displays His Pianistic Prowess at Concert of the New York Symphony Society.

The first matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon before a large audience, which enthusiastically demanded the "Marseillaise" after Pierre Monteux had conducted the national anthem. It was delivered with accustomed Gallic gusto. Whether he be considered as a temporary conductor or as a skilled and versatile musician, M. Monteux deserves the gratitude of our musical public. Yesterday his brief connection with the band from Boston came to a close, and tomorrow evening we hope to see him in his familiar place at the head of the Metropolitan Opera forces. The music at the matinée went with more precision and spirit than at the opening concert last Thursday evening. And the musical scheme was more interesting. Handel, Loeffler, D'Indy and Beethoven. Two old-time Germans, one American and one Frenchman.

The tonality D major began and ended the matinée Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, for string orchestra, was, no doubt, selected to show the paces of that particular department. It must be confessed that neither the reading nor the performance was distinguished. The Introduction and Allegro were rather wiry in tone, nor was the Largo ingratiating to the ear. The various solos were played by Frederick Fradkin, the new concert master; his colleague, S. Noack; C. Barrier, viola, and J. Malkin, violoncello.

The absence of elasticity in the strings did not cease with the Handel number, for "La Bonne Chanson," by Charles Martin Loeffler, which followed, lacked an eloquent interpretation for patent reasons. This orchestral poem has not been heard here for years. Since then the composer has revised the score and reconstructed it. He has employed as his motto the fifth poem in the Paul Verlaine's delicate and tender "La Bonne Chanson." Loeffler is a tone painter doubled by a poet; even if he were not a musician he could not have escaped the temptation to drop into verse, like Silas Wegg. His score is rich in sentiment and shifting moods, its coloring ranging from sombre purple to the violet rays. The Loeffler palette is red with brains and lovely hues. This work was originally presented in company with the composer's "Villanelle du Diable."

The Symphonic Variations, by Vincent D'Indy, "Istar," the Oriental young woman who is divested of her harmonic flagerie coram publico, had the proper atmospheric quality. It is cerebral music at the best, and it reveals the frigidity of an Academic nude by Jules Lefabvre. But enormously clever. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony closed a pleasant afternoon, though there was nothing of note in the performance except that the Allegretto was the high-water mark of the program, while a word is not amiss concerning the dash of the finale. As a whole, there were rough spots and tonal dryness. M. Monteux was warmly received and, considering the task he essayed at such short notice he admirably succeeded. The rôle of a stop-gap is ever thankless.

The young American pianist, Mischa Levitzki, enjoyed a genuine triumph at Carnegie Hall last night. It wa sat the

om RECORD
ddress Philadelphia, Pa.
ate

IN THE PROVINCES THINGS COME SLOW

Yet They Do Eventually Arrive, as Witness, Par Exemple, "Marouf."

AN ELDERLY VERDI OPERA

"Forza del Destino," Revival, Is Nearest Thing to Opening Novelty.

WELL, after all, it seems, we provincials are to have an opportunity to hear 'Marouf.' To be sure, we will be about a year behind the fair. But, never mind. If the thing is worth waiting for, nobody will complain.

Certainly the fact that the opera's distinguished composer is now established in this country will not in any way hurt the performance for us. Soon we shall also have an opportunity to behold M. Rabaud swing the conductor's baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And Monteux, the present conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will then swing the baton over singers and players on the opening 'Marouf' night. This is interchangeableness with a vengeance—and complexity, and real Gallic invasion, and a few other trifling matters! The events of the great war, we should hazard, have not an absolute monopoly of our strained attention.

In short, welcome to our staid midst, Arabian Nights "Marouf." May you be as gay and high-colored a piece of bizarrerie as another Arabian Nights morsel we remember having applauded more than ever on that same stage of the Metropolitan Opera House! We mean "Scheherazade," of course.

GLOBE NOVEMBER 23

RABAUD LEADS FINE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme Samaroff Pleases in Grieg Concerto

Mr Rabaud gave further proof of the fine qualities of his conducting yesterday. His "unfinished" symphony was exquisite romantic lyricism. The orchestra, attuning its voice to sheer and transparent beauty, sang the heavenly melodies of Schubert with tenderness, with grace, with a vernal freshness and animation, always as though with devotion. The strand was finely woven, one instrument taking with gallantry or with a curtsy the theme from the mouth of another, and spinning it into new loveliness. The slow movement was enchanting in its gentle melancholy, in the answering solace of its imperturbable calm, in a classic repose which by the plasticity and sympathy of Mr Rabaud's treatment became imaginative, even improvisational.

If the conductor brought to us Schubert as a charming and spontaneous singer, he only went from one romanticist to another of more modern idiom and palette in Grieg's piano concerto in A minor, for which Mme Olga Samaroff was the soloist. Mr Rabaud's reading of this poignantly imaginative score was one of many moments of happy appreciation and sympathy. How hauntingly beautiful the introduction to the adagio for muted strings, with the darkly impassioned song of the 'cellos, and how autobiographical of Grieg!

Again in Saint-Saens' organ symphony, Mr Rabaud took due note of the polished expression, the characteristic pomp in sonorities as in rhythmical figuration; the equally characteristic elegance which never fails the conductor's senior countryman, and on occasion becomes majestic, as in the pontifical entrance of the organ, the pedals supporting the pageantry of the strings and rearing in dim vastness the curve of the cathedral nave. The organ was played yesterday by Albert Snow with discreet and expressive registration, with precision and taste.

Mme Samaroff has now in her playing a warmer feeling for the poetic content. The interim has added imagination and perception to performance. Fortunately she is not a heroic pianist. May she never become one. Her playing suggests visions. That is enough for the piano. It need not claim dominion over the air, the land and the sea. There was distinction, a fine sense of proportion in the curve of many a phrase—in the rhythmically satisfying announcement of the first theme of the first movement, which the pianist developed admirably in the cadenza, in th

HERALD NOVEMBER 28.

CONCERTS, LECTURES

The program of the Symphony concerts, Mr. Rabaud conductor, in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night will include Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, DuKas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Borodin's Symphony No. 2, B minor. There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will be absent. The program of the concerts of Dec. 13, 14 is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Converse, Symphonic Poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter" (after Walt Whitman); Guilmant, Symphony No. 1 for organ and orchestra (Joseph Bonnet, organist.)

Mr. Newman's illustrated Traveltalk in Symphony Hall tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon will treat of "Wartime Italy."

The concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock will be given by Josef Rosenblatt, the celebrated accompaniment which we ass-ept in a few passages, it nev

a few successive seconds.
less than this problem of man to come to a clear realization of are moments when the music era-bouffe of Lecocq and Andr ould not be more thundero

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

estra under its new conductor, H
nd leader of the Paris Opéra orche oser in the passages, such a hich he chooses to take as dra ver told their loves more a er air in the fourth act. W or pictorial, or humorous, or mposer never seems able to d sion, now the literalness of r estra, and again an accompa d proportions. It is in this ppy, especially in the really bri oach of the caravan in the last act."

Rabaud myriad-minded as a im as a conductor:

of his predecessors, will come to the
the opera-house rather than the
his Parisian reputation as orchestral
l; while here in Boston he will have rtunity such as he has never enjoyed to stimulate him. He is a practised
e; he is diligent in rehearsal; he wins will of his men, as he does, indeed, of contact with him. By the warrant rograms through twenty pairs of con-
Orchestra should be catholic enough ting. Clearly, in all that pertains to
d. As plainly, by the token of his
s opera of 'Marouf,' he lacks neither of color—both essential qualities in a
many a sign on the pages of his music,
allic lucidity of mind. He sets down would say in tones and indicates as which it should be said. A like sense
sult, presumably distinguishes him as iliar phrase that orchestras apply to willingly, 'he will know what he wants

The Ev

PHILADELPHIA,

NOV 191

Fradkin, an American violin years of age, born in Troy, N ussian parents, and educated radieck, Max Bendix, Remy,
, Lefort and others, has been concertmaster of the reorgan mphony Orchestra. Fradkin first prize for violin playing Conservatoire, in 1909. Am were Faure, Colonne, Vidal.
Later he went to study w made his debut in Carnegie H
th the New York Philharmon aton of the late Gustave Mah ade appearances in London.
Austria with great success,
soloist for the ballet. This iable post for so young a m ETUDE offers its congratulati
shes to the lucky Mr. Fradkin.

om EDWARD DIGBY
ddress New York City
ate NOV 9 1918

"CLEANING UP" THE ORCHESTRAS

MOST OF THE EXCITEMENT in the musical history of the past four years has been furnished by conductors instead of prima donnas. It is not suggested that jealousy of the long monopoly enjoyed by the sisterhood led the former to seize the international situation and make it their own. Certainly no prima donna from whatever impulse will find her acts so filling the historical page as those of Dr. Muck and Dr. Kunwald. They are now interned. Toscanini went back to Italy to lend his assistance to his native country, but the editor of The Musical Courier (New York) is responsible for the statement that "he stopt conducting a concert in Rome because the audience objected to the German numbers on his program." Mr. Josef Stransky, of the Philharmonic, has been the target for attack, but, as the same writer says, "he pointed to the fact that he has taken out American naturalization papers, and emphasized his Czecho-Slovak origin." Besides Mr Stransky, Alfred Hertz, of the San Francisco Orchestra, and Arthur Bodansky, of the Metropolitan Opera, also "asked Uncle Sam for first papers of citizenship." Frederick Stock, of Chicago, finds himself in so anomalous a position that we give this extract from the Chicago Tribune, citing it in more detail:

"In a letter which expresses a very fine-spirited sense of responsibility and unselfish devotion to the Chicago Orchestra, its conductor, Mr. Frederick A. Stock, has tendered his resignation to the Orchestral Association.

"The tender has been accepted by the trustees for reasons which in no way reflect upon Mr. Stock, but are founded on the same careful regard for the welfare of the great institution they serve as has moved Mr. Stock's action.

"Mr. Stock feels, and the trustees accept his point of view, that his failure to perfect the legal formalities of citizenship by taking out his second papers lays him open, and possibly the orchestra likewise, to some public criticism. Technically Mr. Stock is an 'alien enemy,' and Mr. Stock, with very rare consideration, has felt that his continuance as conductor might be misconstrued and erected, however unjustly, into an offense against the institution. To avoid any possible shadow of affront to its patronage or the introduction of any sentiment which might deprive the concerts of their proper atmosphere, Mr. Stock and the trustees, on the former's generous initiative, have adopted the course taken.

"At the same time the trustees take occasion to make it clear that Mr. Stock's essential loyalty to the nation is fully recognized by them, as well as his years of faithful service to the orchestra. The resignation, therefore, will interrupt Mr. Stock's official connection with the orchestra, not finally sever it, for it is desired and expected that he will take up the baton again when the present legal objection has been removed. The feeling shown by the trustees has been earned by a devotion not often found in service, and it will be shared by the great majority, if not indeed all, of the orchestra patrons. It is proper for the public to know of the confidence felt by the trustees in Mr. Stock and to recognize the honorable motives which moved him. He retires with great credit and will be welcomed back with friendliness unabated, if not indeed increased."

The Boston Symphony situation, solved by the engagement of Henri Rabaud, was treated in this department October 26. The Musical Courier's editor points out that the intern before he begins his duties will be filled by Pierre Monteux, who "when he first landed here refused to conduct a Richard Strauss work," but "he has just announced that during the month of is temporary conductorship of the Boston Symphony he will program Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Liszt, and other Austro-German classics." Nothing is said, tho, about Mr. Monteux's frequently stated discrimination between living and dead German composers. The editor's final observation is:

"After the Boston and Cincinnati sensations, a 'cleaning-up' process took place in all the American orchestras, and to-day it is fairly certain that if any pro-Germans exist in those bodies they are more silent than the well-known untalkative Sphinx."

MONITOR NOVEMBER 23,

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, fourth concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, Boston, afternoon of Nov. 22, 1918, Olga Samaroff, pianist, soloist. The program: Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor; Grieg, Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, Op. 16; Saint-Saëns, Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78. (Albert Snow, organist).

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Gradually his Boston public is coming to form a comprehensive and just estimate of Mr. Rabaud as it has opportunity to analyze his work. Previous to the concerts of this week, he had disclosed himself through Beethoven as a dignified, scholarly, yet fervid director. He had also shown remarkable skill as an accompanying conductor. This week he strengthened these impressions and gave in addition through the Homeric measures of Saint-Saëns, a glimpse of capabilities hitherto not in evidence. On the last occasion when Boston heard this symphony, the orchestra was under a constricting Teutonic domination; this time it had achieved a Gallic freedom and played with a warmth and spontaneity that the former rendition lacked. It was perhaps only to be expected that Mr. Rabaud should give a reading of his friend's work that should bear the stamp of authority; the breadth of vision and the depth of understanding he put into it, however, were welcome earnests of his unfolding genius.

It is a profitable topic for debate whether if Schubert had completed his B Minor Symphony it would have the degree of popularity which it enjoys in its unfinished state. Four move-

Mme. Olga Samaroff played the Grieg piano Concerto spiritedly, a rendering more notable in tone perhaps than in interpretation. Mr. Rabaud gave what must be a most gratifying accompaniment to a soloist, although in this instance the soloist notably deferred to the conductor, a proceeding whereby the composer gained most of all.

On Sunday, Nov. 17 Josef Hofmann appeared in piano recital, playing a familiar program—so familiar it even included the Rubinstein "Melody in F"—with great power and in scholarly fashion. Mr. Hofmann's ability to pick out and emphasize the salient phrases of a composition—even of the Rubinstein "Melody in F"—makes a recital by him musically profitable both in an educative and a pleasurable sense.

As a result of the changes in personnel and management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Longy Club of wind instruments has had to be reorganized, and Mr. Georges Longy, the leader, announces that concerts are in contemplation by a group of players appearing under the same name and drawn from the faculty of the Longy School of Music.

NEW YORK CITY,
COMMERCIAL-HERALD
NOV 10 '918

54

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AGAIN EXPECT FRENCH CONDUCTOR TO RESTORE ORCHESTRA'S SUPREMACY

Herald's Critic Reviews Second Concert and Looks for Gradual Assimilation of New Artists in Reorganized Orchestra Under M. Ribaud.

53

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

After more than a quarter of a century of personal opinion that the Boston Symphony was one of the best, if not the best, orchestras in the world one listened almost aghast in half convinced wonderment to the playing of the orchestra last Thursday night. Critical promptings to exclaim "Ebeu Fugaces," "Ichabod, Ichabod" and other comminatory comments were too insistent to be allowed expression, because no constructive critic aims or wishes to overturn idols or subvert ideals. For the Boston orchestra has been an undisturbed orchestral ideal to the American public for years.

Neither would any likeminded critic desire to support Colonel Higginson's dictum that none but a German conductor can conduct a symphony, or in any way indorse the notion that without German musicians no orchestra could continue to exist in this country.

The wonderful unison voice of this orchestra, in effect a magnificent single instrument, was a definite characteristic which made it almost unique. The playing together in personal contact, as it were, of so many men and so many instruments for so many years produced a unity of intent, impulse and actual tonal values unattainable in any other way.

Granting this, it is evident that any considerable change in the personnel of the orchestra, due to war requirements, would inevitably disturb for the time beinng at any rate previously existent orchestral conditions. I cannot but feil that the previous spirit and purpose of this great orchestra is still dominant—for nearly forty years of great tradition must mean something—and that all that is needed now is a gradual assimilation of and adaptation to new conditions under such a conductor as I hope Mr. Henri Rabaud may prove to easily restore the Boston orchestra to the former high and acknowledged orchestral supremacy to which its great traditions and lofty purposes entitle it.

Heard in New Programme.

The orchestra for so many years has been so supreme that slight technical imperfections, which might be passed over with any other organization, in this instance cannot remain unnoticed. The playing of the orchestra in the second concert of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was not such as to lead me to revise my former impression of Thursday. The classical definiteness of Händel's Concerto Grosso, No. 5, in D major, which opened the programme, after the vague and elusive meandering of the modern French school of late, was positively refreshing in its old time formality. The strings played with accuracy and precision, if without any suave roundness or nobility of tone, but it struck me that the solo part, as rendered by Messrs. Fradkin—the new concert master—and Noak, sounded both thin and unimportant—Mr. Malkin's, 'cello and Mr. Barrere's viola were much more impressive. The last movement allegro was by far the best played of the five movements of the work, as it possessed a life, finish, tonal and vocal quality seemingly lacking in the other four.

The Loeffler number, "La Bonne Chanson," already familiar to us, with its "Tristan" references was played with distinction, good balance and contrast of sonority, and marked, perhaps, the best work done by the orchestra thus far. Mr. Monteux, too, for once content to let things take their own way, did not fume and insist too far.

D'Indy's "Istar" Played.

Vincent d'Indy, whose symphonic variations, "Istar," followed, has always represented to me the maximum of self-conscious empiricism, froth and harmonic extravagance of the modern French school at its worst, as well as the minimum of melodic invention or spontaniety. In straightforwardness of musical thought in conception and expression d'Indy is, however, at his best in this work, as in the interpretation of its strongly insistent dramatic suggestion, which approaches the operatic, was also Mr. Monteux, who conducted with picturesque appreciation and effect. The breadth and sonority of the strings was really imposing.

Mr. Monteau's interpretation of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which closed the programme, was somewhat perfunctorily and badly classical, a trifle blatant in the fortissimo and crudely unfinished in the softer passages; rather forcibly rythmic, but decidedly lacking in plasticity and charm. The two first movements were decidedly perfunctory, the lovely allegretto almost wholly without sentiment. The scherzo, read conventionally, was nevertheless played with spirit and rhythm, and the last movement was brilliant in a sort of rough and ready fashion. All honor to Mr. Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, who played this symphony at its last previous hearing. I look for important and welcome changes in the playing of Boston Orchestra before its [illegible] after Mr. Rabaud takes hold

New York Times
NOV 10

TWO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS PLAY

Pierre Monteux Again Conducts the Boston at Matinee in Carnegie Hall.

53

TRIUMPH FOR LEVITZKI

Young American Displays His Pianistic Prowess at Concert of the New York Symphony Society.

The first matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon before a large audience, which enthusiastically demanded the "Marseillaise" after Pierre Monteux had conducted the national anthem. It was delivered with accustomed Gallic gusto. Whether he be considered as a temporary conductor or as a skilled and versatile musician, M. Monteux deserves the gratitude of our musical public. Yesterday his brief connection with the band from Boston came to a close, and tomorrow evening we hope to see him in his familiar place at the head of the Metropolitan Opera forces. The music at the matinée went with more precision and spirit than at the opening concert last Thursday evening. And the musical scheme was more interesting. Handel, Loeffler, D'Indy and Beethoven. Two old-time Germans, one American and one Frenchman.

The tonality D major began and ended the matinée Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, for string orchestra, was, no doubt, selected to show the paces of that particular department. It must be confessed that neither the reading nor the performance was distinguished. The Introduction and Allegro were rather wiry in tone, nor was the Largo ingratiating to the ear. The various solos were played by Frederick Fradkin, the new concert master; his colleague, S. Noack; C. Barrier, viola, and J. Malkin, violoncello.

The absence of elasticity in the strings did not cease with the Handel number, for "La Bonne Chanson," by Charles Martin Loeffler, which followed, lacked an eloquent interpretation for patent reasons. This orchestral poem has not been heard here for years. Since then the composer has revised the score and reconstructed it. He has employed as his motto the fifth poem in the Paul Verlaine's delicate and tender "La Bonne Chanson." Loeffler is a tone painter doubled by a poet; even if he were not a musician he could not have escaped the temptation to drop into verse, like Silas Wegg. His score is rich in sentiment and shifting moods, its coloring ranging from sombre purple to the violet rays. The Loeffler palette is mixed with brains and lovely hues. This work was originally presented in company with the composer's "Villanelle du Diable."

The Symphonic Variations, by Vincent D'Indy, "Istar," the Oriental young woman who is divested of her harmonic lingerie coram publico, had the proper atmospheric quality. It is cerebral music at the best, and it reveals the frigidity of an Academic nude by Jules Lefebvre. But enormously clever. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony closed a pleasant afternoon, though there was nothing of note in the performance except that the Allegretto was the high-water mark of the program, while a word is not amiss concerning the dash of the finale. As a whole, there were rough spots and tonal dryness. M. Monteux was warmly received and, considering the task he essayed at such short notice he admirably succeeded. The rôle of a stop-gap is ever thankless.

The young American pianist, Mischa Levitzki, enjoyed a genuine triumph at Carnegie Hall last night. It wa sat the

om RECORD
ddress Philadelphia, Pa.
ate

IN THE PROVINCES THINGS COME SLOW

Yet They Do Eventually Arrive, as Witness, Par Exemple, "Marouf."

AN ELDERLY VERDI OPERA

"Forza del Destino," Revival, Is Nearest Thing to Opening Novelty.

WELL, after all, it seems, we provincials are to have an opportunity to hear 'Marouf.' To be sure, we will be about a year behind the fair. But, never mind. If the thing is worth waiting for, nobody will complain.

Certainly the fact that the opera's distinguished composer is now established in this country will not in any way hurt the performance for us. Soon we shall also have an opportunity to behold M. Rabaud swing the conductor's baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And Monteux, the present conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will then swing the baton over singers and players on the opening 'Marouf' night. This is interchangeableness with a vengeance—and complexity, and real Gallic invasion, and a few other trifling matters! The events of the great war, we should hazard, have not an absolute monopoly of our strained attention.

In short, welcome to our staid midst, Arabian Nights "Marouf." May you be as gay and high-colored a piece of bizarrerie as another Arabian Nights morsel we remember having applauded more than ever on that same stage of the Metropolitan Opera House! We mean "Scheherazade," of course.

GLOBE NOVEMBER

RABAUD LEADS FINE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme Samaroff Pleases in Grieg Concerto

Mr Rabaud gave further proof of the fine qualities of his conducting yesterday. His "unfinished" symphony was exquisite romantic lyricism. The orchestra, attuning its voice to sheer and transparent beauty, sang the heavenly melodies of Schubert with tenderness, with grace, with a vernal freshness and animation, always as though with devotion. The strand was finely woven, one instrument taking with gallantry or with a curtsy the theme from the mouth of another, and spinning it into new loveliness. The slow movement was enchanting in its gentle melancholy, in the answering solace of its imperturbable calm, in a classic repose which by the plasticity and sympathy of Mr Rabaud's treatment became imaginative, even improvisational.

If the conductor brought to us Schubert as a charming and spontaneous singer, he only went from one romanticist to another of more modern idiom and palette in Grieg's piano concerto in A minor, for which Mme Olga Samaroff was the soloist. Mr Rabaud's reading of this poignantly imaginative score was one of many moments of happy appreciation and sympathy. How hauntingly beautiful the introduction to the adagio for muted strings, with the darkly impassioned song of the 'cellos, and how autobiographical of Grieg!

Again in Saint-Saens' organ symphony, Mr Rabaud took due note of the polished expression, the characteristic pomp in sonorities as in rhythmical figuration; the equally characteristic elegance which never fails the conductor's senior countryman, and on occasion becomes majestic, as in the pontifical entrance of the organ, the pedals supporting the pageantry of the strings and rearing in dim vastness the curve of the cathedral nave. The organ was played yesterday by Albert Snow with discreet and expressive registration, with precision and taste.

Mme Samaroff has now in her playing a warmer feeling for the poetic content. The interim has added imagination and perception to performance. Fortunately she is not a heroic pianist. May she never become one. Her playing suggests visions. That is enough for the piano. It need not claim dominion over the air, the land and the sea. There was distinction, a fine sense of proportion in the curve of many a phrase—in the rhythmically satisfying announcement of the first theme of the first movement, which the pianist developed admirably in the cadenza, in th

HERALD NOVEMBER 28.

CONCERTS, LECTURES

The program of the Symphony concerts, Mr. Rabaud conductor, in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night will include Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, DuKas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Borodin's Symphony No. 2, B minor. There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will be absent. The program of the concerts of Dec. 13, 14 is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Converse, Symphonic Poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter" (after Walt Whitman); Guilmant, Symphony No. 1 for organ and orchestra (Joseph Bonnet, organist.)

Mr. Newman's illustrated Traveltalk in Symphony Hall tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon will treat of "Wartime Italy."

The concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock will be given by Josef Rosenblatt, the celebrated

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
NOV 9 1919

Eagle

55

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Reorganized Orchestra Is Greeted at Academy by Undemonstrative Audience.

With a conductor, Pierre Monteux, borrowed for the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the year in the Academy of Music last evening. The audience which greeted the reorganized band was to all appearances the same which year after year has sat at the feet of the long line of conductors who in the past were responsible for the orchestra's premier place in the world of music. Last evening they heard a new orchestra, a new conductor—this time for the first a Frenchman—and realized that a new spirit had entered into personnel and spirit of the playing. Like all Brooklyn audiences that last evening was cautious in its applause, correct almost to coldness in its greeting of new faces, appreciative but undemonstrative, and in sharp contrast to that which greeted the orchestra the evening previous in Carnegie Hall. Last evening only one national air was played, "The Star-Spangled Banner." A few enthusiasts might have insisted upon more, but they were quickly hushed by the coldness of their fellows.

Florence Easton, soloist of the evening, sang the recitative "E Susanna non vien?" and the aria "Dove Sang," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and Lia's recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." The latter she delivered with much dramatic warmth, purity of tone and excellence of diction; but in the Mozart she was not so happy, for, while she entered fully into the spirit of the composition and revealed an intelligent grasp of the essentials of Mozart's style, she found only inadequate vocal expression for its classic and aristocratic line. For her Mr. Monteux furnished adequate accompaniments.

The purely orchestral numbers included the Franck Symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Debussy's "Iberia" (the second of his three "Images" for orchestra)—all three of which compositions had been played in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening—and D'Indy's symphonic variations "Istar." It was not altogether a representative program, but one which offered sufficient variety of composition to form an accurate estimate of the capability of the new band and of the conductor. Certainly, so far as the conductor was concerned, it seemed a program devised for his especial benefit, for its works were, with one exception, of the French school, and therefore particularly ingratiating for a French musician.

While the changes in the orchestra's personnel have been many, amounting in all to 25 per cent., enough of the older members were left after the purging of the Teutonic element to maintain the prestige of the band. What changes have taken place have affected the string sections primarily. There is a new American concertmaster, Frederic Fradkin; a new viola player at the first desk, Barrier, in lieu of Ferir, departed to Philadelphia; all in all, thirty-six old members and twenty-two new ones in the strings. In the woodwinds there is a new first flutist, one new clarinettist, one new bassoon and a new bass clarinet. There are changes in the horns and trombones, but the trumpets remain the same.

All these innovating moves have resulted in new qualities. The string section shows improvement, manifesting now a richer, more lustrous tone than ever before, particularly in the case of the second violins, who at times formerly approached to dryness of utterance. The woods and brasses are weaker in spots, more reliable in others. Today's band is one of euphony of utterance, pliant and pliable; still the premier orchestra of this country, and one to delight the mind of any conductor entrusted with the joy of leading it through the intricacies of an orchestral score. It is an orchestra capable of the fullest and most fitting expression, quick to respond to intelligent and penetrative direction. Its verve, its pliancy, its range of color, its brilliancy of execution, its power to stimulate ear and imagination are as potent as ever. With proper leadership there is musically nothing it canot accomplish.

For what Mr. Monteux has accomplished in the reorganization and rehabilitation of the band, much thanks are due him, and to him must go all the credit for the preliminary rehearsing. Mr. Rabaud, permanent conductor, finds a well-organized instrument to do his bidding.

As a conductor Mr. Monteux revealed nothing new to us last evening. He has been heard here many times, both as symphonic conductor of the civic concerts two years ago and as operatic with the Metropolitan last year. Before, he had been heard frequently with the Ballet Russe. But in all that time he never disclosed any qualities of greatness, and last evening and that before in New York he revealed nothing to change our estimate formed in seasons past. There was the same lack of decisiveness of beat, resulting in much roughness in an orchestra hitherto deemed incapable thereof; unformulated plan of outline; indefinite feeling for style.

The Franck Symphony received an amiable reading, but one that lost much of value because of its indefiniteness. This is music that because of its architechtonic structure submits to the finest and clearest of chiseling on the part of conductor. It can be made a Greek temple of sound; last evening its most delicate friezes were indistinct. Mr. Monteux hurried both first and last movements to distortion of the outline; only the allegretto was eloquent of Franck's complete genius.

On the other hand, the Debussy, which calls for atmosphere, almost impalpable at times, was clear cut to a fault. There is need for rhythmic precision in its glimpses of Spain, but not to the point of exaggeration disclosed by Mr. Monteux. The Schumann was better, and the D'Indy found the conductor at his best. Yet throughout the program was pervaded with an unevenness to which, in the case of this orchestra, we are unaccustomed. While under Mr. Monteux last evening it was still the best orchestra, it was so in spite of his lapses.

HERALD NOVEMBER 23

FOURTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Mr. Rabaud Gives Delightful Reading of Schubert's "Unfinished" Work

REPEAT THE SAME PROGRAM TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony; Grieg, piano concerto (Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist); Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor, No. 3.

When Joachim, one of the most impotent and stupid conductors we ever knew, was about to give a performance of the "Unfinished" symphony, he asked many musicians of Berlin what they thought the pace of the second theme, first announced by the violoncellos, in the first movement, should be. Some conductors sentimentalize this theme, dragging the pace until the song becomes lackadaisical. Mr. Rabaud is a musician of fine taste and judgment; he did not fall into this error. The symphony is eminently Schubertian in its beauty and in its weakness. For the most part the composer pipes his songs of innocence as the boy heard by William Blake; but in the first movement there are measures of a grandeur that is seldom found in Schubert's compositions. In these measures we recognize the Schubert that conceived the "Doppelgaenger," the "Gruppe aus Tartarus," the "Dwarf" and a few other songs in which dramatic force comes before charming lyricism.

Mr. Rabaud gave a most impressive interpretation of these measures. The whole movement by the force of the contrast gained thereby. As for the second movement, which shows Schubert's tendency toward prolixity, and is so inferior to the first that one rejoices because the symphony was left unfinished, all that is to be done with it is to let the composer pipe his pretty tunes. Some day a conductor may have the courage to play the first movement alone, a noble fragment, comparable with that torso in literature, the "Hyperion," of Keats.

Schubert wrote "Current a Calamo." It was otherwise with the Saint-Saens of the C minor symphony. We doubt whether his head were hot and his feet cold when he was engaged in the composition; but that head was full of invention and contrapuntal skill. We spoke last Saturday, discussing Saint-Saens's symphonic poems, of the clearness and the logic of his musical thought. These qualities are as fully displayed in the symphony, which is more than a triumph of cunning workmanship. The serenity of the adagio, the fantastic presto, and the majesty of the section before the brilliant coda, with its jubilant blasts of brass, are imaginative pages, not merely the carefully written measures of an accomplished technician. The symphony had been heard at these concerts on at least four occasions. It was also played here by this orchestra when the composer was present, but as pianist and composer, not as conductor. Never was it so interesting, never so imposing, as it was yesterday under the direction of Mr. Rabaud.

When Mme. Samaroff played here with the orchestra from 1906 till late in 1909, her performance was distinguished chiefly by a peculiar brilliance. Her treatment of emotional passages left one cold. Yesterday one noticed a change of style. Her touch had a more poetic quality. She was lyrical, rather than defiantly theatrical, although there was sufficient force in the stormier pages. This concerto, which some think has had its day, gives delight solely by its purely lyrical quality; not by any suggestion of folk dance; not by the bravura measures and the crashing apotheosis, which are of decidedly secondary quality. Mme. Samaroff did well to discriminate in this manner; to sing rather than to declaim. In doing this, she unfortunately too often made the mistake of underemphasis. There were times when the piano part, being of the first importance, was heard only with strained ears, so that the first movement was on the whole pale, without vitality. Nor was this in any way the fault of Mr. Rabaud, whose accompaniment was sympathetic and delightful throughout.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony; Dukas: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Borodin, Symphony in B minor, No. 2.

RECORD, NOVEMBER 30

CLASSIC AND MODERN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

Weber, Mozart, Dukas And Borodin on This Week's Program

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Henri Rabaud, conductor, no soloist. Fifth concert of the season, Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon. The program:—

Weber—Euryanthe Overture.
Mozart—Jupiter Symphony.
Dukas—"The Sorcerer's Apprentice."
Borodin—Symphony in B Minor.

Mr. Rabaud, Frenchman, again paid his respects to the Germans—the classicists, not the moderns. For the first half of his program he chose the "Euryanthe" of the romantic Weber and the "Jupiter," which in previous performances has been one of the orchestra's perfect presentations. The "Euryanthe" he has played previously with the orchestra "on the road," the "road" in this case including Cambridge. For the second half of his program he selected two pieces dear to the conductor of the modern orchestra, Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which to many until Mr. Monteux's arrival was the beginning and the end of Dukas, and the Borodin Symphony, which, after four years' absence, again offered the orchestra an opportunity for sturdy, rugged playing.

The Teutonic phase of the concert did not end with the intermission. The Dukas work is based on a poem by Goethe. Thus the art of one country is dependent on the art of another. Who can say where this nation's contribution to an art work ends and where another nation's begins?

The playing of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" gave the greatest pleasure of the afternoon. In it the modern orchestra has countless opportunities for instrumental acrobatic. The wood winds and the trumpets have no end of tremendously difficult passages. Under Mr. Rabaud the orchestra gave a dashing, stunning performance of the work and the men in the wood wind choir, as well as the trumpet players, proved themselves virtuosi of the first rank. The tremendously effective, and undoubtedly difficult, passage for the bassoon, which introduces the chief theme of the work, was perfectly played. The whole performance of the work was effective through its sweep—and sweep this "broom music" certainly had!

The Borodin symphony may not be as interesting as much of the music that has come from modern Russian, but it has tremendous virility and barbaric beauty. Hearing it one was often reminded of the "Igor" music, parts of which have been heard in Boston on various occasions. It is superbly national. Russia, wild, gloomy, melancholy, broods over the music.

The classical portion of the program, the Weber and the Mozart numbers, did not arouse the enthusiasm that the latter portion evoked. The performance of both earlier works, however, was very beautiful.

Next week there will be no concerts. The program for Dec. 13 and 14 will be Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Converse, "The Mystic Trumpeter;" Guilmant, Symphony No. 1, for organ and orchestra. Joseph Bonnet, the French organist, will be the soloist.

AMERICAN, DECEMBER 1
ADVERTISER

RABAUD LIKE ST. SAENS ON EXPERIMENTS

Symphony Program Is Evidently Free From Ultra-Modernism

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

"Euryanthe Overture".....Weber
"Jupiter Symphony".....Mozart
"L'Apprenti Sorcier".....Dukas
Symphony in B-Minor, No. 2.....Borodin

Entirely orchestral and without any novelty (for Dr. Muck has given us excellent performances of the Borodin work), but well-contrasted and a program which was free from ultra-modernism. We begin to suspect that M. Rabaud is somewhat akin to Saint-Saens and regards some of the recent radical musical experiments with suspicion. The above program, given in Symphony Hall Friday and yesterday, was the only musical occasion of Thanksgiving week, except the Sunday concert which introduced Raoul Vidal to Boston.

We emphatically indorse M. Rabaud's reading of the Weber overture. Strong contrasts, crashing chords, and a touch of sensationalism suit well to this composer who was theatrical even in his sonatas. The French operatic conductor kept up this footlight flavor excellently, and the spicy performance was much appreciated. The horns did some excellent work, and Weber always has more horns than a dilemma — and more agreeable ones. The brilliancy of the entire work was remarkable, and it was the prelude to a very sparkling concert.

RABAUD A CLASSICIST.

But the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony showed M. Rabaud as a thorough classicist also. He did not take the virility out of Mozart but gave to the symphony something of modern vigor and power. But nothing can reconcile the modern concertgoer to the old Andantes and Minuets. They are as tame in their repetitions and suavities as an eighteenth century sentimental novel ("Clarissa Harlowe" for example) would be. It is the first and last movements only which sustain the interest.

Some day a conductor will have the courage to give us single movements from the symphonies of Mozart, Haydn or Schubert. The glory of the fuge of the Finale will never grow dim. It is the only bit of quadruple counterpoint that we know of that does not seem pedantic or strained. The four voices are constantly inverting among themselves yet make fluent music in all their various positions, and they could be put in many more inversions and still be correct, had the composer defied the fear of monotony and carried them out.

This Finale was especially clear and well-balanced, making the intricate counterpoint clear even to the untrained auditor, yet probably few understood the tremendous skill of this part of the composition. It was not applauded as vehemently as some more obvious effects in the subsequent parts of the program. But to the trained musician it showed M. Rabaud in the very best light. He is proving himself a very worthy successor to his great predecessors.

PREPARING FOR JULY.

Dukas' setting of Goethe's subject is not new to Boston, but it bears repetition very well. The sorcerer's apprentice manages to change a broomstick into a water-carrier, but forgets the incantation to change him back. He remains an industrious bassoon bringing water without stint. The frenzied apprentice saws the broomstick in two; it only makes matters worse, for now he has two bassoons bringing twice as much water. Finally the master-magician returns and shuts off the water. This French "Overture to the Water-Carrier" will fit excellently after next July. It received an unctuously humorous reading and the bassoons were deserving of high praise. Poor Dukas! all his other works fall flat after this humorous masterpiece. It never pays to be as funny as one can. All in all this was the best performance of the quaint piece that we have yet had in Boston. But it was a mistake to follow this bizarrerie with more eccentricity. Mozart's symphony should have been placed between the Dukas and Borodin numbers.

Thus far the program had been theatrical, with Weber, clasical and contrapuntal, with Mozart, humorous, with Dukas. It now became pompous, but in a wild, barbaric style, with Borodin. The B minor symphony is very innocent of counterpoint and of complexity, it would shrivel up before the learning of Brahms or even of Mendelssohn, it has many crudities, but it is brimful of original ideas, has an attractive splendor and gives many a new flavor. Borodin is a direct descendant from Caucasian monarchs and may claim a genealogy reaching back to King David, and the oriental rhythms of his ancestors are often present in this striking symphony. The Andante has a lofty rhapsodical character which is intended to picture the songs of the ancient bards at some Russian court. The first movement and also the Finale has the character of some barbaric festival, not in the wild, vodka-inspired vein which Tschaikowsky sometimes used, but sufficiently vigorous nevertheless. When Mozart utterly missed the mark in their oriental touches we feel doubly grateful to Borodin for giving some music. The old saying runs—"Scratch a Rusian and you find a Tartar"—and Borodin has scratched off the entire veneering.

THE SUNDAY CONCERT.

The Sunday concert, referred to in the beginning of this article, brought a new and important violinist to Boston. M. Raoul Vidas may not be quite as great a phenomenon as Heifetz is, but it was pleasant to notice that not all the great young violinists of the present are pupils of Leopold Auer. Here is a young artist of the French school who shows that there are to be successors of Vieuxtemps and Leonard in our own times. And Senorita Rosita Renard, who also appeared in this concert, is a great artist in embryo. She will yet be in the very front rank of pianists.

GLOBE NOVEMBER 30

RABAUD CONDUCTS DUKAS BRILLIANTLY

Treats Mozart With Fine Taste and Skill

Mr Rabaud showed at yesterday afternoon's concert with what authority, taste and skill he could discriminate among three compositions for orchestra as radically diverse in character and school as a symphony of Mozart, a modern French tone-poem, a symphony from one of the Russian nationalists, in part racial if not highly distinctive or representative, and as a prelude to all, an overture of Weber's, that to "Euryanthe," of flamboyant romanticism and a passage for the upper strings of real musical beauty.

The "Jupiter" symphony yesterday was an instructive study in color, style and regard for period. It would not have been easy to believe that it was the same body of strings playing the finely spun Mozart that immediately after contributed to the scintillating performance of Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The fineness of Mozart's structure, its classic purity of line, its faultless proportion, its cool order and repose even in the ardent fugal dialogue of the remarkable last movement and the transparent clearness of every bar—all were to be found in a reading no less admirable for the quiet authority with which it was set forth than for the perception and sensibility which were its source.

But the feature of the afternoon was Mr Rabaud's brilliant performance of Dukas' scherzo. At last this score of exquisite conceit and fantasy has been heard favored with a resilient Gallic wit and imagination. There was piquant, pungent incisiveness, drollery elbowing flashing humor, in all, the satire of champagne or of the poignard, never of the bludgeon. The composer of the fanciful "Marouf" illumined Dukas' score as neither of his two immediate predecessors. The orchestra played superbly for him and the performance was applauded with unwonted vigor.

Borodin's second symphony is more Russian in the chanting theme of the first movement and some of its ponderous variants than, for example, in the second. Composed of material originally intended for other works, the score lacks coherence and sustained interest, as it does evidences of marked invention. There is not the color of Rimsky-Korsakow nor the sheer dramatic force of Moussorgsky. Mr Rabaud did not sandpaper the Slavic virility in the first movement and made the most of the last.

TRAVELER, NOVEMBER 30,

RABAUD PLEASES WITH BORODIN

In an exceptionally interesting program two items stood out in Mr. Rabaud's interpretation of the numbers at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The first was the wonderfully beautiful andante in the Borodin symphony, the other, Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Both aroused the greatest display of enthusiasm shown under Mr. Rabaud's conductorship and both fully merited it.

The program was well chosen and finely given. Mr. Rabaud read the Weber overture, as though Weber might have been his favorite composer. Yet when he came to the "Jupiter" symphony, one could well have thought Mozart was his choice. But above both were Dukas and Borodin. The conductor was forced several times to acknowledge the enthusiastic applause.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be on tour, its first under Mr. Rabaud's baton.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.

NOV 9 1913

Eagle

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Reorganized Orchestra Is Greeted at Academy by Undemonstrative Audience.

With a conductor, Pierre Monteux, borrowed for the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the year in the Academy of Music last evening. The audience which greeted the reorganized band was to all appearances the same which year after year has sat at the feet of the long line of conductors who in the past were responsible for the orchestra's premier place in the world of music. Last evening they heard a new orchestra, a new conductor—this time for the first a Frenchman—and realized that a new spirit had entered into personnel and spirit of the playing. Like all Brooklyn audiences that last evening was cautious in its applause, correct almost to coldness in its greeting of new faces, appreciative but undemonstrative, and in sharp contrast to that which greeted the orchestra the evening previous in Carnegie Hall. Last evening only one national air was played, "The Star-Spangled Banner." A few enthusiasts might have insisted upon more, but they were quickly hushed by the coldness of their fellows.

Florence Easton, soloist of the evening, sang the recitative "E Susanna non vien?" and the aria "Dove Sang," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and Lia's recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." The latter she delivered with much dramatic warmth, purity of tone and excellence of diction; but in the Mozart she was not so happy, for, while she entered fully into the spirit of the composition and revealed an intelligent grasp of the essentials of Mozart's style, she found only inadequate vocal expression for its classic and aristocratic line. For her Mr. Monteux furnished adequate accompaniments.

The purely orchestral numbers included the Franck Symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Debussy's "Iberia" (the second of his three "Images" for orchestra)—all three of which compositions had been played in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening—and D'Indy's symphonic variations "Istar." It was not altogether a representative program, but one which offered sufficient variety of composition to form an accurate estimate of the capability of the new band and of the conductor. Certainly, so far as the conductor was concerned, it seemed a program devised for his especial benefit, for its works were, with one exception, of the French school, and therefore particularly ingratiating for a French musician.

While the changes in the orchestra's personnel have been many, amounting in all to 25 per cent., enough of the older members were left after the purging of the Teutonic element to maintain the prestige of the band. What changes have taken place have affected the string sections primarily. There is a new American concertmaster, Frederic Fradkin; a new viola player at the first desk, Barrier, in lieu of Ferir, departed to Philadelphia; all in all, thirty-six old members and twenty-two new ones in the strings. In the woodwinds there is a new first flutist, one new clarinettist, one new bassoon and a new bass clarinet. There are changes in the horns and trombones, but the trumpets remain the same.

All these innovating moves have resulted in new qualities. The string section shows improvement, manifesting now a richer, more lustrous tone than ever before, particularly in the case of the second violins, who at times formerly approached to dryness of utterance. The woods and brasses are weaker in spots, more reliable in others. Today's band is one of euphony of utterance, pliant and pliable; still the premier orchestra of this country, and one to delight the mind of any conductor entrusted with the joy of leading it through the intricacies of an orchestral score. It is an orchestra capable of the fullest and most fitting expression, quick to respond to intelligent and penetrative direction. Its verve, its pliancy, its range of color, its brilliancy of execution, its power to stimulate ear and imagination are as potent as ever. With proper leadership there is musically nothing it canot accomplish.

For what Mr. Monteux has accomplished in the reorganization and rehabilitation of the band, much thanks are due him, and to him must go all the credit for the preliminary rehearsing. Mr. Rabaud, permanent conductor, finds a well-organized instrument to do his bidding.

As a conductor Mr. Monteux revealed nothing new to us last evening. He has been heard here many times, both as symphonic conductor of the civic concerts two years ago and as operatic with the Metropolitan last year. Before, he had been heard frequently with the Ballet Russe. But in all that time he never disclosed any qualities of greatness, and last evening and that before in New York he revealed nothing to change our estimate formed in seasons past. There was the same lack of decisiveness of beat, resulting in much roughness in an orchestra hitherto deemed incapable thereof; unformulated plan of outline; indefinite feeling for style.

The Franck Symphony received an amiable reading, but one that lost much of value because of its indefiniteness. This is music that because of its architechtonic structure submits to the finest and clearest of chiseling on the part of conductor. It can be made a Greek temple of sound; last evening its most delicate friezes were indistinct. Mr. Monteux hurried both first and last movements to distortion of the outline; only the allegretto was eloquent of Franck's complete genius.

On the other hand, the Debussy, which calls for atmosphere, almost impalpable at times, was clear cut to a fault. There is need for rhythmic precision in its glimpses of Spain, but not to the point of exaggeration disclosed by Mr. Monteux. The Schumann was better, and the D'Indy found the conductor at his best. Yet throughout the program was pervaded with an unevenness to which, in the case of this orchestra, we are unaccustomed. While under Mr. Monteux last evening it was still the best orchestra, it was so in spite of his lapses.

GLOBE NOVEMBER 30

RABAUD CONDUCTS DUKAS BRILLIANTLY

Treats Mozart With Fine Taste and Skill

Mr Rabaud showed at yesterday afternoon's concert with what authority, taste and skill he could discriminate among three compositions for orchestra as radically diverse in character and school as a symphony of Mozart, a modern French tone-poem, a symphony from one of the Russian nationalists, in part racial if not highly distinctive or representative, and as a prelude to all, an overture of Weber's, that to "Euryanthe," of flamboyant romanticism and a passage for the upper strings of real musical beauty.

The "Jupiter" symphony yesterday was an instructive study in color, style and regard for period. It would not have been easy to believe that it was the same body of strings playing the finely spun Mozart that immediately after contributed to the scintillating performance of Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The fineness of Mozart's structure, its classic purity of line, its faultless proportion, its cool order and repose even in the ardent fugal dialogue of the remarkable last movement and the transparent clearness of every bar—all were to be found in a reading no less admirable for the quiet authority with which it was set forth than for the perception and sensibility which were its source.

But the feature of the afternoon was Mr Rabaud's brilliant performance of Dukas' scherzo. At last this score of exquisite conceit and fantasy has been heard favored with a resilient Gallic wit and imagination. There was piquant, pungent incisiveness, drollery elbowing flashing humor, in all, the satire of champagne or of the poignard, never of the bludgeon. The composer of the fanciful "Marouf" illumined Dukas' score as neither of his two immediate predecessors. The orchestra played superbly for him and the performance was applauded with unwonted vigor.

Borodin's second symphony is more Russian in the chanting theme of the first movement and some of its ponderous variants than, for example, in the second. Composed of material originally intended for other works, the score lacks coherence and sustained interest, as it does evidences of marked invention. There is not the color of Rimsky-Korsakow nor the sheer dramatic force of Moussorgsky. Mr Rabaud did not sandpaper the Slavic virility in the first movement and made the most of the last.

HERALD NOVEMBER 23

FOURTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Mr. Rabaud Gives Delightful Reading of Schubert's "Unfinished" Work

REPEAT THE SAME PROGRAM TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony; Grieg, piano concerto (Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist); Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor, No. 3.

When Joachim, one of the most impotent and stupid conductors we ever knew, was about to give a performance of the "Unfinished" symphony, he asked many musicians of Berlin what they thought the pace of the second theme first announced by the violoncellos, in the first movement, should be. Some conductors sentimentalize this theme dragging the pace until the song becomes lackadaisical. Mr. Rabaud is a musician of fine taste and judgment; he did not fall into this error. The symphony is eminently Schubertian in its beauty and in its weakness. For the most part the composer pipes his songs of innocence as the boy heard by William Blake; but in the first movement there are measures of a grandeur that is seldom found in Schubert's compositions. In these measures we recognize the Schubert that conceived the "Doppelgaenger," the "Gruppe aus Tartarus," the "Dwarf" and a few other songs in which dramatic force comes before charming lyricism.

Mr. Rabaud gave a most impressive interpretation of these measures. The whole movement by the force of the contrast gained thereby. As for the second movement, which shows Schubert's tendency toward prolixity, and is so inferior to the first that one rejoices because the symphony was left unfinished, all that is to be done with it is to let the composer pipe his pretty tunes. Some day a conductor may have the courage to play the first movement alone, a noble fragment, comparable with that torso in literature, the "Hyperion," of Keats.

Schubert wrote "Current a Calamo." It was otherwise with the Saint-Saens of the C minor symphony. We doubt whether his head were hot and his feet cold when he was engaged in the composition; but that head was full of invention and contrapuntal skill. We spoke last Saturday, discussing Saint-Saens's symphonic poems, of the clearness and the logic of his musical thought. These qualities are as fully displayed in the symphony, which is more than a triumph of cunning workmanship. The serenity of the adagio, the fantastic presto, and the majesty of the section before the brilliant coda, with its jubilant blasts of brass, are imaginative pages, not merely the carefully written measures of an accomplished technician. The symphony had been heard at these concerts on at least four occasions. It was also played here by this orchestra when the composer was present, but as pianist and composer, not as conductor. Never was it so interesting, never so imposing, as it was yesterday under the direction of Mr. Rabaud.

When Mme. Samaroff played here with the orchestra from 1906 till late in 1909, her performance was distinguished chiefly by a peculiar brilliance. Her treatment of emotional passages left one cold. Yesterday one noticed a change of style. Her touch had a more poetic quality. She was lyrical, rather than deflantly theatrical, although there was sufficient force in the stormier pages. This concerto, which some think has had its day, gives delight solely by its purely lyrical quality; not by any suggestion of folk dance; not by the bravura measures and the crashing apotheosis, which are of decidedly secondary quality. Mme. Samaroff did well to discriminate in this manner; to sing rather than to declaim. In doing this, she unfortunately too often made the mistake of underemphasis. There were times when the piano part, being of the first importance, was heard only with strained ears, so that the first movement was on the whole pale, without vitality. Nor was this in any way the fault of Mr. Rabaud, whose accompaniment was sympathetic and delightful throughout.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony; Dukas: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Borodin, Symphony in B minor, No. 2.

RECORD NOVEMBER 30

CLASSIC AND MODERN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

Weber, Mozart, Dukas And Borodin on This Week's Program

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Henri Rabaud, conductor, no soloist. Fifth concert of the season, Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon. The program:—

Weber—Euryanthe Overture.
Mozart—Jupiter Symphony.
Dukas—"The Sorcerer's Apprentice."
Borodin—Symphony in B Minor.

Mr. Rabaud, Frenchman, again paid his respects to the Germans—the classicists, not the moderns. For the first half of his program he chose the "Euryanthe" of the romantic Weber and the "Jupiter," which in previous performances has been one of the orchestra's perfect presentations. The "Euryanthe" he has played previously with the orchestra "on the road," the "road" in this case including Cambridge. For the second half of his program he selected two pieces dear to the conductor of the modern orchestra, Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which to many until Mr. Monteux's arrival was the beginning and the end of Dukas, and the Borodin Symphony, which, after four years' absence, again offered the orchestra an opportunity for sturdy, rugged playing.

The Teutonic phase of the concert did not end with the intermission. The Dukas work is based on a poem by Goethe. Thus the art of one country is dependent on the art of another. Who can say where this nation's contribution to an art work ends and where another nation's begins?

The playing of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" gave the greatest pleasure of the afternoon. In it the modern orchestra has countless opportunities for instrumental acrobatic. The wood winds and the trumpets have no end of tremendously difficult passages. Under Mr. Rabaud the orchestra gave a dashing, stunning performance of the work and the men in the wood wind choir, as well as the trumpet players, proved themselves virtuosi of the first rank. The tremendously effective and undoubtedly difficult passage for the bassoon, which introduces the chief theme of the work, was perfectly played. The whole performance of the work was effective through its sweep—and sweep this "broom music" certainly had!

The Borodin symphony may not be as interesting as much of the music that has come from modern Russian, but it has tremendous virility and barbaric beauty. Hearing it one was often reminded of the "Igor" music, parts of which have been heard in Boston on various occasions. It is superbly national Russia, wild, gloomy, melancholy, broods over the music.

The classical portion of the program, the Weber and the Mozart numbers, did not arouse the enthusiasm that the latter portion evoked. The performance of both earlier works, however, was very beautiful.

Next week there will be no concerts. The program for Dec. 12 and 13 will be Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Converse, "The Mystic Trumpeter;" Guilmant, Symphony No. 1, for organ and orchestra. Joseph Bonnet, the French organist, will be the soloist.

TRAVELER, NOVEMBER 30,

RABAUD PLEASES WITH BORODIN

In an exceptionally interesting program two items stood out in Mr. Rabaud's interpretation of the numbers at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The first was the wonderfully beautiful andante in the Borodin symphony, the other, Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Both aroused the greatest display of enthusiasm shown under Mr. Rabaud's conductorship and both fully merited it.

The program was well chosen and finely given. Mr. Rabaud read the Weber overture, as though Weber might have been his favorite composer. Yet when he came to the "Jupiter" symphony, one could well have thought Mozart was his choice. But above both were Dukas and Borodin. The conductor was forced several times to acknowledge the enthusiastic applause.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be on tour, its first under Mr. Rabaud's baton.

AMERICAN, DECEMBER 1

ADVERTISER

RABAUD LIKE ST. SAENS ON EXPERIMENTS

Symphony Program Is Evidently Free From Ultra-Modernism

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

"Euryanthe Overture".....Weber
"Jupiter Symphony".....Mozart
"L'Apprenti Sorcier".....Dukas
Symphony in B-Minor, No. 2.....Borodin

Entirely orchestral and without any novelty (for Dr. Muck has given us excellent performances of the Borodin work), but well-contrasted and a program which was free from ultra-modernism. We begin to suspect that M. Rabaud is somewhat akin to Saint-Saens and regards some of the recent radical musical experiments with suspicion. The above program, given in Symphony Hall Friday and yesterday, was the only musical occasion of Thanksgiving week, except the Sunday concert which introduced Raoul Vidal to Boston.

We emphatically indorse M. Rabaud's reading of the Weber overture. Strong contrasts, crashing chords, and a touch of sensationalism suit well to this composer who was theatrical even in his sonatas. The French operatic conductor kept up this footlight flavor excellently, and the spicy performance was much appreciated. The horns did some excellent work, and Weber always has more horns than a dilemma — and more agreeable ones. The brilliancy of the entire work was remarkable, and it was the prelude to a very sparkling concert.

RABAUD A CLASSICIST.

But the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony showed M. Rabaud as a thorough classicist also. He did not take the virility out of Mozart but gave to the symphony something of modern vigor and power. But nothing can reconcile the modern concertgoer to the old Andantes and Minuets. They are as tame in their repetitions and suavities as an eighteenth century sentimental novel ("Clarissa Harlowe" for example) would be. It is the first and last movements only which sustain the interest.

Some day a conductor will have the courage to give us single movements from the symphonies of Mozart, Haydn or Schubert. The glory of the fuge of the Finale will never grow dim It is the only bit of quadruple counterpoint that we know of that does not seem pedantic or strained. The four voices are constantly inverting among themselves yet make fluent music in all their various positions, and they could be put in many more inversions and still be correct, had the composer defied the fear of monotony and carried them out.

This Finale was especially clear and well-balanced, making the intricate counterpoint clear even to the untrained auditor, yet probably few understood the tremendous skill of this part of the composition. It was not applauded as vehemently as some more obvious effects in the subsequent parts of the program. But to the trained musician it showed M. Rabaud in the very best light. He is proving himself a very worthy successor to his great predecessors.

PREPARING FOR JULY.

Dukas' setting of Goethe's subject is not new to Boston, but it bears repetition very well. The sorcerer's apprentice manages to change a broomstick into a water-carrier, but forgets the incantation to change him back. He remains an industrious bassoon bringing water without stint. The frenzied apprentice saws the broomstick in two; it only makes matters worse, for now he has two bassoons bringing twice as much water. Finally the master-magician returns and shuts off the water. This French "Overture to the Water-Carrier" will fit excellently after next July. It received an unctuously humorous reading and the bassoons were deserving of high praise. Poor Dukas! all his other works fall flat after this humorous masterpiece. It never pays to be as funny as one can. All in all this was the best performance of the quaint piece that we have yet had in Boston. But it was a mistake to follow this bizarrerie with more eccentricity. Mozart's symphony should have been placed between the Dukas and Borodin numbers.

Thus far the program had been theatrical, with Weber, clasical and contrapuntal, with Mozart, humorous, with Dukas. It now became pompous, but in a wild, barbaric style, with Borodin. The B minor symphony is very innocent of counterpoint and of complexity, it would shrivel up before the learning of Brahms or even of Mendelssohn, it has many crudities, but it is brimful of original ideas, has an attractive splendor and gives many a new flavor. Borodin is a direct descendant from Caucasian monarchs and may claim a genealogy reaching back to King David, and the oriental rhythms of his ancestors are often present in this striking symphony. The Andante has a lofty rhapsodical character which is intended to picture the songs of the ancient bards at some Russian court. The first movement and also the Finale has the character of some barbaric festival, not in the wild, vodka-inspired vein which Tschaikowsky sometimes used, but sufficiently vigorous nevertheless. When Mozart utterly missed the mark in their oriental touches we feel doubly grateful to Borodin for giving some music The old saying runs—"Scratch a Rusian and you find a Tartar"—and Borodin has scratched off the entire veneering.

THE SUNDAY CONCERT.

The Sunday concert, referred to in the beginning of this article, brought a new and important violinist to Boston. M. Raoul Vidas may not be quite as great a phenomenon as Heifetz is, but it was pleasant to notice that not all the great young violinists of the present are pupils of Leopold Auer. Here is a young artist of the French school who shows that there are to be successors of Vieuxtemps and Leonard in our own times. And Senorita Rosita Renard, who also appeared in this concert, is a great artist in embryo. She will yet be in the very front rank of pianists.

BROOKLYN EAGLE

NOV 30 1919

55

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Reorganized Orchestra Is Greeted at Academy by Undemonstrative Audience.

With a conductor, Pierre Monteux, borrowed for the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the year in the Academy of Music last evening. The audience which greeted the reorganized band was to all appearances the same which year after year has sat at the feet of the long line of conductors who in the past were responsible for the orchestra's premier place in the world of music. Last evening they heard a new orchestra, a new conductor—this time for the first a Frenchman—and realized that a new spirit had entered into personnel and spirit of the playing. Like all Brooklyn audiences that last evening was cautious in its applause, correct almost to coldness in its greeting of new faces, appreciative but undemonstrative, and in sharp contrast to that which greeted the orchestra the evening previous in Carnegie Hall. Last evening only one national air was played, "The Star-Spangled Banner." A few enthusiasts might have insisted upon more, but they were quickly hushed by the coldness of their fellows.

Florence Easton, soloist of the evening, sang the recitative "E Susanna non vien?" and the aria "Dove Sang," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and Lia's recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." The latter she delivered with much dramatic warmth, purity of tone and excellence of diction; but in the Mozart she was not so happy, for, while she entered fully into the spirit of the composition and revealed an intelligent grasp of the essentials of Mozart's style, she found only inadequate vocal expression for its classic and aristocratic line. For her Mr. Monteux furnished adequate accompaniments.

The purely orchestral numbers included the Franck Symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Debussy's "Iberia" (the second of his three "Images" for orchestra)—all three of which compositions had been played in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening—and D'Indy's symphonic variations "Istar." It was not altogether a representative program, but one which offered sufficient variety of composition to form an accurate estimate of the capability of the new band and of the conductor. Certainly, so far as the conductor was concerned, it seemed a program devised for his especial benefit, for its works were, with one exception, of the French school, and therefore particularly ingratiating for a French musician.

While the changes in the orchestra's personnel have been many, amounting in all to 25 per cent., enough of the older members were left after the purging of the Teutonic element to maintain the prestige of the band. What changes have taken place have affected the string sections primarily. There is a new American concertmaster, Frederic Fradkin; a new viola player at the first desk, Barrier, in lieu of Ferir, departed to Philadelphia; all in all, thirty-six old members and twenty-two new ones in the strings. In the woodwinds there is a new first flutist, one new clarinettist, one new bassoon and a new bass clarinet. There are changes in the horns and trombones, but the trumpets remain the same.

All these innovating moves have resulted in new qualities. The string section shows improvement, manifesting now a richer, more lustrous tone than ever before, particularly in the case of the second violins, who at times formerly approached to dryness of utterance. The woods and brasses are weaker in spots, more reliable in others. Today's band is one of euphony of utterance, pliant and pliable; still the premier orchestra of this country, and one to delight the mind of any conductor entrusted with the joy of leading it through the intricacies of an orchestral score. It is an orchestra capable of the fullest and most fitting expression, quick to respond to intelligent and penetrative direction. Its verve, its pliancy, its range of color, its brilliancy of execution, its power to stimulate ear and imagination are as potent as ever. With proper leadership there is musically nothing it canot accomplish.

For what Mr. Monteux has accomplished in the reorganization and rehabilitation of the band, much thanks are due him, and to him must go all the credit for the preliminary rehearsing. Mr. Rabaud, permanent conductor, finds a well-organized instrument to do his bidding.

As a conductor Mr. Monteux revealed nothing new to us last evening. He has been heard here many times, both as symphonic conductor of the civic concerts two years ago and as operatic with the Metropolitan last year. Before, he had been heard frequently with the Ballet Russe. But in all that time he never disclosed any qualities of greatness, and last evening and that before in New York he revealed nothing to change our estimate formed in seasons past. There was the same lack of decisiveness of beat, resulting in much roughness in an orchestra hitherto deemed incapable thereof; unformulated plan of outline; indefinite feeling for style.

The Franck Symphony received an amiable reading, but one that lost much of value because of its indefiniteness. This is music that because of its architechtonic structure submits to the finest and clearest of chiseling on the part of conductor. It can be made a Greek temple of sound; last evening its most delicate friezes were indistinct. Mr. Monteux hurried both first and last movements to distortion of the outline; only the allegretto was eloquent of Franck's complete genius.

On the other hand, the Debussy, which calls for atmosphere, almost impalpable at times, was clear cut to a fault. There is need for rhythmic precision in its glimpses of Spain, but not to the point of exaggeration disclosed by Mr. Monteux. The Schumann was better, and the D'Indy found the conductor at his best. Yet throughout the program was pervaded with an unevenness to which, in the case of this orchestra, we are unaccustomed. While under Mr. Monteux last evening it was still the best orchestra, it was so in spite of his lapses.

GLOBE NOVEMBER

RABAUD CONDUCTS DUKAS BRILLIANTLY

Treats Mozart With Fine Taste and Skill

Mr Rabaud showed at yesterday afternoon's concert with what authority, taste and skill he could discriminate among three compositions for orchestra as radically diverse in character and school as a symphony of Mozart, a modern French tone-poem, a symphony from one of the Russian nationalists, in part racial if not highly distinctive or representative, and as a prelude to all, an overture of Weber's, that to "Euryanthe," of flamboyant romanticism and a passage for the upper strings of real musical beauty.

The "Jupiter" symphony yesterday was an instructive study in color, style and regard for period. It would not have been easy to believe that it was the same body of strings playing the finely spun Mozart that immediately after contributed to the scintillating performance of Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The fineness of Mozart's structure, its classic purity of line, its faultless proportion, its cool order and repose even in the ardent fugal dialogue of the remarkable last movement and the transparent clearness of every bar—all were to be found in a reading no less admirable for the quiet authority with which it was set forth than for the perception and sensibility which were its source.

But the feature of the afternoon was Mr Rabaud's brilliant performance of Dukas' scherzo. At last this score of exquisite conceit and fantasy has been heard favored with a resilient Gallic wit and imagination. There was piquant, pungent incisiveness, drollery elbowing flashing humor, in all, the satire of champagne or of the poignard, never of the bludgeon. The composer of the fanciful "Marouf" illumined Dukas' score as neither of his two immediate predecessors. The orchestra played superbly for him and the performance was applauded with unwonted vigor.

Borodin's second symphony is more Russian in the chanting theme of the first movement and some of its ponderous variants than, for example, in the second. Composed of material originally intended for other works, the score lacks coherence and sustained interest, as it does evidences of marked invention. There is not the color of Rimsky-Korsakow nor the sheer dramatic force of Moussorgsky. Mr Rabaud did not sandpaper the Slavic virility in the first movement and made the most of the last.

HERALD NOVEMBER 23

FOURTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Mr. Rabaud Gives Delightful Reading of Schubert's "Unfinished" Work

REPEAT THE SAME PROGRAM TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony Grieg, piano concerto (Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist); Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor, No. 3.

When Joachim, one of the most impotent and stupid conductors we ever knew, was about to give a performance of the "Unfinished" symphony, he asked many musicians of Berlin what they thought the pace of the second theme first announced by the violoncellos, in the first movement, should be. Some conductors sentimentalize this theme dragging the pace until the song becomes lackadaisical. Mr. Rabaud is a musician of fine taste and judgment; he did not fall into this error. The symphony is eminently Schubertian in its beauty and in its weakness. For the most part the composer pipes his songs of innocence as the boy heard by William Blake; but in the first movement there are measures of a grandeur that is seldom found in Schubert's compositions. In these measures we recognize the Schubert that conceived the "Doppelgaenger," the "Gruppe aus Tartarus," the "Dwarf" and a few other songs in which dramatic force comes before charming lyricism.

Mr. Rabaud gave a most impressive interpretation of these measures. The whole movement by the force of the contrast gained thereby. As for the second movement, which shows Schubert's tendency toward prolixity, and is so inferior to the first that one rejoices because the symphony was left unfiinished, all that is to be done with it is to let the composer pipe his pretty tunes. Some day a conductor may have the courage to play the first movement alone, a noble fragment, comparable with that torso in literature, the "Hyperion," of Keats.

Schubert wrote "Current a Calamo." It was otherwise with the Saint-Saens of the C minor symphony. We doubt whether his head were hot and his feet cold when he was engaged in the composition; but that head was full of invention and contrapuntal skill. We spoke last Saturday, discussing Saint-Saens's symphonic poems, of the clearness and the logic of his musical thought. These qualities are as fully displayed in the symphony, which is more than a triumph of cunning workmanship. The serenity of the adagio, the fantastic presto, and the majesty of the section before the brilliant coda, with its jubilant blasts of brass, are imaginative pages, not merely the carefully written measures of an accomplished technician. The symphony had been heard at these concerts on at least four occasions. It was also played here by this orchestra when the composer was present, but as pianist and composer, not as conductor. Never was it so interesting, never so imposing, as it was yesterday under the direction of Mr. Rabaud.

When Mme. Samaroff played here with the orchestra from 1906 till late in 1909, her performance was distinguished chiefly by a peculiar brilliance. Her treatment of emotional passages left one cold. Yesterday one noticed a change of style. Her touch had a more poetic quality. She was lyrical, rather than deflantly theatrical, although there was sufficient force in the stormier pages. This concerto, which some think has had its day, gives delight solely by its purely lyrical quality; not by any suggestion of folk dance; not by the bravura measures and the crashing apotheosis, which are of decidedly secondary quality. Mme. Samaroff did well to discriminate in this manner; to sing rather than to declaim. In doing this, she unfortunately too often made the mistake of underemphasis. There were times when the piano part, being of the first importance, was heard only with strained ears, so that the first movement was on the whole pale, without vitality. Nor was this in any way the fault of Mr. Rabaud, whose accompaniment was sympathetic and delightful throughout.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony; Dukas: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Borodin, Symphony in B minor, No. 2.

RECORD NOVEMBER 30

CLASSIC AND MODERN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

Weber, Mozart, Dukas And Borodin on This Week's Program

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Henri Rabaud, conductor, no soloist. Fifth concert of the season, Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon. The program:—

Weber—Euryanthe Overture.
Mozart—Jupiter Symphony.
Dukas—"The Sorcerer's Apprentice."
Borodin—Symphony in B Minor.

Mr. Rabaud, Frenchman, again paid his respects to the Germans—the classicists, not the moderns. For the first half of his program he chose the "Euryanthe" of the romantic Weber and the "Jupiter," which in previous performances has been one of the orchestra's perfect presentations. The "Euryanthe" he has played previously with the orchestra "on the road," the "road" in this case including Cambridge. For the second half of his program he selected two pieces dear to the conductor of the modern orchestra, Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which to many until Mr. Monteux's arrival was the beginning and the end of Dukas, and the Borodin Symphony, which, after four years' absence, again offered the orchestra an opportunity for sturdy, rugged playing.

The Teutonic phase of the concert did not end with the intermission. The Dukas work is based on a poem by Goethe. Thus the art of one country is dependent on the art of another. Who can say where this nation's contribution to an art work ends and where another nation's begins?

The playing of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" gave the greatest pleasure of the afternoon. In it the modern orchestra has countless opportunities for instrumental acrobatic. The wood winds and the trumpets have no end of tremendously difficult passages. Under Mr. Rabaud the orchestra gave a dashing, stunning performance of the work and the men in the wood wind choir, as well as the trumpet players, proved themselves virtuosi of the first rank. The tremendously effective, and undoubtedly difficult, passage for the bassoon, which introduces the chief theme of the work, was perfectly played. The whole performance of the work was effective through its sweep—and sweep this "broom music" certainly had!

The Borodin symphony may not be as interesting as much of the music that has come from modern Russian, but it has tremendous virility and barbaric beauty. Hearing it one was often reminded of the "Igor" music, parts of which have been heard in Boston on various occasions. It is superbly national. Russia, wild, gloomy, melancholy, broods over the music.

The classical portion of the program, the Weber and the Mozart numbers, did not arouse the enthusiasm that the latter portion evoked. The performance of both earlier works, however, was very beautiful.

Next week there will be no concerts. The program for Dec. 13 and 14 will be Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Converse, "The Mystic Trumpeter;" Guilmant, Symphony No. 1, for organ and orchestra. Joseph Bonnet, the French organist, will be the soloist.

TRAVELER, NOVEMBER 30,

RABAUD PLEASES WITH BORODIN

In an exceptionally interesting program two items stood out in Mr. Rabaud's interpretation of the numbers at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The first was the wonderfully beautiful andante in the Borodin symphony, the other, Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Both aroused the greatest display of enthusiasm shown under Mr. Rabaud's conductorship and both fully merited it.

The program was well chosen and finely given. Mr. Rabaud read the Weber overture, as though Weber might have been his favorite composer. Yet when he came to the "Jupiter" symphony, one could well have thought Mozart was his choice. But above both were Dukas and Borodin. The conductor was forced several times to acknowledge the enthusiastic applause.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be on tour, its first under Mr. Rabaud's baton.

AMERICAN, DECEMBER 4

ADVERTISER

RABAUD LIKE ST. SAENS ON EXPERIMENTS

Symphony Program Is Evidently Free From Ultra-Modernism

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

"Euryanthe Overture".....Weber
"Jupiter Symphony".....Mozart
"L'Apprenti Sorcier".....Dukas
Symphony in B-Minor, No. 2.....Borodin

Entirely orchestral and without any novelty (for Dr. Muck has given us excellent performances of the Borodin work), but well-contrasted and a program which was free from ultra-modernism. We begin to suspect that M. Rabaud is somewhat akin to Saint-Saens and regards some of the recent radical musical experiments with suspicion. The above program, given in Symphony Hall Friday and yesterday, was the only musical occasion of Thanksgiving week, except the Sunday concert which introduced Raoul Vidal to Boston.

We emphatically indorse M. Rabaud's reading of the Weber overture. Strong contrasts, crashing chords, and a touch of sensationalism suit well to this composer who was theatrical even in his sonatas. The French operatic conductor kept up this footlight flavor excellently, and the spicy performance was much appreciated. The horns did some excellent work, and Weber always has more horns than a dilemma — and more agreeable ones. The brilliancy of the entire work was remarkable, and it was the prelude to a very sparkling concert.

RABAUD A CLASSICIST.

But the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony showed M. Rabaud as a thorough classicist also. He did not take the virility out of Mozart but gave to the symphony something of modern vigor and power. But nothing can reconcile the modern concertgoer to the old Andantes and Minuets. They are as tame in their repetitions and suavities as an eighteenth century sentimental novel ("Clarissa Harlowe" for example) would be. It is the first and last movements only which sustain the interest.

Some day a conductor will have the courage to give us single movements from the symphonies of Mozart, Haydn or Schubert. The glory of the fuge of the Finale will never grow dim It is the only bit of quadruple counterpoint that we know of that does not seem pedantic or strained. The four voices are constantly inverting among themselves yet make fluent music in all their various positions, and they could be put in many more inversions and still be correct, had the composer defied the fear of monotony and carried them out.

This Finale was especially clear and well-balanced, making the intricate counterpoint clear even to the untrained auditor, yet probably few understood the tremendous skill of this part of the composition. It was not applauded as vehemently as some more obvious effects in the subsequent parts of the program. But to the trained musician it showed M. Rabaud in the very best light. He is proving himself a very worthy successor to his great predecessors.

PREPARING FOR JULY.

Dukas' setting of Goethe's subject is not new to Boston, but it bears repetition very well. The sorcerer's apprentice manages to change a broomstick into a water-carrier, but forgets the incantation to change him back. He remains an industrious bassoon bringing water without stint. The frenzied apprentice saws the broomstick in two; it only makes matters worse, for now he has two bassoons bringing twice as much water. Finally the master-magician returns and shuts off the water. This French "Overture to the Water-Carrier" will fit excellently after next July. It received an unctuously humorous reading and the bassoons were deserving of high praise. Poor Dukas! all his other works fall flat after this humorous masterpiece. It never pays to be as funny as one can. All in all this was the best performance of the quaint piece that we have yet had in Boston. But it was a mistake to follow this bizarrerie with more eccentricity. Mozart's symphony should have been placed between the Dukas and Borodin numbers.

Thus far the program had been theatrical, with Weber, clasical and contrapuntal, with Mozart, humorous, with Dukas. It now became pompous, but in a wild, barbaric style, with Borodin. The B minor symphony is very innocent of counterpoint and of complexity, it would shrivel up before the learning of Brahms or even of Mendelssohn, it has many crudities, but it is brimful of original ideas, has an attractive splendor and gives many a new flavor. Borodin is a direct descendant from Caucasian monarchs and may claim a genealogy reaching back to King David, and the oriental rhythms of his ancestors are often present in this striking symphony. The Andante has a lofty rhapsodical character which is intended to picture the songs of the ancient bards at some Russian court. The first movement and also the Finale has the character of some barbaric festival, not in the wild, vodka-inspired vein which Tschaikowsky sometimes used, but sufficiently vigorous nevertheless. When Mozart utterly missed the mark in their oriental touches we feel doubly grateful to Borodin for giving some music The old saying runs—"Scratch a Rusian and you find a Tartar"—and Borodin has scratched off the entire veneering.

THE SUNDAY CONCERT.

The Sunday concert, referred to in the beginning of this article, brought a new and important violinist to Boston. M. Raoul Vidas may not be quite as great a phenomenon as Heifetz is, but it was pleasant to notice that not all the great young violinists of the present are pupils of Leopold Auer. Here is a young artist of the French school who shows that there are to be successors of Vieuxtemps and Leonard in our own times. And Senorita Rosita Renard, who also appeared in this concert, is a great artist in embryo. She will yet be in the very front rank of pianists.

TRIBUNE NOVEMBER 20.

WARM WELCOME FOR ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Under New Leadership Rendered Program in Brilliant Style.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Henri Rabaud, conductor, opened its 38th season, and gave its 155th concert in Providence in Infantry Hall last evening. A large audience was present, though there were vacant seats which should have been occupied, for the concert was one of great beauty and rare musical interest, as the distinguished conductor, Mr. Rabaud, made his appearance in Providence for the first time.

That the fame of Mr. Rabaud, the brilliant French conductor, who replaced Dr Muck, had preceded him here was manifest when the audience rose en masse as a tribute to his genius as he approached the platform at the opening of the concert. Then followed "The Star Spangled Banner," played as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play it, and at its close the applause was instant and sincere. In fact satisfaction and appreciation of the new leader and the new American Symphony Orchestra purged of its Prussian element, was continuous throughout the program.

Because of the necessary readjustment of the orchestra the audience noted many new faces in its personnel. It missed the former concert meister, Anton Witek, but welcomed his brilliant successor, Frederick Frodkin. The audience welcomed also the sight of that gifted white-haired veteran of the 'cello, A. Schroeder, formerly with the Kneisel Quartet, and acknowledged as one of the foremost masters of the violoncello in America.

The keenest listener, however, failed to detect any lessened power, vigor or harmony in the playing of the recently reorganized orchestra. On the contrary the orchestra never played to better advantage than last evening and Mr. Rabaud received an ovation at the end of the symphony. He is full of enthusiasm, energy and temperament, all of these indispensable traits to the successful conductor being evident last evening in the conductor's absolute mastery of his musical forces and the splendid response to his baton. He is not without high honor in his own country, France, where he has won laurels as an orchestral composer.

The soloist of the concert was Merle Alcock, contralto, of New York. Her singing caused nothing less than a sensation. She is the possessor of a true contralto voice such as one rarely hears. Of wide range, it retains in top, middle and lower register the real diapason quality which is its finest possession. Her singing of the Handel "Largo" was a superb piece of vocalization, her voice being clearly heard above the orchestra. Later in the program the Verdi "Aria," beautifully rendered, was greeted with prolonged applause and repeated recalls for the singer.

The program, one of the most satisfying ever presented to a Providence audience, was as follows:

Beethnven.....
Symphony in A-major, No. 7, Op. 92
I. Poco Sostenuto; Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto: Presto meno assai.
IV. Allegro con brio.
Handel.....
Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the Opera "Serse," Act I., Scene 1.
Saint-Saens.....
La Jeunesse d'Hercule" ("The Youth of Hercules"), Symphonic Poem No. 4, Op. 50.
Verdi.....
Aria, "O Don Fatale," from the Opera "Don Carlos," Act IV., Scene 6.
Weber.....Overture to "Euryanthe"

The conductor chose wisely when he elected to give to Providence music lovers Beethoven's exquisitely beautiful "Seventh Symphony" upon the occasion of his first visit here. This symphony is perhaps the most truly romantic and sensuously beautiful of all Beethoven's symphonies. Joy and sorrow, humor and wild passion alternate in its strongly contrasted movements and Mr. Rabaud conducted it with vigor, rare musicianly intelligence, authority and dignity. The solemn first theme which begins the second movement of the symphony was given in superb reading by the conductor an dplayed with majesty and breadth of tone so compelling as to call for the enthusiastic applause at the end of the movement. No less brilliant was the performance of the Allegro at the end of the symphony and then came tremendous applause and a half dozen recalls of the conductor.

The closing number, the Euryanthe Overture, was given with a rythm and swing of orchestral expression which sent the audience home filled with enthusiasm over the musical success of the evening and keen anticipation of the concerts to follow.

AMERICAN P.

Baltimore, Md. NOV 4 1921

BOSTONY SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, will give its second concert this season at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 4.

Interest in this concert will naturally center in the new conductor who is making his first appearance here. Mr. Rabaud, one of the most distinguished musicians of France, has had a long and brilliant career as conductor both of opera and concert. He was received by the symphony audiences in Boston with the greatest enthusiasm and won immediate favor.

The program which Mr. Rabaud has announced for December 4 is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, in A major; Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," (The Sorcerer's apprentice) Borodin, Symphony No. 2, in B

Wed. Nov. 21

PART TWO

Music

CONCERTS AND OPERA

MR. RABAUD'S MUSIC IN CHICAGO AND NEW YORK

His Second Symphony Played, His Opera of "Marouf" Reproduced, Both on a Single Day—Programmes in Prospect—Mme. Guilbert Sets Forth Verlaine—Puccini's Operatic Trilogy at Hand—Mr. Hofmann's Experiment

WHEN Mr. Rabaud was conducting at the Symphony Concert of last Friday afternoon as though he had no other concern in the world, his thoughts might pardonably have strayed either to Chicago, to New York or even to both. For, in the Western city in that very hour, Mr. de Lamarter and his orhestra were playing the Parisian's symphony in E minor; while a few hours later in the nearer metropolis, Mr. Gatti's forces were reproducing his opera of "Marouf." Already this second symphony of Mr. Rabaud, by many accounted his fullest and most characteristic music, has been heard in New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Worcester of American cities. To Chicago, however, it was new and Mr. de Lamarter included it in a programme both from intrinsic merit and in compliment to his fellow-conductor. By all accounts, the Chicagoans were eloquent with the piece and audience and reviewers received it well. Mr. Hackett, for example, writes in The Evening Post:

> Mr. Rabaud is related in his mode of thought to those men who have always written music in the sense that music is the expression of beauty through tone. He is able to create a melody, and the underlying thought of this symphony is melodic. Once in a while during the last ten years some daring soul has hazarded the opinion that those who affected to despise melody were those who lacked this creative power, and recent events have pretty conclusively proved that this opinion was based on the truth. Mr. Rabaud can bring forth from his inner consciousness a melody of strength and beauty—therefore he does. He develops his themes with an exquisite sense of proportion which knows as well where to curtail as where to elaborate. The display of orchestral and contrapuntal technique, just for its own sake, is mere pedantry, even though it wins the plaudits of the academic class. Mr. Rabaud really had something to say, and consequently he sought to say it with such force and direction as should make his meaning clear. There is all through the music the sense of clarity and balance that is the mark of the man with the feeling for art. Mr. Rabaud used his learning to express his meaning, and not to heap up great masses of tone interwoven with endless complications just because he had a modern orchestra to play with. The second movement was very beautiful and the third charming with its sparkling brilliance, though this the orchestra did not bring out with quite the desired limpidity. However, the movement made quite a hit with the audience just because of its spontaneous freshness. The symphony was a work worth hearing and one that would bear repetition in the near future.

In The Daily News, in turn, Mr. Rosenfeld writes of the symphony:

> It is a work whicht might easily have had precedence over any number of other symphonies we have had in many years, for not only does it contain some meaty themes, particularly well suited for musical transformation, but the four movements of the work, possibly excepting the first, are scored with remarkable musical skill and show a master mind in the handling of thematic and harmonic material. There is also a close thematic connection between the four divisions, which makes the work homogeneous and cumulative, and especially interesting and cleverly handled the last movement, in which the themes of the former sections are utilized with amazing skill and ingenuity. That Rabaud remains conservative in his harmonic scheme and does not follow the ultra-moderns is in this instance no detriment.

Clearly Mr. Rabaud will be guilty of a false modesty, if he does not sooner or later set his own symphony on a programme of his own concerts. An interested public in Boston would gladly know him no less as composer than as conductor.

With "Marouf," reproduced at the Metropolitan with nearly the same cast as adorned it a year ago, the reviewers were far kinder than was their way with the piece last December. Mr. Krehbiel, writing in The Tribune, approved Mr. Rabaud's excellent workmanship, applauded the veil of serio-comic oriental fantasy running through both play and music. Mr. Huneker, commenting in The Times, judged the opera "mostly condiment. . . . The music is eclectic. It is well scored, and the various episodes are picturesque but too perfumed. The Arabian Nights, Parisian in a boudoir. The fantasy is rather obvious, and not so ingenious, not so spontaneous as Rimsky-Korsakov's pantomime opera, 'Le Coq d'Or.' Nevertheless, 'Marouf' is worth hearing more than once. The more the pity that the subscriber audience seemed no more interested in "Marouf" than it was last year.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 6,

NEWS OF MUSIC

NEW YORK HEARS AND APPLAUDS MR. RABAUD

Warm Praise Not Only for the Conductor But Also for the Reorganized Orchestra—A Choral Concert in Prospect in the Regular Symphony Series—Magnard's Music, at Last, for American Ears—Mr. Hofmann's American Composers—No Tax on Tickets to Orchestral Concerts?

IN sharp contrast to the ill fortunes of November, all went well at the concert of the Boston Orchestra last evening in New York. For the first time Mr. Rabaud conducted in that city, for the first time the reorganized orchestra played in the form it has habitually maintained at home; of nervous upsets such as spoiled the two concerts in New York under Mr. Monteux, there was none. For programme Mr. Rabaud repeated the pieces in which he had led at his beginnings in Boston, viz.: Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakov's displayful "Spanish Caprice." At the end, with one accord, audience and reviewers rose up and called him blessed and agreed that the band was regaining its former mettle. With more carefully balanced judgment than that of some of his brethren, Mr. Huneker writes in The Times:

> Mr. Rabaud is a cerebal conductor. He is sensitive to form. His phrasing reveals not only the larger pulsation but also the articulation of the phrase; yet, he is not petit-maitre or meticulous. His feeling for nuance rather than undue insistence on color was rather a relief. The mere rhetoric of conducting makes little appeal to the new man. In a word a Frenchman, ruled by tact and a fine sense of tonal balance. But cerebral. No fear of his ever taking the bit between his teeth and bolting. Nor by the same token does he let the grass grow under his feet; witness the fleetness of his tempi in the Eroica Symphony, the last movement.
>
> As might have been expected, the Beethoven work was as clear as a June morning; almost Mozartean in the first movement. Transparent, clarity itself, the score lay open to the gaze, nevertheless the big Beethoven note was missing. Passion, profound sentiment, storm and stress were kept in the background. It was academic, not Napoleonic. The mighty paws of the lion were encased in the finest Parisian kid. This particularly applies to the first and second movements; to be sure there was crêpe and a discreet air of grief, nevertheless, the dead hero of the Funeral March had shrunk to the proportions of a model bourgeois. Neither Beethoven nor the First Consul were among the mourners. But the scherzo was like the rustling of the leaves in a gentle autumn gale. He has a light wrist, this Mr. Rabaud, with a keen appreciation of tonal values. Overrefinement, "the scholar's fault," may be set against him; almost a minor virtue instead of a peccadillo.
>
> The symphonic poem by Saint-Saëns, "The Youth of Hercules," gave us a better chance than the symphony to gauge the many qualities of the conductor. The weight and dramatic emphasis which were lacking before, here were in high relief. More than a moity of the old plangency of the strings was heard; and the elasticity of attack and release in massed episodes made me sure that the orchestra was ruled by a benign musical influence. The evening closed with a brilliant interpretation of the kaleidoscopic Caprice on Spanish Themes by Rimsky-Korsakov. The charm, swirling lines and leaping rhythms were all so vividly exposed that we seemed to be peeping from a courtyard in old Seville. The large audience liked Henri Rabaud, liked the beautiful playing of the men from Boston, and testified to their admiration by generous applause.

In The Sun, Mr. Henderson writes with fewer but similar reserves, saying:

> Mr. Rabaud brought relief. The orchestra is again in safe hands. He conducts with wide sweeping gesture in the larger moments and with almost microscopic motion in the pianissimi. His beat is clean and clear as crystal and just as sharp in its angles as a prism. Precision streams from his baton, attack is perfect under him. There can be no mistakes in entries, and let him have the shock of a thunderous burst into a forte and he is a military commander of the highest rank. But this is only the beginning of things. Balance and clarity have been restored to the orchestra. Everything sound in its right place and its right proportion. The transparent beauty of tone which has long been one of the Boston Orchestra's purest excellences is again found. Mr. Rabaud shows himself to be a conductor of fine sensibility, of keen perception. and a master of orchestral techniques.
>
> The new leader's treatment of Beethoven's symphony was admirable. He achieved effects without distortions of tempi. Without erratic rushes forward or leanings backward. Dynamics and a perfect proportioning of the voices were his chief means. To this end he restored Beethoven's instrumentation, subjected to many "improvements" by Dr. Muck. Mr. Rabaud elides all the additions. banishing the added wood-winds and horns. We heard the Trio of the scherzo from three horns as Beethoven wrote it, and it sounded just. The conductor's tempi were all of the best, except perhaps that of the last movement, which was a trifle swift, but he had a sure and confident plan for the development of the movement and it was most persuasive. If the romantic note was not strong in the symphony it was heard more clearly in the tone-poem of Saint-Saëns, in which the singing of the strings was rich with ravishing beauty of tonal quality and throbbing nuance. It was a very beautiful performance, exquisitely graded in its dynamics and yet continent in the treatment of the tempting tutti, easily carried into noise.

Mr. Rabaud was received with great cordiality by the Boston adherents and warmly recalled especially after the symphony. That he is a conductor who thoroughly knows his profession and has, moreover, a fastidious appreciation of the artistic qualities of the scores before [illegible] was proved. Whether [illegible] Symphonic music is not to [illegible] the people of New York. That the teaching of the concert given Carnegie Hall last evening, and came through the conducting of Mr. Rabaud. The first two concerts left an apprehension that the effect of the obligatory reorganization of the band might have so seriously impaired its efficiency that its performances could not longer serve as a corrective and inspiration as they had done for many years. But the crudities apparent on the first visit have all but disappeared under the training of Mr. Rabaud, and the admirable qualities which he displayed as an interpreter justify the patrons of the orchestra in looking forward to the visits of the musicians from Boston with all the delightful anticipation which they have inspired for a quarter of a century. This is good and a fit cause for congratulations to the committee of gentlemen who have relieved Mr. Higginson of a heavy burden and to the music lovers of both Boston and New York.

Mr. Rabaud's reading of the "Eroica" symphony was sincere, free from all attempts to disclose profundities never dreamed of by the composer, lucid in exposition without evidence of the use of the analytical scalpel, clear, the Funeral March filled with manly sorrow but never turgid, the Scherzo a marvel of lightness and grace, happily untroubled by the spirit which has so often weighted the music of the horns in the trio with significances irreconcilable with any theory of the psychological contents of the work as a whole. articulated in the finale (taken at an unusually rapid tempo) with a distinctness which seemed to reveal hitherto unnoticed beauties. Masterful was the quiet but strong development of climaxes, wholly charming to ear and fancy the nice adjustment of dynamic nuances. A noble performance.

BULLETIN

ess: Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 20 1919

The Opera Season

"Marouf," by Henri Rabaud, at the Metropolitan Last Evening

AT the first of the sixteen performances of grand opera to be given in Philadelphia by the Metropolitan Company this season, Henri Rabaud's musical setting of the Arabian Nights tale of "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo," with libretto by Lucien Nepoty, had its initial presentation before a local audience at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. This opera, which is said to have been a frequently repeated success at the Opera Comique in Paris, since it was introduced there in May, 1914, had its first performance in this country at the Metropolitan in New York in December last, with practically the same cast that was heard here last evening.

The fact that Rabaud, who is a French composer of much distinction, has been elected permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will soon assume the duties of that post, lends special interest to the production of his most important operatic work here. "Marouf" conforms closely to the modern idea of composition, affording an opportunity for lavish display in the way of scenery and costume, and providing, in an instrumental sense, a setting that is scarcely less spectacular than the beautiful scenes of Oriental splendor that are revealed on the stage.

The score, notable chiefly for its orchestral color and beauty, is admirably illuminative, to a truly grapnic degree, of the fantastic love tale of ancient Cairo, in which the cobbler, driven from home by his shrewish wife, discovers an old friend who introduces him to the Sultan as the richest man in the world, with the result that he is given a royal welcome and receives the hand of the beautiful Princess in marriage.

When his "fabulous" wealth is discovered really to be but a fable, he flees, but the Princess, who loves him for himself, goes with him, disguised as a boy. Reaching an oasis in the desert, in the moment of despair they find a lucky talisman and win the assistance of a genii, who causes the mythical caravan of riches actually to appear, to the joy and glad forgiveness of the Sultan, when that mighty monarch arrives with the intention of accomplishing their punishment.

Rabaud's music has much of the melody, some of the dissonance and a great deal of the elegance of style and refinement of execution that characterize what is regarded as "the modern French school." It runs largely to alluring effects in strings and woodwind, often suggesting Debussy, without evidence of imitation, and there are as well occasional moments of dramatic significance in the orchestral score. The music, as a whole, has the Oriental coloring and tinge of mysticism, fitting, as already said, the fantastic quality of the tale, and while the production conforms to the idea of opera comique rather than to that of "grand" opera, it provides an entertainment that fairly ravishes the eye and frequently delights the ear.

The Metropolitan Company's production is surpassing in its extravagance of spectacular display. Seldom has the local stage disclosed anything so picturesque as the scenes in the Market Place of Kaitan and in the courtyard in front of the Sultan's palace, with an Oriental ballet, of extreme beauty, in which an enlarged corps of dancers were led by Rosina Galli, more supple and graceful than ever in a number of new evolutions, and nimble Giuseppe Bonfiglio, who is scarcely less of a terpsichorean marvel There is also a beautiful scene in the harem, and another in the desert, stretching off in the distance, with the long caravan slowly crossing the horizon and making its approach.

The cast is headed by Giuseppe de L[illegible] as Marouf, and Frances Alda as [illegible] of the cast but little opportunity [illegible] dividual display of their ability, did not call for real enthusiasm. Mr. de Luca, to be sure, occasionally was interrupted upon the slightest indication of a pause sufficient to invite applause, for his suave and tonally beautifully singing of the title role, and Mme. Alda was given a cordial demonstration of admiration, after her admirable delivery of the Princess' lovely raptures over the sleeping cobbler, with whom she has so speedily become enamored.

But of genuine enthusiasm, such as first-night audiences at the opera are fond of showing, when the work is a familiar one and the singers have a chance to invite applause, with sufficient intervals for it to be given, there was but little.

Here in Boston

The first and the second pair of concerts in the schedule of the Symphony Orchestra were omitted last October when the epidemic of influenza suspended public entertainment. As now proposed, concerts on Monday afternoon, Dec. 30, and Tuesday evening, Dec. 31, will replace one of the deferred pairs. At them the programme will consist largely of choral pieces for which Mr. Townsend has reassembled a hundred and more singers of the Boston Symphony Chorus. Franck's setting of a Psalm and Verdi's seldom heard Te Deum are two of the pieces to be sung.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Rabaud, New Conductor, Ma[illegible] First Brooklyn Appearance Hoffmann, the Soloist.

At the second concert by the Bos[illegible] Symphony Orchestra, to be given [illegible] the Academy of Music Friday e[illegible]ning, December 6, the newly appoin[illegible] conductor, Henri Benjamin Rab[illegible] will make his first appearance in [illegible] borough. The occasion will be o[illegible] deep interest to the Brooklyn [illegible]porters of the orchestra. Mr. Ra[illegible] comes to this country's foremost [illegible]chestral organization from the O[illegible] at Paris, of which he was appoi[illegible] conductor in January, 1914. The ho[illegible] in which he is held at home [illegible] publicly recognized in June of [illegible] year by the announcement that he [illegible] been made Chevalier de la Leg[illegible] d'Honneur. He is also a member [illegible] the executive committee of the Fre[illegible] National Society of Music. Mr. Rab[illegible] comes to us on leave granted by [illegible] Minister of Fine Arts, and is sure [illegible] receive a cordial welcome in [illegible] country. The program for Decem[illegible] 6 includes three numbers—B[illegible]hoven's Seventh Symphony, Chop[illegible] Concerto in E minor and Saint Sa[illegible] "La Jeunessee d'Hercule." Josef H[illegible]mann is the assisting artist for [illegible] Chopin number.

GLOBE-

DECEMBER 8.

Rabaud Praised in Gotham as Conductor and Compos[illegible]

The attitude of the New York ne[illegible]papers was quite changed upon the [illegible]ond appearance of the Boston S[illegible]phony Orchestra this season from t[illegible] of the first. Thursday night Mr [illegible]baud, who has been steadily establi[illegible]g himself here in favor, made his [illegible]ppearance in Carnegie Hall.

Not only was the enthusiasm of [illegible] audience pronounced, but with one [illegible]cord the reviewers the following m[illegible]ing couched their remarks in the ton[illegible] deference and high regard with w[illegible] they treated the orchestra before, [illegible] expressed warm, some of them [illegible] praise for Mr Rabaud.

Mr Henderson of the Sun, perh[illegible] more apprehensive than his collea[illegible] a month ago at the changes in en[illegible]ble and direction, hastens to say [illegible]baud brought relief. The orch[illegible] again in safe hands." After n[illegible]e clearness of his beat, the prec[illegible] orchestral attack, Mr Hende[illegible]ds:

"But this is only the beginnin[illegible]ngs. Balance and clarity have [illegible]stored to the orchestra. Everyth[illegible]unds in its right place and right [illegible]rtion. The transparent beauty of [illegible]hich has long been one of the Bos[illegible]rchestra's purest excellences is ag[illegible]und. Mr Rabaud shows himself te[illegible] conductor of fine sensibility, of [illegible]erception and a master of orches[illegible]chnics."

Mr Krehbiel in the Tribune begins [illegible]rticle by saying: "The mission of [illegible]oston orchestra as an impetus to [illegible]ppreciation of symphonic music is [illegible] be lost to the people of New Y[illegible]hat was the teaching of the con[illegible]en in Carnegie Hall last night [illegible] came through the conducting of [illegible]Rabaud; the admirable qualities he [illegible]played as an interpreter justify [illegible]patrons of the orchestra in looking [illegible]ward to the visits of the musici[illegible] from Boston with all the delightful [illegible]ticipation which they have inspired [illegible] a quarter of a century."

Mr Huneker of the Times, while [illegible]sifying Mr Rabud's type as "cereb[illegible] finds him: "In a word, a Frenchm[illegible] ruled by tact and a fine sense of to[illegible] balance. More than a moiety of the [illegible]plougency of the strings was he[illegible] (Saint-Saens 'Youth of Hercules') a[illegible] the elasticity of attack and release [illegible] massed episodes made me sure that [illegible] orchestra was ruled by a benign mu[illegible]cal influence."

Mr de Koven, in the Herald, [illegible] comfort in his having predicted [illegible] Rabaud's New York success and pra[illegible] "the authority, sanity and artistic [illegible]cerity of this great musician and c[illegible]ductor." Max Smith said in the Am[illegible]ican that "the caliber of M Rabau[illegible] musicianship was established at [illegible] very outset," and the world found [illegible] Beethoven ("Eroica") "distinguished [illegible] elements of musicianship and und[illegible]standing."

Last evening Mr Rabaud was [illegible] guest of Mr Gatti-Casazza at the [illegible]formance of his opera, "Marouf," b[illegible] Metropolitan Opera Company at [illegible] Brooklyn Academy. It was the [illegible] time the conductor had found opp[illegible]tunity to hear his work—adjudged a [illegible] success in New York—since leavi[illegible] France, although it has been produ[illegible] also in South America. He was [illegible] demonstration by the audience.

RIBUNE NOVEMBER 20.

WARM WELCOME FOR ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Under New Leadership Rendered Program in Brilliant Style.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, opened its 38th season, and gave its 155th concert in Providence in Infantry Hall last evening. A large audience was present, though there were vacant seats which should have been occupied, for the concert was one of great beauty and rare musical interest, as the distinguished conductor, Mr. Rabaud, made his appearance in Providence for the first time.

That the fame of Mr. Rabaud, the brilliant French conductor, who replaced Dr Muck, had preceded him here was manifest when the audience rose en masse as a tribute to his genius as he approached the platform at the opening of the concert. Then followed "The Star Spangled Banner," played as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play it, and at its close the applause was instant and sincere. In fact satisfaction and appreciation of the new leader and the new American Symphony Orchestra purged of its Prussian element, was continuous throughout the program.

Because of the necessary readjustment of the orchestra the audience noted many new faces in its personnel. It missed the former concert meister, Anton Witek, but welcomed his brilliant successor, Frederick Frodkin. The audience welcomed also the sight of that gifted white-haired veteran of the 'cello, A. Schroeder, formerly with the Kneisel Quartet, and acknowledged as one of the foremost masters of the violoncello in America.

The keenest listener, however, failed to detect any lessened power, vigor or harmony in the playing of the recently reorganized orchestra. On the contrary the orchestra never played to better advantage than last evening and Mr. Rabaud received an ovation at the end of the symphony. He is full of enthusiasm, energy and temperament, all of these indispensable traits to the successful conductor being evident last evening in the conductor's absolute mastery of his musical forces and the splendid response to his baton. He is not without high honor in his own country, France, where he has won laurels as an orchestral composer.

The soloist of the concert was Merle Alcock, contralto, of New York. Her singing caused nothing less than a sensation. She is the possessor of a true contralto voice such as one rarely hears. Of wide range, it retains in top, middle and lower register the real diapason quality which is its finest possession. Her singing of the Handel "Largo" was a superb piece of vocalization, her voice being clearly heard above the orchestra. Later in the program the Verdi "Aria," beautifully rendered, was greeted with prolonged applause and repeated recalls for the singer.

The program, one of the most satisfying ever presented to a Providence audience, was as follows:

Beethnven.....
Symphony in A-major, No. 7, Op. 92
I. Poco Sostenuto; Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto: Presto meno assai.
IV. Allegro con brio.

Handel.....
Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the Opera "Serse," Act I., Scene 1.

Saint-Saens.....
La Jeunesse d'Hercule" ("The Youth of Hercules"), Symphonic Poem No. 4, Op. 50.

Verdi.....
Aria, "O Don Fatale," from the Opera "Don Carlos," Act IV., Scene 6.

Weber.....Overture to "Euryanthe"

The conductor chose wisely when he elected to give to Providence music lovers Beethoven's exquisitely beautiful "Seventh Symphony" upon the occasion of his first visit here. This symphony is perhaps the most truly romantic and sensuously beautiful of all Beethoven's symphonies. Joy and sorrow, humor and wild passion alternate in its strongly contrasted movements and Mr. Rabaud conducted it with vigor, rare musicianly intelligence, authority and dignity. The solemn first theme which begins the second movement of the symphony was given in superb reading by the conductor an dplayed with majesty and breadth of tone so compelling as to call for the enthusiastic applause at the end of the movement. No less brilliant was the performance of the Allegro at the end of the symphony and then came tremendous applause and a half dozen recalls of the conductor.

The closing number, the Euryanthe Overture, was given with a rythm and swing of orchestral expression which sent the audience home filled with enthusiasm over the musical success of the evening and keen anticipation of the concerts to follow.

AMERICAN N. B. P.

Baltimore, Md NOV

BOSTONY SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, will give its second concert this season at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 4.

Interest in this concert will naturally center in the new conductor who is making his first appearance here. Mr. Rabaud, one of the most distinguished musicians of France, has had a long and brilliant career as conductor both of opera and concert. He was received by the symphony audiences in Boston with the greatest enthusiasm and won immediate favor.

The program which Mr. Rabaud has announced for December 4 is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, in A major; Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," (The Sorcerer's apprentice) Borodin, Symphony No. 2, in B minor.

Trans. Wed. Nov. 21

PART TWO

Music

CONCERTS AND OPERA

MR. RABAUD'S MUSIC IN CHICAGO AND NEW YORK

His Second Symphony Played, His Opera of "Marouf" Reproduced, Both on a Single Day—Programmes in Prospect—Mme. Guilbert Sets Forth Verlaine—Puccini's Operatic Trilogy at Hand—Mr. Hofmann's Experiment

WHEN Mr. Rabaud was conducting at the Symphony Concert of last Friday afternoon as though he had no other concern in the world, his thoughts might pardonably have strayed either to Chicago, to New York or even to both. For, in the Western city in that very hour, Mr. de Lamarter and his orhestra were playing the Parisian's symphony in E minor; while a few hours later in the nearer metropolis, Mr. Gatti's forces were reproducing his opera of "Marouf." Already this second symphony of Mr. Rabaud, by many accounted his fullest and most characteristic music, has been heard in New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Worcester of American cities. To Chicago, however, it was new and Mr. de Lamarter included it in a programme both from intrinsic merit and in compliment to his fellow-conductor. By all accounts, the Chicagoans were eloquent with the piece and audience and reviewers received it well. Mr. Hackett, for example, writes in The Evening Post:

> Mr. Rabaud is related in his mode of thought to those men who have always written music in the sense that music is the expression of beauty through tone. He is able to create a melody, and the underlying thought of this symphony is melodic. Once in a while during the last ten years some daring soul has hazarded the opinion that those who affected to despise melody were those who lacked this creative power, and recent events have pretty conclusively proved that this opinion was based on the truth. Mr. Rabaud can bring forth from his inner consciousness a melody of strength and beauty—therefore he does. He develops his themes with an exquisite sense of proportion which knows as well where to curtail as where to elaborate. The display of orchestral and contrapuntal technique, just for its own sake, is mere pedantry, even though it wins the plaudits of the academic class. Mr. Rabaud really had something to say, and consequently he sought to say it with such force and direction as should make his meaning clear. There is all through the music the sense of clarity and balance that is the mark of the man with the feeling for art. Mr. Rabaud used his learning to express his meaning, and not to heap up great masses of tone interwoven with endless complications just because he had a modern orchestra to play with. The second movement was very beautiful and the third charming with its sparkling brilliance, though this the orchestra did not bring out with quite the desired limpidity. However, the movement made quite a hit with the audience just because of its spontaneous freshness. The symphony was a work worth hearing and one that would bear repetition in the near future.

In The Daily News, in turn, Mr. Rosenfeld writes of the symphony:

> It is a work whicht might easily have had precedence over any number of other symphonies we have had in many years, for not only does it contain some meaty themes, particularly well suited for musical transformation, but the four movements of the work, possibly excepting the first, are scored with remarkable musical skill and show a master mind in the handling of thematic and harmonic material. There is also a close thematic connection between the four divisions, which makes the work homogeneous and cumulative, and especially interesting and cleverly handled the last movement, in which the themes of the former sections are utilized with amazing skill and ingenuity. That Rabaud remains conservative in his harmonic scheme and does not follow the ultra-moderns is in this instance no detriment.

Clearly Mr. Rabaud will be guilty of false modesty, if he does not sooner or later set his own symphony on a programme of his own concerts. An interested public in Boston would gladly know him no less as composer than as conductor.

With "Marouf," reproduced at the Metropolitan with nearly the same cast that adorned it a year ago, the reviewers were far kinder than was their way with the piece last December. Mr. Krehbiel, writing in The Tribune, approved Mr. Rabaud's excellent workmanship, applauded the veil of serio-comic oriental fantasy running through both play and music. Mr. Huneker, commenting in The Times, judged the opera "mostly condiment. . . . The music is eclectic. It is well scored, and the various episodes are picturesque but to perfumed. The Arabian Nights, Parisian in a boudoir. The fantasy is rather obvious, and not so ingenious, not so spontaneous as Rimsky-Korsakov's pantomime opera, 'Le Coq d'Or.' Nevertheless, 'Marouf' is worth hearing more than once. The more the pity that the subscriber audience seemed no more interested in "Marouf" than it was last year.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 6,

NEWS OF MUSIC

NEW YORK HEARS AND APPLAUDS MR. RABAUD

Warm Praise Not Only for the Conductor But Also for the Reorganized Orchestra—A Choral Concert in Prospect in the Regular Symphony Series—Magnard's Music, at Last, for American Ears—Mr. Hofmann's American Composers—No Tax on Tickets to Orchestral Concerts?

IN sharp contrast to the ill fortunes of November, all went well at the concert of the Boston Orchestra last evening in New York. For the first time Mr. Rabaud conducted in that city, for the first time the reorganized orchestra played in the form it has habitually maintained at home; of nervous upsets such as spoiled the two concerts in New York under Mr. Monteux, there was none. For programme Mr. Rabaud repeated the pieces in which he had led at his beginnings in Boston, viz.: Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakov's displayful "Spanish Caprice." At the end, with one accord, audience and reviewers rose up and called him blessed and agreed that the band was regaining its former mettle. With more carefully balanced judgment than that of some of his brethren, Mr. Huneker writes in The Times:

> Mr. Rabaud is a cerebal conductor. He is sensitive to form. His phrasing reveals not only the larger pulsation but also the articulation of the phrase; yet, he is not petit-maître or meticulous. His feeling for nuance rather than undue insistence on color was rather a relief. The mere rhetoric of conducting makes little appeal to the new man. In a word a Frenchman, ruled by tact and a fine sense of tonal balance. But cerebral. No fear of his ever taking the bit between his teeth and bolting. Nor by the same token does he let the grass grow under his feet; witness the fleetness of his tempi in the Eroica Symphony, the last movement.
>
> As might have been expected, the Beethoven work was as clear as a June morning; almost Mozartean in the first movement. Transparent, clarity itself, the score lay open to the gaze, nevertheless the big Beethoven note was missing. Passion, profound sentiment, storm and stress were kept in the background. It was academic, not Napoleonic. The mighty paws of the lion were encased in the finest Parisian kid. This particularly applies to the first and second movements; to be sure there was crêpe and a discreet air of grief, nevertheless, the dead hero of the Funeral March had shrunk to the proportions of a model bourgeois. Neither Beethoven nor the First Consul were among the mourners. But the scherzo was like the rustling of the leaves in a gentle autumn gale. He has a light wrist, this Mr. Rabaud, with a keen appreciation of tonal values. Overrefinement, "the scholar's fault," may be set against him; almost a minor virtue instead of a peccadillo.
>
> The symphonic poem by Saint-Saëns, "The Youth of Hercules," gave us a better chance than the symphony to gauge the many qualities of the conductor. The weight and dramatic emphasis which were lacking before, here were in high relief. More than a moity of the old plangency of the strings was heard; and the elasticity of attack and release in massed episodes made me sure that the orchestra was ruled by a benign musical influence. The evening closed with a brilliant interpretation of the kaleidoscopic Caprice on Spanish Themes by Rimsky-Korsakov. The charm, swirling lines and leaping rhythms were all so vividly exposed that we seemed to be peeping from a courtyard in old Seville. The large audience liked Henri Rabaud, liked the beautiful playing of the men from Boston, and testified to his influence.

Symphonic music is not to [illegible] the people of New York. That [illegible] the teaching of the concert given [illegible] Carnegie Hall last evening, and [illegible] came through the conducting of Mr. Rabaud. The first two concerts left an apprehension that the effect of the obligatory reorganization of the band might have so seriously impaired its efficiency that its performances could not longer serve as a corrective and inspiration as they had done for many years. But the crudities apparent on the first visit have all but disappeared under the training of Mr. Rabaud, and the admirable qualities which he displayed as an interpreter justify the patrons of the orchestra in looking forward to the visits of the musicians from Boston with all the delightful anticipation which they have inspired for a quarter of a century. This is good and a fit cause for congratulations to the committee of gentlemen who have relieved Mr. Higginson of a heavy burden and to the music lovers of both Boston and New York.

Mr. Rabaud's reading of the "Eroica" symphony was sincere, free from all attempts to disclose profundities never dreamed of by the composer, lucid in exposition without evidence of the use of the analytical scalpel, clear, the Funeral March filled with manly sorrow but never turgid, the Scherzo a marvel of lightness and grace, happily untroubled by the spirit which has so often weighted the music of the horns in the trio with significances irreconcilable with any theory of the psychological contents of the work as a whole. articulated in the finale (taken at an unusually rapid tempo) with a distinctness which seemed to reveal hitherto unnoticed beauties. Masterful was the quiet but strong development of cli-

Clearly Mr. Rabaud will be guilty of false modesty, if he does not sooner or later set his own symphony on a programme of his own concerts. An interested public in Boston would gladly know him no less as composer than as conductor.

With "Marouf," reproduced at the Metropolitan with nearly the same cast that adorned it a year ago, the reviewers were far kinder than was their way with the piece last December. Mr. Krehbiel, writing in The Tribune, approved Mr. Rabaud's excellent workmanship, applauded the veil of serio-comic oriental fantasy running through both play and music. Mr. Huneker, commenting in The Times, judged the opera "mostly condiment. . . . The music is eclectic. It is well scored, and the various episodes are picturesque but to perfumed. The Arabian Nights, Parisian in a boudoir. The fantasy is rather obvious, and not so ingenious, not so spontaneous as Rimsky-Korsakov's pantomime opera, 'Le Coq d'Or.' Nevertheless, 'Marouf' is worth hearing more than once. The more the pity that the subscriber audience seemed no more interested in "Marouf" than it was last year.

Vassar Notes

Vassar's War Service Council has an [illegible]

Vassar's purest excellences is again found. Mr. Rabaud shows himself to be a conductor of fine sensibility, of keen perception, and a master of orchestral techniques.

The new leader's treatment of Beethoven's symphony was admirable. He achieved effects without distortions of tempi. Without erratic rushes forward or leanings backward. Dynamics and a perfect proportioning of the voices were his chief means. To this end he restored Beethoven's instrumentation, subjected to many "improvements" by Dr. Muck. Mr. Rabaud elides all the additions, banishing the added wood-winds and horns. We heard the Trio of the scherzo from three horns as Beethoven wrote it, and it sounded just. The conductor's tempi were all of the best, except perhaps that of the last movement, which was a trifle swift, but he had a sure and confident plan for the development of the movement and it was most persuasive. If the romantic note was not strong in the symphony it was heard more clearly in the tone-poem of Saint-Saëns, in which the singing of the strings was rich with ravishing beauty of tonal quality and throbbing nuance. It was a very beautiful performance, exquisitely graded in its dynamics and yet continent in the treatment of the tempting tutti, easily carried into noise.

Mr. Rabaud was received with great cordiality by the Boston adherents and warmly recalled especially after the symphony. That he is a conductor who thoroughly knows his profession and has, moreover, a fastidious appreciation of the artistic qualities of the scores before [illegible] was proved. Whether

BULLETIN

ess: Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 20

The Opera Season

"Marouf," by Henri Rabaud, at the Metropolitan Last Evening

AT the first of the sixteen performances of grand opera to be given in Philadelphia by the Metropolitan Company this season, Henri Rabaud's musical setting of the Arabian Nights tale of "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo," with libretto by Lucien Nepoty, had its initial presentation before a local audience at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. This opera, which is said to have been a frequently repeated success at the Opera Comique in Paris, since it was introduced there in May, 1914, had its first performance in this country at the Metropolitan in New York in December last, with practically the same cast that was heard here last evening.

The fact that Rabaud, who is a French composer of much distinction, has been elected permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will soon assume the duties of that post, lends special interest to the production of his most important operatic work here. "Marouf" conforms closely to the modern idea of composition, affording an opportunity for lavish display in the way of scenery and costume, and providing, in an instrumental sense, a setting that is scarcely less spectacular than the beautiful scenes of Oriental splendor that are revealed on the stage.

The score, notable chiefly for its orchestral color and beauty, is admirably illuminative, to a truly grapnic degree, of the fantastic love tale of ancient Cairo, in which the cobbler, driven from home by his shrewish wife, discovers an old friend who introduces him to the Sultan as the richest man in the world, with the result that he is given a royal welcome and receives the hand of the beautiful Princess in marriage.

When his "fabulous" wealth is discovered really to be but a fable, he flees, but the Princess, who loves him for himself, goes with him, disguised as a boy. Reaching an oasis in the desert, in the moment of despair they find a lucky talisman and win the assistance of a genii, who causes the mythical caravan of riches actually to appear, to the joy and glad forgiveness of the Sultan, when that mighty monarch arrives with the intention of accomplishing their punishment.

Rabaud's music has much of the melody, some of the dissonance and a great deal of the elegance of style and refinement of execution that characterize what is regarded as "the modern French school." It runs largely to alluring effects in strings and woodwind, often suggesting Debussy, without evidence of imitation, and there are as well occasional moments of dramatic significance in the orchestral score. The music, as a whole, has the Oriental coloring and tinge of mysticism, fitting, as already said, the fantastic quality of the tale, and while the production conforms to the idea of opera comique rather than to that of "grand" opera, it provides an entertainment that fairly ravishes the eye and frequently delights the ear.

The Metropolitan Company's production is surpassing in its extravagance of spectacular display. Seldom has the local stage disclosed anything so picturesque as the scenes in the Market Place of Kaitan and in the courtyard in front of the Sultan's palace, with an Oriental ballet of extreme beauty, in which an enlarged corps of dancers were led by Rosina Galli, more supple and graceful than ever in a number of new evolutions, and nimble Giuseppe Bonfiglio, who is scarcely less of a terpsichorean marvel. There is also a beautiful scene in the harem, and another in the desert, stretching off in the distance, with the long caravan slowly crossing the horizon and making its approach.

The cast is headed by Giuseppe de Luca, as Marouf, and Frances Alda as the Princess, both of these favorite artists last evening giving emphasis to their former successes here, while Leon Rothier also won distinct favor, as the Sultan, imposing both in person and sonorousness of voice. The singers, as in most of the "modern" works, have not much opportunity to "sing," however, having little to do aside from recitative and declamation, often melodious and dramatic, but seldom given to anything like the regulation operatic aria, duet or concerted number. The performance was ably conducted by Pierre Monteux, who appeared here a couple weeks ago as temporary director of the Boston Orchestra, and the instrumental score fairly glowed under his sympathetic and comprehensive leadership.

The audience was large and presented much of the usual brilliant aspect of a first night at the opera, but the nature of the performance, offering the members of the cast but little opportunity for individual display of their ability, did not call for real enthusiasm. Mr. de Luca, to be sure, occasionally was interrupted upon the slightest indication of a pause sufficient to invite applause, for his suave and tonally beautifully singing of the title role, and Mme. Alda was given a cordial demonstration of admiration, after her admirable delivery of the Princess' lo raptures over the sleeping cobbler, w whom she has so speedily become enamored.

But of genuine enthusiasm, such first-night audiences at the opera are fond of showing, when the work is familiar one and the singers have chance to invite applause, with sufficie intervals for it to be given, there w but little.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Rabaud, New Conductor, Ma[illegible] First Brooklyn Appearance Hoffmann, the Soloist.

At the second concert by the Bos Symphony Orchestra, to be given the Academy of Music Friday e ning, December 6, the newly appoin conductor, Henri Benjamin Rab will make his first appearance in borough. The occasion will be o deep interest to the Brooklyn porters of the orchestra. Mr. Rab comes to this country's foremost chestral organization from the Op at Paris, of which he was appoin conductor in January, 1914. The ho in which he is held at home publicly recognized in June of year by the announcement that he been made Chevalier de la Leg d'Honneur. He is also a member the executive committee of the Fre National Society of Music. Mr. Rab comes to us on leave granted by Minister of Fine Arts, and is sure receive a cordial welcome in country. The program for Decem 6 includes three numbers—Be hoven's Seventh Symphony, Chop Concerto in E minor and Saint Sa "La Jeunessee d'Hercule." Josef H mann is the assisting artist for Chopin number.

GLOBE-

DECEMBER 8,

Rabaud Praised in Gotham as Conductor and Compos

The attitude of the New York ne papers was quite changed upon the s ond appearance of the Boston S phony Orchestra this season from t of the first. Thursday night Mr baud, who has been steadily establi s himself here in favor, made his appearance in Carnegie Hall.

Not only was the enthusiasm of audience pronounced, but with one cord the reviewers the following m ing couched their remarks in the ton deference and high regard with w they treated the orchestra before, expressed warm, some of them praise for Mr Rabaud.

Mr Henderson of the Sun, perh more apprehensive than his collea a month ago at the changes in en ble and direction, hastens to say Rabaud brought relief. The orch is again in safe hands." After n the clearness of his beat, the prec of orchestral attack, Mr Hende adds:

"But this is only the beginning things. Balance and clarity have restored to the orchestra. Everyth sounds in its right place and right portion. The transparent beauty of which has long been one of the Bos orchestra's purest excellences is ag found. Mr Rabaud shows himself to a conductor of fine sensibility, of k perception and a master of orches technics."

Mr Krehbiel in the Tribune begins article by saying: "The mission of Boston orchestra as an impetus to appreciation of symphonic music is to be lost to the people of New Yo That was the teaching of the conc given in Carnegie Hall last night it came through the conducting of Rabaud; the admirable qualities he played as an interpreter justify patrons of the orchestra in looking ward to the visits of the musici from Boston with all the delightful ticipation which they have inspired a quarter of a century."

Mr Huneker of the Times, while sifying Mr Rabud's type as "cereb finds him: "In a word, a Frenchn ruled by tact and a fine sense of to balance. More than a moiety of the plougency of the strings was he (Saint-Saens 'Youth of Hercules') a the elasticity of attack and release massed episodes made me sure that orchestra was ruled by a benign mu cal influence."

Mr de Koven, in the Herald, comfort in his having predicted Rabaud's New York success and pra "the authority, sanity and artistic s cerity of this great musician and c ductor." Max Smith said in the Am ican that "the caliber of M Rabau musicianship was established at very outset," and the world found Beethoven ("Eroica") "distinguished elements of musicianship and und standing."

Last evening Mr Rabaud was guest of Mr Gatti-Casazza at the formance of his opera, "Marouf," b Metropolitan Opera Company at Brooklyn Academy. It was the time the conductor had found opp tunity to hear his work—adjudged a success in New York—since leavi France, although it has been produ also in South America. He was demonstration by the audience.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

FREDERIC FRADKIN

Brilliant Concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Gives First of Series of Concerts at Infantry Hall Next Tuesday Evening.

BULLETIN. PROVIDENCE. NOVEMBER 14.

HENRI RABAUD, NEW DIRECTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Conductor Who is Prominent as Composer and Holds High Place Among French Orchestral Leaders Will Make His First Appearance in Providence at the Concert Next Tuesday Night in Infantry Hall.

Henri Rabaud's first appearance in this city as the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday evening should provide an incentive for all music lovers to attend the concert in Infantry Hall.

The elimination of all German and Austrian musicians from the famous orchestra, thereby removing the objectionable features which aroused public disapproval and its present constitution of musicians free from the taint of disloyalty, should make certain the return of the orchestra to the niche in popular esteem which it enjoyed for so long a period prior to the war.

Henri Rabaud, the new director, has for 20 years been one of the most distinguished figures in French music, standing in the first rank among French conductors and being an eminent composer as well. Now in his 54th year, he won the Grand Prix de Rome at the Paris Conservatoire in 1894 and for seven years he has been the principal conductor at the Grand Opera, Paris, under Messager, the leader of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, which recently appeared in this city. In addition M. Rabaud has conducted symphony concerts in Rome, Vienna and other cities, so that his continental reputation is firmly established.

As a composer he has to his credit two symphonies, a symphonic poem, two oratorios and three operas. His opera, "Marouf," was one of the novelties produced at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, last season.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT ON TUESDAY NIGH

Henri Rabaud to Conduc Gallicized Orchestra at Infantry Hall

With a personnel that has under gone great change in the past si months, with a conductor who wi be making then his fourth appear ance in America, and with a solois of rare charm and beauty of voice the Boston Symphony Orchestra re turns to Providence for the first o its series of concerts in Infantry Hal next Tuesday evening. Novembe 19th, under conditions that not onl arouse the keenest interest among the musical public of Providence but give promise of great brilliancy.

The past is past and it is well to forget the unfortunate occurrences of a year ago. None the less, the episode in Providence has had a deep effect on the orchestra, and if all the reports are correct, despite the fact that it has had changes in its personnel amounting to one quarter of the number, the orchestra is finer and better this year than it ever has been before.

Naturally Mr. Rabaud, who is the new conductor, will hold the centre of the stage figuratively as well as literally. Any man appointed to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must naturally attract wide attention, for it is the most important post of its kind in the world—the greatest position a conductor can fill. Mr. Rabaud has come to America, bringing with him an enviable reputation, not only as a conductor but as a composer. He is in the foremost rank of French musicians, and much is expected of him here.

Mme. Alcock Soloist

Madame Alcock, the soloist, is an artist of very unusual quality who will be new to the majority of the patrons of the concerts. The programme begins with the "Eroica" of Beethoven. Mr. Rabaud believes in the performance of the great classics, and certainly he could not choose a more appropriate work for performance at this time than the great 3rd Symphony of the master of masters. The other numbers will be Saint Saens' Symphonic Poem "The Youth of Hercules" and Weber's Overture "Euryanthe."

Madame Alcock will sing as her first number the air from Handel's "Xerxes," best known to the public as the Largo. As her second number she will sing the familiar air from "Samson and Delila," "My Heart At Thy Dear Voice."

HERALD DECEMBER 8,

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Ask almost any student of the organ to describe the French school, and he will say, "First there was Lemmens ond Cesar Franck, then there was Guilmant; now there is Bonnet." He will probably go on to speak, particularly if he has studied in Paris, of the Boston Symphony concerts, this week, at which Mr. Bonnet will play the symphony in D minor for organ ond orchestra by Guilmant. Mr. Bonnet will introduce his own cadenza.

There stand also on the program the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven and Frederick Converse's musical version of Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

SUN

m

BALTIMORE, M

dress

te DEC 8 - 1918

To Omit Beethoven Symphony.

Of the four orchestral concerts so far played in Baltimore this season, three having included Beethoven symphonies, word has come from Boston of a decision to omit the seventh symphony of Beethoven at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Theatre tomorrow evening. In its stead will be played as the first number Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and as second number preceding the intermission Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony.

EVENING GLOBE

ess: New York City

HENRI RABAUD CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD

Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL NOVEMBER 20

BOSTON SYMPHONY GETS BIG OVATION

Great Welcome Extended to New Americanized Organization.

TRIBUTE PAID TO RABAUD

Audience Goes Wild as Reorganized Orchestra, with Teutonic Taint Removed, Plays "The Star Spangled Banner," Which Dr. Muck Refused to Include in Programme

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, its former Teutonic taint removed, opened its 38th season at Infantry Hall here last evening, with a rendition of "The Star Spangled Banner," which Dr. Karl Muck, its former leader, refused to play in this city a year ago, declaring it was unfit for a symphony programme, that brought for the great musical organization the biggest ovation it has ever received here. Henri Rabaud, the French leader, who replaced Dr. Muck when he resigned and was interned as a dangerous alien enemy, was given a welcome that was truly marvellous, and when, at the end of the first symphony, he was recalled time and time again, he finally brought the orchestra to its feet to share with him in the tribute that had been paid by Providence music lovers, the audience went wild.

The magnificent playing of the national anthem last night was a fitting reply to the objections raised by the former German leader. It was made evident from the start that the orchestra has not suffered from the ousting of the objectionable Prussian element headed by Dr. Muck. After the initial concert last season, music lovers of the city declined to continue their support as long as Dr. Muck headed the organization, and the remainder of the concerts scheduled for the season were cancelled. This season Providence welcomes back an American Boston Symphony Orchestra, and last evening's demonstration clearly shows that, with its new leader, the organization has again won the hearts of its former admirers here.

New faces were numerous in the ranks, but here and there could be seen the features of those so familiar in the days that are gone. Chief among the newcomers is Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster.

The orchestra came with its full complement of men, following the custom established two seasons ago.

An infusion of new blood has given added strength and vigor to the organization and the results obtained last evening under Conductor Rabaud showed that in this reorganized, Americanized orchestra we have one capable of upholding the best traditions of America's most famous orchestral body. Interest in the new conductor was naturally keen.

If there were any in the audience who had formed an opinion of Monsieur Rabaud's personality from his mild looking pictures in the daily press they received a sudden and pleasant awakening. The noted Frenchman approaches his task with enthusiasm and energy and succeeds admirably in infusing a similar spirit into his men. He is fairly tall, of wiry build and his hair and beard are slightly tinged with gray. Although in middle life he possesses the spirit of youth and displays it in full measure when engrossed in the interpretation of the music in hand. As memory runs back over former years no conductor comes to mind who was as demonstrative as Rabaud save possibly Emil Paur. But the present leader's energy is full of meaning and is expressive of his whole-heartedness and interest in his work. His beat is sure and his every motion denotes decision.

M. Rabaud is also an orchestral composer of international reputation, several of his more important works having been played in this country.

The evening's soloist was Merle Alcock, a young contralto, who scored a distinct success. Handel's air from the opera "Serse" known as the "Largo," and the aria "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's opera "Don Carlos" were her numbers. The entire programme follows:

Beethoven..Symphonoy in A-major, No. 7, Op. 92
Poco Sostenuto; Vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto: Presto meno assai.
Allegro con brio.
Handel..Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera "Serse."
Saint-Saens..."La Jeunesse d'Hercule" ("The Youth of Hercules"), Symphonic Poem No. 4, Op. 50.
Verdi..Aria, "O Don Fatale," from the opera "Don Carlos."
Weber.....Overture to "Euryanthe"

In Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 Monsieur Rabaud gave an electrifying performance. There was a breadth of conception and a masterful handling of his forces that at once proclaimed him a leader of rare force and intelligence. The movements, moulded in musical symmetry, culminated in a thrilling performance of the final "Allegro."

A comparison of the old orchestra with the new is inevitable and is, of course, a subject of much interest. If, through numerous changes in personnel, the purely technical finish which characterized the performances of former seasons is lacking, it is scarcely evident to the most critical ear; and in spirit and enthusiasm the present membership is a decided improvement.

A matter which has not escaped the attention of regular attendants at former symphony concerts is what might be called the self-satisfied and superior attitude disagreeably shown by certain members of the orchestra, particularly in the string section, before the change in personnel. Happily those egotistical members will no longer be seen or heard. In contrast to this the present players are entirely bound up in their work and they are a pleasure to the eye as well as the ear.

Merle Alcock sang for the first time here and proved to be an artist with an unusually fine voice. Strong and vibrant, it is of beautiful quality and carries above full orchestra. Possessed of much personal charm, her sustained singing of the well-known "Largo" and the clean-cut performance of the Verdi aria brought her an ovation. The velvet of youth is on her voice, which is splendidly "placed," and she possesses artistic qualities of a high order. After her final number she was obliged to return again and again to acknowledge applause. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" was brilliantly played by the orchestra for the concert's closing number.

PROVIDENCE NEWS, NOVEMBER 16,

FREDERIC FRADKIN

Brilliant Concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Gives First of Series of Concerts at Infantry Hall Next Tuesday Evening.

BULLETIN, PROVIDENCE, NOVEMBER 14.

HENRI RABAUD, NEW DIRECTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Conductor Who is Prominent as Composer and Holds High Place Among French Orchestral Leaders Will Make His First Appearance in Providence at the Concert Next Tuesday Night in Infantry Hall.

Henri Rabaud's first appearance in this city as the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday evening should provide an incentive for all music lovers to attend the concert in Infantry Hall.

The elimination of all German and Austrian musicians from the famous orchestra, thereby removing the objectionable features which aroused public disapproval and its present constitution of musicians free from the taint of disloyalty, should make certain the return of the orchestra to the niche in popular esteem which it enjoyed for so long a period prior to the war.

Henri Rabaud, the new director, has for 20 years been one of the most distinguished figures in French music, standing in the first rank among French conductors and being an eminent composer as well. Now in his 54th year, he won the Grand Prix de Rome at the Paris Conservatoire in 1894 and for seven years he has been the principal conductor at the Grand Opera, Paris, under Messager, the leader of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, which recently appeared in this city. In addition M. Rabaud has conducted symphony concerts in Rome, Vienna and other cities, so that his continental reputation is firmly established.

As a composer he has to his credit two symphonies, a symphonic poem, two oratorios and three operas. His opera, "Marouf," was one of the novelties produced at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, last season.

HENRI RABAUD CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TRIBUNE, PROVIDENCE, R. I., FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1918.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT ON TUESDAY NIGH

Henri Rabaud to Conduc Gallicized Orchestra at Infantry Hall

With a personnel that has under gone great change in the past si months, with a conductor who wi be making then his fourth appear ance in America, and with a solois of rare charm and beauty of voice the Boston Symphony Orchestra re turns to Providence for the first o its series of concerts in Infantry Hal next Tuesday evening, Novembe 19th, under conditions that not onl arouse the keenest interest amon the musical public of Providence but give promise of great bril liancy.

The past is past and it is well t forget the unfortunate occurrences o a year ago. None the less, the epi sode in Providence has had a deep effect on the orchestra, and if all the reports are correct, despite the fact that it has had changes in its personnel amounting to one quarter of the number, the orchestra is finer and better this year than it ever has been before.

Naturally Mr. Rabaud, who is the new conductor, will hold the centre of the stage figuratively as well as literally. Any man appointed to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must naturally attract wide attention, for it is the most important post of its kind in the world—the greatest position a conductor can fill. Mr. Rabaud has come to America, bringing with him an enviable reputation, not only as a conductor but as a composer. He is in the foremost rank of French musicians, and much is expected of him here.

Mme. Alcock Soloist

Madame Alcock, the soloist, is an artist of very unusual quality who will be new to the majority of the patrons of the concerts. The programme begins with the "Eroica" of Beethoven. Mr. Rabaud believes in the performance of the great classics, and certainly he could not choose a more appropriate work for performance at this time than the great 3rd Symphony of the master of masters. The other numbers will be Saint Saens' Symphonic Poem "The Youth of Hercules" and Weber's Overture "Euryanthe."

Madame Alcock will sing as her first number the air from Handel's "Xerxes," best known to the public as the Largo. As her second number she will sing the familiar air from "Samson and Delila," "My Heart At Thy Dear Voice."

HERALD DECEMBER 8,

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Ask almost any student of the organ to describe the French school, and he will say, "First there was Lemmens and Cesar Franck, then there was Guilmant; now there is Bonnet." He will probably go on to speak, particularly if he has studied in Paris, of the Boston Symphony concerts, this week, at which Mr. Bonnet will play the symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra by Guilmant. Mr. Bonnet will introduce his own cadenza.

There stand also on the program the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven and Frederick Converse's musical version of Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

SUN,

m

BALTIMORE, M

dress

te

To Omit Beethoven Symphony.

Of the four orchestral concerts so far played in Baltimore this season, three having included Beethoven symphonies, word has come from Boston of a decision to omit the seventh symphony of Beethoven at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Theatre tomorrow evening. In its stead will be played as the first number Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and as second number preceding the intermission Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony.

EVENING GLOBE

ess: New York City

HENRI RABAUD

Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL NOVEMBER 20

BOSTON SYMPHONY GETS BIG OVATION

Great Welcome Extended to New Americanized Organization.

TRIBUTE PAID TO RABAUD

Audience Goes Wild as Reorganized Orchestra, with Teutonic Taint Removed, Plays "The Star Spangled Banner," Which Dr. Muck Refused to Include in Programme

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, its former Teutonic taint removed, opened its 38th season at Infantry Hall here last evening, with a rendition of "The Star Spangled Banner," which Dr. Karl Muck, its former leader, refused to play in this city a year ago, declaring it was unfit for a symphony programme, that brought for the great musical organization the biggest ovation it has ever received here. Henri Rabaud, the French leader, who replaced Dr. Muck when he resigned and was interned as a dangerous alien enemy, was given a welcome that was truly marvellous, and when, at the end of the first symphony, he was recalled time and time again, he finally brought the orchestra to its feet to share with him in the tribute that had been paid by Providence music lovers, the audience went wild.

The magnificent playing of the national anthem last night was a fitting reply to the objections raised by the former German leader. It was made evident from the start that the orchestra has not suffered from the ousting of the objectionable Prussian element headed by Dr. Muck. After the initial concert last season, music lovers of the city declined to continue their support as long as Dr. Muck headed the organization, and the remainder of the concerts scheduled for the season were cancelled. This season Providence welcomes back an American Boston Symphony Orchestra, and last evening's demonstration clearly shows that, with its new leader, the organization has again won the hearts of its former admirers here.

New faces were numerous in the ranks, but here and there could be seen the features of those so familiar in the days that are gone. Chief among the newcomers is Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster.

The orchestra came with its full complement of men, following the custom established two seasons ago.

An infusion of new blood has given added strength and vigor to the organization and the results obtained last evening under Conductor Rabaud showed that in this reorganized, Americanized orchestra we have one capable of upholding the best traditions of America's most famous orchestral body. Interest in the new conductor was naturally keen.

If there were any in the audience who had formed an opinion of Monsieur Rabaud's personality from his mild looking pictures in the daily press they received a sudden and pleasant awakening. The noted Frenchman approaches his task with enthusiasm and energy and succeeds admirably in infusing a similar spirit into his men. He is fairly tall, of wiry build and his hair and beard are slightly tinged with gray. Although in middle life he possesses the spirit of youth and displays it in full measure when engrossed in the interpretation of the music in hand. As memory runs back over former years no conductor comes to mind who was as demonstrative as Rabaud save possibly Emil Paur. But the present leader's energy is full of meaning and is expressive of his whole-heartedness and interest in his work. His beat is sure and his every motion denotes decision.

M. Rabaud is also an orchestral composer of international reputation, several of his more important works having been played in this country.

The evening's soloist was Merle Alcock, a young contralto, who scored a distinct success. Handel's air from the opera "Serse" known as the "Largo," and the aria "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's opera "Don Carlos" were her numbers. The entire programme follows:

Beethoven..Symphonoy in A major, No. 7, Op. 92
Poco Sostenuto; Vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto; Presto meno assai.
Allegro con brio.
Handel..Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera "Serse."
Saint-Saens..."La Jeunesse d'Hercule" ("The Youth of Hercules"), Symphonic Poem No. 4, Op. 50.
Verdi..Aria, "O Don Fatale," from the opera "Don Carlos."
Weber.....Overture to "Euryanthe."

In Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 Monsieur Rabaud gave an electrifying performance. There was a breadth of conception and a masterful handling of his forces that at once proclaimed him a leader of rare force and intelligence. The movements, moulded in musical symmetry, culminated in a thrilling performance of the final "Allegro."

A comparison of the old orchestra with the new is inevitable and is, of course, a subject of much interest. If, through numerous changes in personnel, the purely technical finish which characterized the performances of former seasons is lacking, it is scarcely evident to the most critical ear; and in spirit and enthusiasm the present membership is a decided improvement.

A matter which has not escaped the attention of regular attendants at former symphony concerts is what might be called the self-satisfied and superior attitude disagreeably shown by certain members of the orchestra, particularly in the string section, before the change in personnel. Happily those egotistical members will no longer be seen or heard. In contrast to this the present players are entirely bound up in their work and they are a pleasure to the eye as well as the ear.

Merle Alcock sang for the first time here and proved to be an artist with an unusually fine voice. Strong and vibrant, it is of beautiful quality and carries above full orchestra. Possessed of much personal charm, her sustained singing of the well-known "Largo" and the clean-cut performance of the Verdi aria brought her an ovation. The velvet of youth is on her voice, which is splendidly "placed," and she possesses artistic qualities of a high order. After her final number she was obliged to return again and again to acknowledge applause. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" was brilliantly played by the orchestra for the concert's closing number.

FREDERIC FRADKIN

Brilliant Concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Gives First of Series of Concerts at Infantry Hall Next Tuesday Evening.

BULLETIN, PROVIDENCE, NOVEMBER 14.

HENRI RABAUD, NEW DIRECTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Conductor Who is Prominent as Composer and Holds High Place Among French Orchestral Leaders Will Make His First Appearance in Providence at the Concert Next Tuesday Night in Infantry Hall.

Henri Rabaud's first appearance in this city as the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday evening should provide an incentive for all music lovers to attend the concert in Infantry Hall.

The elimination of all German and Austrian musicians from the famous orchestra, thereby removing the objectionable features which aroused public disapproval and its present constitution of musicians free from the taint of disloyalty, should make certain the return of the orchestra to the niche in popular esteem which it enjoyed for so long a period prior to the war.

Henri Rabaud, the new director, has for 20 years been one of the most distinguished figures in French music, standing in the first rank among French conductors and being an eminent composer as well. Now in his 54th year, he won the Grand Prix de Rome at the Paris Conservatoire in 1894 and for seven years he has been the principal conductor at the Grand Opera, Paris, under Messager, the leader of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, which recently appeared in this city. In addition M. Rabaud has conducted symphony concerts in Rome, Vienna and other cities, so that his continental reputation is firmly established.

As a composer he has to his credit two symphonies, a symphonic poem, two oratorios and three operas. His opera, "Marouf," was one of the novelties produced at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, last season.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT ON TUESDAY NIGH'

Henri Rabaud to Conduc Gallicized Orchestra at Infantry Hall

With a personnel that has undergone great change in the past si months, with a conductor who wi be making then his fourth appeaa ance in America, and with a soloist of rare charm and beauty of voice the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to Providence for the first c its series of concerts in Infantry Hai next Tuesday evening, Novemb 19th, under conditions that not on arouse the keenest interest amo the musical public of Providence but give promise of great brilliance.

The past is past and it is well t forget the unfortunate occurrences of a year ago. None the less, the episode in Providence has had a deep effect on the orchestra, and if all the reports are correct, despite the fact that it has had changes in its personnel amounting to one quarter of the number, the orchestra is finer and better this year than it ever has been before.

Naturally Mr. Rabaud, who is the new conductor, will hold the centre of the stage figuratively as well as literally. Any man appointed to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must naturally attract wide attention, for it is the most important post of its kind in the world—the greatest position a conductor can fill. Mr. Rabaud has come to America, bringing with him an enviable reputation, not only as a conductor but as a composer. He is in the foremost rank of French musicians, and much is expected of him here.

Mme. Alcock Soloist

Madame Alcock, the soloist, is an artist of very unusual quality who will be new to the majority of the patrons of the concerts. The programme begins with the "Eroica" of Beethoven. Mr. Rabaud believes in the performance of the great classics, and certainly he could not choose a more appropriate work for performance at this time than the great 3rd Symphony of the master of masters. The other numbers will be Saint Saens' Symphonic Poem "The Youth of Hercules" and Weber's Overture "Euryanthe."

Madame Alcock will sing as her first number the air from Handel's "Xerxes," best known to the public as the Largo. As her second number she will sing the familiar air from "Samson and Delila," "My Heart At Thy Dear Voice."

HERALD DECEMBER 8.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Ask almost any student of the organ to describe the French school, and he will say, "First there was Lemmens and Cesar Franck, then there was Guilmant; now there is Bonnet." He will probably go on to speak, particularly if he has studied in Paris, of the Boston Symphony concerts, this week, at which Mr. Bonnet will play the symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra by Guilmant. Mr. Bonnet will introduce his own cadenza.

There stand also on the program the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven and Frederick Converse's musical version of Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

SOUL

m dress

te

To Omit Beethoven Symphony.

Of the four orchestral concerts so far played in Baltimore this season, three having included Beethoven symphonies, word has come from Boston of a decision to omit the seventh symphony of Beethoven at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Theatre tomorrow evening. In its stead will be played as the first number Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and as second number preceding the intermission Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony.

EVENING GLOBE

ess: New York City

HENRI RABAUD CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD

Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL NOVEMBER 20

BOSTON SYMPHONY GETS BIG OVATION

Great Welcome Extended to New Americanized Organization.

TRIBUTE PAID TO RABAUD

Audience Goes Wild as Reorganized Orchestra, with Teutonic Taint Removed, Plays "The Star Spangled Banner," Which Dr. Muck Refused to Include in Programme

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, its former Teutonic taint removed, opened its 38th season at Infantry Hall here last evening, with a rendition of "The Star Spangled Banner," which Dr. Karl Muck, its former leader, refused to play in this city a year ago, declaring it was unfit for a symphony programme, that brought for the great musical organization the biggest ovation it has ever received here. Henri Rabaud, the French leader, who replaced Dr. Muck when he resigned and was interned as a dangerous alien enemy, was given a welcome that was truly marvellous, and when, at the end of the first symphony, he was recalled time and time again, he finally brought the orchestra to its feet to share with him in the tribute that had been paid by Providence music lovers, the audience went wild.

The magnificent playing of the national anthem last night was a fitting reply to the objections raised by the former German leader. It was made evident from the start that the orchestra has not suffered from the ousting of the objectionable Prussian element headed by Dr. Muck. After the initial concert last season, music lovers of the city declined to continue their support as long as Dr. Muck headed the organization, and the remainder of the concerts scheduled for the season were cancelled. This season Providence welcomes back an American Boston Symphony Orchestra, and last evening's demonstration clearly shows that, with its new leader, the organization has again won the hearts of its former admirers here.

New faces were numerous in the ranks, but here and there could be seen the features of those so familiar in the days that are gone. Chief among the newcomers is Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster.

The orchestra came with its full complement of men, following the custom established two seasons ago.

An infusion of new blood has given added strength and vigor to the organization and the results obtained last evening under Conductor Rabaud showed that in this reorganized, Americanized orchestra we have one capable of upholding the best traditions of America's most famous orchestral body. Interest in the new conductor was naturally keen.

If there were any in the audience who had formed an opinion of Monsieur Rabaud's personality from his mild looking pictures in the daily press they received a sudden and pleasant awakening. The noted Frenchman approaches his task with enthusiasm and energy and succeeds admirably in infusing a similar spirit into his men. He is fairly tall, of wiry build and his hair and beard are slightly tinged with gray. Although in middle life he possesses the spirit of youth and displays it in full measure when engrossed in the interpretation of the music in hand. As memory runs back over former years no conductor comes to mind who was as demonstrative as Rabaud save possibly Emil Paur. But the present leader's energy is full of meaning and is expressive of his whole-heartedness and interest in his work. His beat is sure and his every motion denotes decision.

M. Rabaud is also an orchestral composer of international reputation, several of his more important works having been played in this country.

The evening's soloist was Merle Alcock, a young contralto, who scored a distinct success. Handel's air from the opera "Serse" known as the "Largo" and the aria "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's opera "Don Carlos" were her numbers. The entire programme follows:

Beethoven...Symphony in E flat, No. 3, Op. 82
Poco Sostenuto; Vivace
Allegretto.
Presto; Presto meno assai
Allegro con fuoco
Handel...Air, "Ombra mai fu" from the opera "Serse."
Saint-Saens...."La Jeunesse d'Hercule" (The Youth of Hercules), Symphonic Poem No. 4, Op. 50
Verdi...Aria, "O Don Fatale" from the opera "Don Carlos"
Weber.....Overture to "Euryanthe"

In Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 Monsieur Rabaud gave an electrifying performance. There was a breadth of conception and a masterly handling of his forces that at once proclaimed him a leader of rare power and intelligence. The movements, rounded in perfect symmetry, culminated in a startling performance of the final "Allegro."

A comparison of the old orchestra with the new is inevitable and is, of course, a subject of much interest. If, through numerous changes in personnel, the purely technical finish which characterized the performances of former seasons is lacking, it is scarcely evident to the most critical ear; and in spirit and enthusiasm the present membership is a decided improvement.

A matter which has not escaped the attention of regular attendants at former symphony concerts is what might be called the self-assured and superior attitude disagreeably shown by certain members of the orchestra, particularly in the string section, before the change in personnel. Happily these unmusical members will no longer be seen or heard. In contrast to this the present players are entirely bound up in their work and they are a pleasure to the eye as well as the ear.

Merle Alcock sang for the first time here and proved to be an artist with an unusually fine voice. Strong and vibrant, it is of beautiful quality and carries above full orchestra. Possessed of much personal charm, her sustained singing of the well-known "Largo" and the clean-cut performance of the Verdi aria brought her an ovation. The velvet of youth is on her voice, which is splendidly "placed," and she possesses artistic qualities of a high order. After her final number she was obliged to return again and again to acknowledge applause. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" was brilliantly played by the orchestra for the concert's closing number.

EVENING GLOBE
ess New York City
MAR - 5

The concertino of John Alden Carpenter will be introduced to New York at the last evening concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday, March 18, with E. Robert Schmitz as the pianist. The other numbers on the programme will be Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The feature of the Boston's final matinée, Saturday, March 20, will be "Seven Symphonic Expressions," entitled "Le Pause del Silenzio," by Malipiero, the revolutionary Italian composer. The orchestra will also play the overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's G minor symphony, and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

TELEPHONE 8860 CHELSEA

Intended for Boston Sym

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

106 110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City

CABLE ADDRESS "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Frederic Fradkin, former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has begun two suits against the orchestra. He seeks $15,000 damages for alleged breach of contract and $100,000 for libel.

Establis 384

Fredric Fradkin, the new concert master of the Symphony, arrived at the Hotel Lenox yesterday, where he will remain until he secures a permanent home. Rehearsals for the 39th season of the orchestra begin tomorrow.

CONDUCTOR NOT SETTLED

"It would be as much of a disaster for me to lose an arm as to lose that violin," remarked Fradkin, as he lovingly caressed the 250-year-old instrument. "I have to pay $500 a year insurance on my pet, but what would I do if I lost it, and how could money ever make up to me it's going? But there is little danger that I shall lose the violin, for I never let it far out of my sight."

Judge Frederic P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, issued the following statement yesterday regarding the conductorship:

"The musical public is entitled to all the information that can be given at the present time regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"It has already been announced that Pierre Monteux will direct the opening concerts of the year. At the time of this announcement it was expected that the name of the permanent conductor would soon be made public. Owing to the entirely abnormal condition of affairs throughout the world, such an announcement is still impossible. On more than one occasion it has taken from four to six weeks to receive answers from cable messages to Europe; but it may and should be said that negotiations are in active progress looking towards the continuance of the orchestra in the coming and following seasons upon precisely the high level which it has maintained throughout its history. Just as soon as dates and names can be given with definiteness, more will be said."

EVENING GLOBE

ess New York City

The concertino of John Alden Carpenter will be introduced to New York at the last evening concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday, March 18, with E. Robert Schmitz as the pianist. The other numbers on the programme will be Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The feature of the Boston's final matinée, Saturday, March 20, will be "Seven Symphonic Expressions," entitled "Le Pause del Silenzio," by Malipiero, the revolutionary Italian composer. The orchestra will also play the overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's G minor symphony, and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

TELEPHONE 8860 CHELSEA

Intended for Boston Sym

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

106 110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City

CABLE ADDRESS
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Frederic Fradkin, former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has begun two suits against the orchestra. He seeks $15,000 damages for alleged breach of contract and $100,000 for libel.

Establis 384

, Fredric Fradkin, the new concert master of the Symphony, arrived at the Hotel Lenox yesterday, where he will remain until he secures a permanent home. Rehearsals for the 39th season of the orchestra begin tomorrow.

CONDUCTOR NOT SETTLED

"It would be as much of a disaster for me to lose an arm as to lose that violin," remarked Fradkin, as he lovingly caressed the 250-year-old instrument. "I have to pay $500 a year insurance on my pet, but what would I do if I lost it, and how could money ever make up to me it's going? But there is little danger that I shall lose the violin, for I never let it far out of my sight."

Judge Frederic P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, issued the following statement yesterday regarding the conductorship:

"The musical public is entitled to all the information that can be given at the present time regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"It has already been announced that Pierre Monteux will direct the opening concerts of the year. At the time of his announcement it was expected that the name of the permanent conductor could soon be made public. Owing to the entirely abnormal condition of affairs throughout the world, such an announcement is still impossible. On more than one occasion it has taken from four to six weeks to receive answers from cable messages to Europe; but it may and should be said that negotiations are in active progress looking towards the continuance of the orchestra in the coming and following seasons upon precisely the high level which has maintained throughout its history. Just as soon as dates and names can be given with definiteness, more will be said."

POST, DECEMBER 8

Bonnet Coming to Symphony

Olin Downes Says Combination of French Organist and Symphony Conductor Rabaud Will Be Musical Treat of the Season.

BY OLIN DOWNES

Ask almost any devout student of the organ to describe the French school, and he will say, "First there was Lemmens and Cesar Franck, then there was Guilmant; now there is Bonnet." He will probably go on to speak, particularly if he has studied in Paris, of the present week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, in which Mr. Rabaud, newly from Paris, will co-operate with Joseph Bonnet himself, also from Paris, and some more distinguished French musicians, round about them, to play the mountainous symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra by Guilmant, also from Paris, and beloved of them all.

This student will take particular delight, upon this occasion, in the unchurchlike chance to watch Bonnet's swift fingers and phenomenal feet, likewise to applaud at will. Question him about Bonnet, and he will remind you that Bonnet is the first pupil of Guilmant, and his successor as organist of the Conservatoire—the most honored post in France. That Bonnet's staccato touch by which he turns out his clean-cut rhythms is known the world over (by organists, at least). That his Bach is incomparable, his erudition huge, and his memory unbelievable—he gave a historical series of 40 recitals at his church of St. Eustache, playing no piece twice, and using never a printed page!

There stands also upon the Symphony programme the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, and Frederick Converse's musical version of Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

Bonnet Carries on Tradition

Following are extracts apropos of Mr. Bonnet's appearance, from an article by Harvey B. Gaul in the Musical Quarterly for July, 1918:

"As every school is created or moulded by leaders, these schools (the French, Italian and German schools of organ music) may be epitomized in the three generic names, Bonnet, Bossi and Karg-Elert.

These men and their respective schools represent . . . freer writing . . . freer form . . . They have brought organ composition nearer to contemporary symphonic writing.

Thanks to them and the generation they overlap, a near future will see the democratized organ elevated to the kingship of the early English and Post-Reformation periods . . .

When Alexandre Guilmant was gathered to Abraham's bosom he left the art of organ playing in France on a higher level than it had ever known before. He also left a score of scholars to carry forward the concepts of organ playing as wrought by Lemmens and Cesar Franck, and developed by Guilmant. Chief among his pupils is Joseph Bonnet. St. Eustache always enjoyed a reputation for fine organ music. Bonnet advanced it. Every American student in Paris spent his time between Widor at St. Sulpice and Bonnet at St. Eustache. The ability to memorize enables him to concentrate on his instrument and his execution. Considering our varied organs, with their different consoles and ununiform action, an organist is almost forced to memorize. There are some organists who spend their leisure time arguing as to the advisability of memorizing programmes. Futile conversation! It is not a matter of advisability, but of sheer ability. Bonnet carries in his mind's eye compositions that range from Clerambault to Cesar Franck, from Martini to Mendelssohn. In his flawless execution, that extends even to highly colored trifles, he overcomes enough difficulties to end all arguments.

Skilled as Bach Interpreter

Bonnet extemporizes felicitously, but he has not the fecundity that characterized Guilmant. His improvisations have more of the Widor style, brilliant, daring and essentially French.

His interpretation of Bach has the clean-cut style that we have come to know as the French method. The French do not play Bach with the exaggerated tempo that Americans employ. They catch the mood of the fugue or toccata; all we catch is a metronome mark.

Bonnet knows the concert organ, and registers for it. Every shade of tonal effect is on his palette, and when he calls for sustained fortissimos, with an occasional sforzando, means specifically that. Furthermore he approves of the crescendo pedal, which some of his English confreres with antediluvian instincts spend so much time decrying.

As a teacher and player—performance over precept—he has been of great aid to his contemporaries of France and America. His style is that of the Lemmens-Guilmant school—cleanliness and vigor, mastered legato and staccato, and above all, exact note values. If there is one thing that the French organist, like the French philosopher, believes in, it is clarity. His thought and his work are absolutely pellucid. His mind does not work in a mysterious way his wonders to perform.

HERALD

New York City

DEC 1 1918

---

tors go nowadays, that is praise, indeed."

"He is," continues Mr. Huneker, "a cerebral conductor. He is sensitive to form. His phrasing reveals not only the large pulsation, but also the articulation of the phrase; yet, he is not petit-maitre, or meticulous. His feeling for nuance rather than undue insistance on color was rather a relief. In this he follows the lead of Paul Verlaine, who celebrated the superiority of nuance over color in a line which might have been written by the pedantic Boileau. And the mere rhetoric of conducting makes little appeal to the new man. In a word a Frenchman, ruled by tact and a fine sense of tonal balance. But cerebral."

Mr. Huneker thought that Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which Mr. Rabaud conducted in Boston, was "academic, not Napoleonic. The mighty paws of the lion were encased in the finest Parisian kid. Neither Beethoven nor the First Consul were among the mourners."

"The Saint-Saens tone-poem, 'Le Rouet d'Omphale,' not so popular as the other three poems, yet of deeper musical significance . . . gave us a better chance than the symphony to gauge the main qualities of the conductor. The weight and dramatic emphasis which were lacking before here were in high relief. More than a moiety of the old plangency of the strings was heard; and the elasticity of attack and release in massed episodes made me sure that the orchestra was ruled by a benign musical influence."

WHAT N. Y. SAID OF RABAUD

Henri Rabaud made his first appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Huneker, reviewing his performance for the Times, made this witty summary of the characteristics of Boston Symphony conductors, past and present: "George Henschel, a singer whose orchestra did not sing; Wilhelm Gericke, a drillmaster of exquisite taste; Arthur Nikisch, a poet plus a prima donna; Emil Paur, a temperament without style; Fiedler, a German; Karl Muck, a stylist without dramatic temperament; Pierre Monteux, French, but not Gallic; Henri Rabaud—a conductor, and, as conduc-

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 1 1918

WASHINGTON POST: DECEMBER 4.

RABAUD PLEASES AS A CONDUCTOR

Boston Symphony Concert Delights Big Audience at the National.

Henri Rabaud made his debut here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. When the concert closed he had completely won the capacity audience which greeted him. M. Rabaud is a program maker of keen appreciation. He chose three distinct schools, the German, French and Russian. His choice for the German was not a happy one, the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven, No. 3, in E flat major, which is frequently tiresome and noisy and gruesome in the funeral march movement. Each movement, however, was given with the proper atmospheric appreciation and showed an awakened orchestra, alive and emotional. The Symphonic Poem, No. 4, opus 50, of Saint Saens, was an exquisite bit. Rimsky-Korsakoff was chosen to represent the Russian school, through the medium of his Caprice on Spanish Themes, a masterpiece of orchestration performed in a masterly fashion. The audience showed its unbounded approval of conductor and players by remaining in their seats to recall the former time and time again. There was no soloist. M. Rabaud opened the concert with the playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner," which probably won his audience substantially, for it was a truly worthy performance of it.

CITIZEN

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Henri Rabaud's First Concerts Here; Much Other Music To Be Heard This Week

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play on Thursday and Saturday Under New Conductor.

New York will become acquainted with Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this week. He will direct that organization for the first time in this city in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night. His second appearance will be in the same auditorium on Saturday afternoon.

A symphony stands at the head of each concert—for Thursday evening Beethoven's "Eroica," and on Saturday afternoon Mozart's "Jupiter." The remainder of the Thursday programme is filled by Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice Espagnola," Borodin's Second Symphony will be played on Saturday, as will "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the brilliant scherzo by the conductor's confrère, Dukas, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

Mr. Rabaud's father, grandfather and grandaunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rome in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music, conducted at the Paris Grand Opera, the Opera Comique, the Conservatoire and the Laoureux concerts. He has several compositions to his credit of which the best known in this country are his Second Symphony and the opera "Marouf."

OPERA CALEND

MONDAY.—"Le F

Mmes. Muzio, Hong, highly clever, Messrs. Caruso, scoring convinced he was a composer

WEDNESDAY.—" (a rare occurrence Farrar and reatest of conductors). Diaz and Co reorganized and more

THURSDA inguished orchestra of with Mme

Messrs. s equally established his De Segur a conductor.

he comes to Philadelphia with

FRIDAY.—than a Boston precedent to his rar a has long been known as one Scott rst conductors of Paris at the the "Opera Comique," also the SATUR reux," and "Conservatoire" con- wit "Marouf" is but one of his suc- Me ful works. His Second Symphony, in ticular, has been performed in Phil- re elphia.

TO-M Symphony of Beethoven, the Sev- Bath, fittingly opens his concert. "Who is so foolish as to confuse Mozart, Beethoven and Haydn with the spirit of Prussianism?" said Mr. Rabaud. "You are giving the 'Huns' too much credit.". In this symphony his audience will be able to pass upon his reputation as a close, respectful and deeply appreciative reader of Beethoven's scores. Borodin's Second Symphony will test his aptitude for Russian colorings, to which as a composer he is indebted; and under Duka's Scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" he will endure the test of one of the most splendid, intricate and keen-witted "tours de force" of modern France.

* * *

on. attested,

Friday—N. Y. Symphony Society Sat.

An important event will be the appearance of Josef Hofmann with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Mr. Hofmann's choice is the Concerto of Chopin in E minor.

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the orchestra, will make his first appearance in Brooklyn. Of musical parentage and of early academic attainments he has ranked with the first conductors of Paris at opera and concert. He has also been a prolific composer. His Second Symphony has often been performed in this country, and the piquant opera, "Marouf," is well known at the Metropoloitan Opera. By a coincidence this opera will be presented here Saturday evening.

The programme opens fittingly with a classic, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, wherein Brooklyn may pass upon the judgment of Boston that Mr. Rabaud's is a martial, vigorous and keen-visioned reading. In addition to the Chopin Concerto, there will be the symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," by the conductor's compatriot, Saint-Saens.

ADVERTISER AND AMERICAN, DECEMBER 8, 58

BONNET SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At Symphony Hall, on Friday or Saturday next, Mr. Rabaud, newly from Paris, will co-operate with Joseph Bonnet, the pre-eminent organist of Paris, and some distinguished Parisian wood-wind and string players, round about them, to play the symphony in D minor by Guilmant, Bonnet's Parisian predecessor and master. At the honored post of organist at the Paris Conservatoire, which he inherited from his master, Guilmant, Bonnet worthily carries on the great tradition of his school and enlarges upon it. He is more brilliant than Guilmant, has gone further in the color effects which the finest mechanisms have made possible; has thrown himself more completely into orchestral concerts. There stands also upon the symphony program the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, and Frederick Converse's musical version of Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

GEBHARD RECITAL

Heinrich Gebhard ma relied upon to of

n NEWS

ress: Baltimore, Md.

AMERICAN

New York City.

Boston Symphony Returns with Henri Rabaud as Conductor

By MAX SMITH.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA returned to New York last night for its second pair of concerts, with Henri Rabaud gripping the baton, which before his belated arrival from France had been entrusted temporarily to his distinguished compatriot, Pierre Monteux.

It was the first time that Monsieur Rabaud had been seen here in public, and, of course, his advent as leader of the Hub's famous band aroused a great deal of interest. Few persons, to be sure, anticipated any revelations of genius—and that was well, perhaps, for nothing can work greater harm than extravagant expectations. But most of us knew Rabaud as the composer of "Marouf," and what was more natural than that we should be curious to behold the creator of that charming work in flesh and blood?

Now, it so happens that Monsieur Rabaud cannot boast much flesh. Tall to the eye as he mounted the platform, square-shouldered, thin, almost emaciated, there seemed to be little but skin on his bones. In fact, one could hardly believe that this man of lanky figure and aquiline profile, with iron-gray beard and age-tonsured head, was only forty-four years old, as Philip Hale's programme notes stated. Singularly like the Viennese Gericke in appearance, he looked as if he had passed safely the fifty-year mark.

But it soon became apparent that despite his gaunt frame Monsieur still has good red blood in his veins. A volcanic temperament, to be sure, he does not possess. Scholarly in his proclivities, prone to give close attention to details, he always has perfect control of himself. But there is a nervous energy in his beat, and he wields the directorial stick with vigor and aplomb. Nor does he lack emotional warmth and impulse, though he always keeps safely within the bounds of good taste.

After an introductory performance of "The Star Spangled Banner," which he conducted as conscientiously as any work on the programme, Monsieur Rabaud was compelled to bow repeatedly in response to prolonged applause. As soon as the noise had subsided he launched vigorously into a performance of Beethoven's "Eroica." His beat was broad, incisive, authoritative—yet never ostentatious, never obtrusive. His gestures were somewhat angular and stiff, but not pedantic and stilted.

The calibre of Monsieur Rabaud's musicianship was established at the very outset. Though the score rested on the desk before him, as if modesty forbade the conductor to parade his memory, he was absolutely independent of the printed page. And he gave a masterly reading of the symphony, a reading in which every voice was exposed in plastic relief, a reading exquisitely elaborated, exquisitely balanced, exquisitely shaded, but as imposing in its broad outlines as it was finely studied in its detail.

Not once did Monsieur Rabaud lose his grip of the instrument under his hand. The dynamic life that coursed through the arteries of the music, rising and falling incessantly; the rhythmical throb, firm, yet not rigid, that kept it in constant movement, always preserving the symmetry and proportions of the picture, were of his making.

Power, pathos, dramatic verve, vivacity were conspicuous in this performance of the "Eroica." But never did Monsieur Rabaud offend by exaggeration. And never did he permit the proportions of Beethoven's musical scheme to be disturbed by rhetorical emphasis.

Of the second number on his programme, Saint-Jaens's rarely heard "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," the new conductor gave a finely euphonious performance. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" brought the evening to a brilliant close. But the feature of the concert was Beethoven's symphony as conducted by a Frenchman.

Monsieur Rabaud, by the way, has accepted the invitation of the Metropolitan Opera Company to hear a performance of his "Marouf" tomorrow night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. That is an item of news which might well attract a large contingent of Manhattanites into the transpontine borough. Some one presumably will discover the composer in the theatre and make him the object of an ovation, perhaps even induce him to join the singers on the stage.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Wednesday night and a joint recital by Edna Dunham Willard, soprano, and Maurice Dambois, cellist, at the Peabody Friday afternoon, constitute the principal local musical offerings for the week.

Other events to take place between now and mid-December are the Belgian relief concert, under the direction of Bart Wirtz, at Albaugh's Theater on December 7; a recital by Margaret Cummins Rabold, soprano, and Clara Ascherfeld, pianist, at the Hotel Belvedere on December 12; the Philadelphia Orchestra's second lyric concert, on December 9; a recital by Max Rosen, one of the much-talked-of young violinists, who has not yet been heard here, at the Peabody on December 13; the Baltimore Symphony's second concert of its fourth season, on December 15, and the New York Symphony's second concert on December 16.

M. Rabaud's Debut.

The Boston Symphony's concert will be notable as marking the Baltimore debut of the orchestra's new conductor, Henri Rabaud. The event in itself is regarded of sufficient import to warrant the elimination of a soloist. At each of the remaining concerts by this organization solo numbers will be presented, the artists engaged being Mme. Melba, Frederick Fradkin, the new concert master, and Arthur Rubinstein, pianist.

That M. Rabaud is a distinguished Frenchman, I feel sure, is alone sufficient to assure him a hearty welcome to Baltimore, but when it is also considered that he is ranked with the leading composers and directors of the day and holds a position of worldwide eminence, it is easy to believe he will be given a reception that will warm his heart, no matter what impression may later be created by his work in directing the orchestra.

M. Rabaud did not assume the leadership of the Boston Symphony until its season was several weeks old, and when he finally made his American debut in Boston he was enthusiastically greeted.

The Lyric Program.

When he appears here for the first time, M. Rabaud will proceed immediately to introduce what is locally a daring violation of custom—he will present two symphonies on the same program.

There is this for the comfort of those docile men who trapse to symphony concerts to do credit to their wives: The symphonic works will not be consecutive. A modern French work, guaranteed to dispel the nods and the blinks (Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier") will come in between.

The program will be opened with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the one which was read so beautifully under Mr. Damrosch's direction at the New York Symphony's concert last Monday. It does seem unfortunate that there cannot be some arrangement between conductors whereby repetitions in such quick succession might be avoided. This, however, is impossible, so that there is nothing to do but make the best of the opportunities for studying the contrasts of execution and interpretation that are offered.

The evening will be closed with Borodin's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, a work that has been heard here infrequently enough to be classed as a novelty.

Peabody's Dual Program.

Edna Dunham Willard will present a very interesting group of songs at her appearance with Maurice Dambois next Friday afternoon. Mrs. Willard, who is the wife of Alfred R. Willard, organist and choir director at Old St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church, is a charming artist, possessing not only a lovely voice, but the agreeable, winning personality that is such a valuable asset on the recital stage.

The things she has selected for her Peabody program comprise a recitative and aria from Saccini's "Oedipe a Colone," Paradies' "Quel Ruscelletto," Parelli's "Odorava l'April," an aria by Bach, Franck's exquisite "Les Cloches du Soir," Debussy's "Green," Szulc's "Claire de Lune," Loechlin's "Si tu le Veux," Carpenter's "Silhouettes," Cyril Scott's "The Unforeseen" and Ward Stephens' "Summer Time."

Mr. Dambois, who made a favorable impression on his first Baltimore appearance, will play Boellman's "Variations Symphoniques," Glazounow's "Serenade Espagnole," an andante by Haydn and three of his own works, "Vielle Chanson," "Chanson Douce" and "Dance."

POST, DECEMBER 3,

Bonnet Coming to Symphony

Olin Downes Says Combination of French Organist and Symphony Conductor Rabaud Will Be Musical Treat of the Season.

BY OLIN DOWNES

Ask almost any devout student of the organ to describe the French school, and he will say, "First there was Lemmens and Cesar Franck, then there was Guilmant; now there is Bonnet." He will probably go on to speak, particularly if he has studied in Paris, of the present week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, in which Mr. Rabaud, newly from Paris, will co-operate with Joseph Bonnet himself, also from Paris, and some more distinguished French musicians, round about them, to play the mountainous symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra by Guilmant, also from Paris, and beloved of them all.

This student will take particular delight, upon this occasion, in the unchurchlike chance to watch Bonnet's swift fingers and phenomenal feet, likewise to applaud at will. Question him about Bonnet, and he will remind you that Bonnet is the first pupil of Guilmant, and his successor as organist of the Conservatoire—the most honored post in France. That Bonnet's staccato touch by which he turns out his clean-cut rhythms is known the world over (by organists, at least). That his Bach is incomparable, his erudition huge, and his memory unbelievable—he gave a historical series of 40 recitals at his church of St. Eustache, playing no piece twice, and using never a printed page!

There stands also upon the Symphony programme the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, and Frederick Converse's musical version of Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

Bonnet Carries on Tradition

Following are extracts apropos of Mr. Bonnet's appearance, from an article by Harvey B. Gaul in the Musical Quarterly for July, 1918:

"As every school is created or moulded by leaders, these schools (the French, Italian and German schools of organ music) may be epitomized in the three generic names, Bonnet, Bossi and Karg-Elert.

These men and their respective schools represent . . . freer writing . . . freer form . . . They have brought organ composition nearer to contemporary symphonic writing.

Thanks to them and the generation they overlap, a near future will see the democratized organ elevated to the kingship of the early English and Post-Reformation periods . . .

When Alexandre Guilmant was gathered to Abraham's bosom he left the art of organ playing in France on a higher level than it had ever known before. He also left a score of scholars to carry forward the concepts of organ playing as wrought by Lemmens and Cesar Franck, and developed by Guilmant. Chief among his pupils is Joseph Bonnet. St. Eustache always enjoyed a reputation for fine organ music. Bonnet advanced it. Every American student in Paris spent his time between Widor at St. Sulpice and Bonnet at St. Eustache. The ability to memorize enables him to concentrate on his instrument and his execution. Considering our varied organs, with their different consoles and ununiform action, an organist is almost forced to memorize. There are some organists who spend their leisure time arguing as to the advisability of memorizing programmes. Futile conversation! It is not a matter of advisability, but of sheer ability. Bonnet carries in his mind's eye compositions that range from Clerambault to Cesar Franck, from Martini to Mendelssohn. In his flawless execution, that extends even to highly colored trifles, he overcomes enough difficulties to end all arguments.

Skilled as Bach Interpreter

Bonnet extemporizes felicitously, but he has not the fecundity that characterized Guilmant. His improvisations have more of the Widor style, brilliant, daring and essentially French.

His interpretation of Bach has the clean-cut style that we have come to know as the French method. The French do not play Bach with the exaggerated tempo that Americans employ. They catch the mood of the fugue or toccata; all we catch is a metronome mark.

Bonnet knows the concert organ, and registers for it. Every shade of tonal effect is on his palette, and when he calls for sustained fortissimos, with an occasional sforzando, means specifically that. Furthermore he approves of the crescendo pedal, which some of his English confreres with antediluvian instincts spend so much time decrying.

As a teacher and player—performance over precept—he has been of great aid to his contemporaries of France and America. His style is that of the Lemmens-Guilmant school—cleanliness and vigor, mastered legato and staccato, and above all, exact note values. If there is one thing that the French organist, like the French philosopher, believes in, it is clarity. His thought and his work are absolutely pellucid. His mind does not work in a mysterious way his wonders to perform.

WHAT N. Y. SAID OF RABAUD

Henri Rabaud made his first appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Huneker, reviewing his performance for the Times, made this witty summary of the characteristics of Boston Symphony conductors, past and present: "George Henschel, a singer whose orchestra did not sing; Wilhelm Gericke, a drillmaster of exquisite taste; Arthur Nikisch, a poet plus a prima donna; Emil Paur, a temperament without style; Fiedler, a German; Karl Muck, a stylist without dramatic temperament; Pierre Monteux, French, but not Gallic; Henri Rabaud—a conductor, and, as conductors go nowadays, that is praise, indeed."

"He is," continues Mr. Huneker, "a cerebral conductor. He is sensitive to form. His phrasing reveals not only the large pulsation, but also the articulation of the phrase; yet, he is not petit-maitre, or meticulous. His feeling for nuance rather than undue insistance on color was rather a relief. In this he follows the lead of Paul Verlaine, who celebrated the superiority of nuance over color in a line which might have been written by the pedantic Boileau. And the mere rhetoric of conducting makes little appeal to the new man. In a word a Frenchman, ruled by tact and a fine sense of tonal balance. But cerebral."

Mr. Huneker thought that Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which Mr. Rabaud conducted in Boston, was "academic, not Napoleonic. The mighty paws of the lion were encased in the finest Parisian kid. Neither Beethoven nor the First Consul were among the mourners."

"The Saint-Saens tone-poem, 'Le Rouet d'Omphale,' not so popular as the other three poems, yet of deeper musical significance . . . gave us a better chance than the symphony to gauge the main qualities of the conductor. The weight and dramatic emphasis which were lacking before here were in high relief. More than a moiety of the old plangency of the strings was heard; and the elasticity of attack and release in massed episodes made me sure that the orchestra was ruled by a benign musical influence."

WASHINGTON POST: DECEMBER 4,

RABAUD PLEASES AS A CONDUCTOR

Boston Symphony Concert Delights Big Audience at the National.

Henri Rabaud made his debut here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. When the concert ciosed he had completely won the capacity audience which greeted him. M. Rabaud is a program maker of keen appreciation. He chose three distinct schools, the German, French and Russian. His choice for the German was not a happy one, the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven, No. 3, in E flat major, which is frequently tiresome and noisy and gruesome in the funeral march movement. Each movement, however, was given with the proper atmospheric appreciation and showed an awakened orchestra, alive and emotional. The Symphonic Poem, No. 4, opus 50, of Saint Saens, was an exquisite bit. Rimsky-Korsakoff was chosen to represent the Russian school, through the medium of his Caprice on Spanish Themes, a masterpiece of orchestration performed in a masterly fashion. The audience showed its unbounded approval of conductor and players by remaining in their seats to recall the former time and time again. There was no soloist. M. Rabaud opened the concert with the playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner," which probably won his audience substantially, for it was a truly worthy performance of it.

K. D.

HERALD
New York City
DEC 1 1918

rts Here
ard This

Young B'Hands nesast are Hoffman

SHE

Boston S been brought Miss Life Life
ome Again," are amo ame on Thursday created by the erly
New Laughlin, who story in which a v folk. Several o

New York will becoy are the heroes
Henri Rabaud, the new, as in the case
Boston Symphony Orchhal, a boyhood
He will direct that orgas described in first time in this city in Mr. Miller Thursday night. His secos the open-will be in the same auditorie and had day afternoon.

If on the
A symphony stands at the hw Clark.
concert—for Thursday evening every "Eroica," and on Saturday s Will Mozart's "Jupiter." The remaing his Thursday programme is filled Lykins
Saens' symphonic poem, "The ory."
Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakof Mur-price Espagnola," Borodin's Secon mi-phony will be played on Saturday, the
"The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the b in scherzo by the conductor's conc Dukas, and Weber's overture to "Juryanthe."

Mr. Rabaud's father, grandfather and grandaunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rome in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music, conducted at the Paris Grand Opera, the Opera
Comique, the Conservatoire and the Lamoureux concerts. He has several compositions to his credit of which the best known in this country are his Second Symphony and the opera "Marouf."

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 1 1918

Coming Events

As circumstances have it, these are "Rabaud days" for Philadelphia. Recently Henri Rabaud's ability as a composer was made known in the Oriental opera "Marouf," and tomorrow evening he will appear in person in the Academy of Music as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert of the season.

In "Marouf," as many have attested, his directly fascinating, highly clever, and quite modern scoring convinced Philadelphia that he was a composer of no mean worth (a rare occurrence among even the greatest of conductors). At the head of the reorganized and more than ever distinguished orchestra of Boston, he has equally established his eminence as a conductor.

Further, he comes to Philadelphia with far more than a Boston precedent to his credit. He has long been known as one of the first conductors of Paris at the "Opera," the "Opera Comique," also the "Lamoureux," and "Conservatoire" concerts. "Marouf" is but one of his successful works. His Second Symphony, in particular, has been performed in Philadelphia.

A Symphony of Beethoven, the Seventh, fittingly opens his concert. "Who is so foolish as to confuse Mozart, Beethoven and Haydn with the spirit of Prussianism?" said Mr. Rabaud. "You are giving the 'Huns' too much credit." In this symphony his audience will be able to pass upon his reputation as a close, respectful and deeply appreciative reader of Beethoven's scores. Borodin's Second Symphony will test his aptitude for Russian colorings, to which as a composer he is indebted; and under Duka's Scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" he will endure the test of one of the most splendid, intricate and keen-witted "tours de force" of modern France.

* * *

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Boston Orchestra Here Friday—N. Y. Symphony Society Sat.

An important event will be the appearance of Josef Hofmann with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Mr. Hofmann's choice is the Concerto of Chopin in E minor.

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the orchestra, will make his first appearance in Brooklyn. Of musical parentage and of early academic attainments he has ranked with the first conductors of Paris at opera and concert. He has also been a prolific composer. His Second Symphony has often been performed in this country, and the piquant opera, "Marouf," is well known at the Metropoloitan Opera. By a coincidence this opera will be presented here Saturday evening.

The programme opens fittingly with a classic, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, wherein Brooklyn may pass upon the judgment of Boston that Mr. Rabaud's is a martial, vigorous and keen-visioned reading. In addition to the Chopin Concerto, there will be the symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," by the conductor's compatriot, Saint-Saens.

DVERTISER AND AMERICAN, DECEMBER 8, 58

BONNET SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At Symphony Hall, on Friday or Saturday next, Mr. Rabaud, newly from Paris, will co-operate with Joseph Bonnet, the pre-eminent organist of Paris, and some distinguished Parisian wood-wind and string players, round about them, to play the symphony in D minor by Guilmant, Bonnet's Parisian predecessor and master. At the honored post of organist at the Paris Conservatoire, which he inherited from his master, Guilmant, Bonnet worthily carries on the great tradition of his school and enlarges upon it. He is more brilliant than Guilmant, has gone further in the color effects which the finest mechanisms have made possible; has thrown himself more completely into orchestral concerts. There stands also upon the symphony program the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, and Frederick Converse's musical version of Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

GEBHARD RECITAL

Heinrich Gebhard ma relied upon to o n NEWS

ress: Baltimore, Md.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Wednesday night and a joint recital by Edna Dunham Willard, soprano, and Maurice Dambois, cellist, at the Peabody Friday afternoon, constitute the principal local musical offerings for the week.

Other events to take place between now and mid-December are the Belgian relief concert, under the direction of Bart Wirtz, at Albaugh's Theater on December 7; a recital by Margaret Cummins Rabold, soprano, and Clara Ascherfeld, pianist, at the Hotel Belvedere on December 12; the Philadelphia Orchestra's second lyric concert, on December 9; a recital by Max Rosen, one of the much-talked-of young violinists, who has not yet been heard here, at the Peabody on December 13; the Baltimore Symphony's second concert of its fourth season, on December 15, and the New York Symphony's second concert on December 16.

M. Rabaud's Debut.

The Boston Symphony's concert will be notable as marking the Baltimore debut of the orchestra's new conductor, Henri Rabaud. The event in itself is regarded of sufficient import to warrant the elimination of a soloist. At each of the remaining concerts by this organization solo numbers will be presented, the artists engaged being Mme. Melba, Frederick Fradkin, the new concert master, and Arthur Rubinstein, pianist.

That M. Rabaud is a distinguished Frenchman, I feel sure, is alone sufficient to assure him a hearty welcome to Baltimore, but when it is also considered that he is ranked with the leading composers and directors of the day and holds a position of worldwide eminence, it is easy to believe he will be given a reception that will warm his heart, no matter what impression may later be created by his work in directing the orchestra.

M. Rabaud did not assume the leadership of the Boston Symphony until its season was several weeks old, and when he finally made his American debut in Boston he was enthusiastically greeted.

The Lyric Program.

When he appears here for the first time, M. Rabaud will proceed immediately to introduce what is locally a daring violation of custom—he will present two symphonies on the same program.

There is this for the comfort of those docile men who trapse to symphony concerts to do credit to their wives: The symphonic works will not be consecutive. A modern French work, guaranteed to dispel the nods and the blinks (Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier") will come in between.

The program will be opened with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the one which was read so beautifully under Mr. Damrosch's direction at the New York Symphony's concert last Monday.

It does seem unfortunate that there cannot be some arrangement between conductors whereby repetitions in such quick succession might be avoided. This, however, is impossible, so that there is nothing to do but make the best of the opportunities for studying the contrasts of execution and interpretation that are offered.

The evening will be closed with Borodin's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, a work that has been heard here infrequently enough to be classed as a novelty.

Peabody's Dual Program.

Edna Dunham Willard will present a very interesting group of songs at her appearance with Maurice Dambois next Friday afternoon. Mrs. Willard, who is the wife of Alfred R. Willard, organist and choir director at Old St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church, is a charming artist, possessing not only a lovely voice, but the agreeable, winning personality that is such a valuable asset on the recital stage.

The things she has selected for her Peabody program comprise a recitative and aria from Saccini's "Oedipe a Colone," Paradies' "Quel Ruscelletto," Parelli's "Odorava l'April," an aria by Bach, Franck's exquisite "Les Cloches du Soir," Debussy's "Green," Szulc's "Claire de Lune," Loechlin's "Si tu le Veux," Carpenter's "Silhouettes," Cyril Scott's "The Unforeseen" and Ward Stephens' "Summer Time."

Mr. Dambois, who made a favorable impression on his first Baltimore appearance, will play Boellman's "Variations Symphoniques," Glazounow's "Serenade Espagnole," an andante by Haydn and three of his own works, "Vielle Chanson," "Chanson Douce" and "Dance."

AMERICAN
: New York City.

Boston Symphony Returns with Henri Rabaud as Conductor

By MAX SMITH.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA returned to New York last night for its second pair of concerts, with Henri Rabaud gripping the baton, which before his belated arrival from France had been entrusted temporarily to his distinguished compatriot, Pierre Monteux.

It was the first time that Monsieur Rabaud had been seen here in public, and, of course, his advent as leader of the Hub's famous band aroused a great deal of interest. Few persons, to be sure, anticipated any revelations of genius—and that was well, perhaps, for nothing can work greater harm than extravagant expectations. But most of us knew Rabaud as the composer of "Marouf," and what was more natural than that we should be curious to behold the creator of that charming work in flesh and blood?

Now, it so happens that Monsieur Rabaud cannot boast much flesh. Tall to the eye as he mounted the platform, square-shouldered, thin, almost emaciated, there seemed to be little but skin on his bones. In fact, one could hardly believe that this man of lanky figure and aquiline profile, with iron-gray beard and age-tonsured head, was only forty-four years old, as Philip Hale's programme notes stated. Singularly like the Viennese Gericke in appearance, he looked as if he had passed safely the fifty-year mark.

But it soon became apparent that despite his gaunt frame Monsieur still has good red blood in his veins. A volcanic temperament, to be sure, he does not possess. Scholarly in his proclivities, prone to give close attention to details, he always has perfect control of himself. But there is a nervous energy in his beat, and he wields the directorial stick with vigor and aplomb. Nor does he lack emotional warmth and impulse, though he always keeps safely within the bounds of good taste.

After an introductory performance of "The Star Spangled Banner," which he conducted as conscientiously as any work on the programme, Monsieur Rabaud was compelled to bow repeatedly in response to prolonged applause. As soon as the noise had subsided he launched vigorously into a performance of Beethoven's "Eroica." His beat was broad, incisive, authoritative—yet never ostentatious, never obtrusive. His gestures were somewhat angular and stiff, but not pedantic and stilted.

The calibre of Monsieur Rabaud's musicianship was established at the very outset. Though the score rested on the desk before him, as if modesty forbade the conductor to parade his memory, he was absolutely independent of the printed page. And he gave a masterly reading of the symphony, a reading in which every voice was exposed in plastic relief, a reading exquisitely elaborated, exquisitely balanced, exquisitely shaded, but as imposing in its broad outlines as it was finely studied in its detail.

Not once did Monsieur Rabaud lose his grip of the instrument under his hand. The dynamic life that coursed through the arteries of the music, rising and falling incessantly; the rhythmical throb, firm, yet not rigid, that kept it in constant movement, always preserving the symmetry and proportions of the picture, were of his making.

Power, pathos, dramatic verve, vivacity were conspicuous in this performance of the "Eroica." But never did Monsieur Rabaud offend by exaggeration. And never did he permit the proportions of Beethoven's musical scheme to be disturbed by rhetorical emphasis.

Of the second number on his programme, Saint-Jaens's rarely heard "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," the new conductor gave a finely euphonious performance. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" brought the evening to a brilliant close. But the feature of the concert was Beethoven's symphony as conducted by a Frenchman.

Monsieur Rabaud, by the way, has accepted the invitation of the Metropolitan Opera Company to hear a performance of his "Marouf" tomorrow night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. That is an item of news which might well attract a large contingent of Manhattanites into the transpontine borough. Some one presumably will discover the composer in the theatre and make him the object of an ovation, perhaps even induce him to join the singers on the stage.

CITIZEN
s: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address: New York City
Date

EXTEND OVATION TO HENRI RABAUD

Enthusiastic Audience at Carnegie Hall Welcomes New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FAMOUS FRENCHMAN IS MODEST

Composer of "Marouf" Makes Bow as Chosen French Successor to the Deposed Muck.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

An audience as responsive as it was large, and as inquisitive as it was sympathetic, greeted Henri Rabaud, the new French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, upon his first appearance in New York at Carnegie Hall last evening. Comparison between the methods and manners of the great French composer and conductor and his predecessor, Doctor Muck, about whom so much bitter and misinformed controversy raged, was inevitable. And yet, singularly enough, in the outward dignity, physical reticence and personal austerity of the two men there is not so much difference. But in the reading of the scores, in the development of every precious nuance, in the fanning into life of every lambent spark of musical appeal, Rabaud discloses a nimbleness of fancy, an alert and emotive energy, an impetuosity of desire and command that were never present in the cold precision, the almost automatic inevitableness of Muck's excessive efficiency as a conductor.

Ovations for Conductor Rabaud.

Rabaud's austerity of mien has a suavity, a calm and aloof repose that suggest the modesty of a thoughtful man of deep feeling and intense earnestness. His gestures are gracefully alert, without either nervousness or lassitude, and the certainty and comprehensiveness of his control over his men was so apparent last evening as to be taken as the entire and sufficient cause of the marked improvement of the orchestra over its earlier performances of the season here. So much of the applause was directed at Conductor Rabaud personally, however, that it was difficult to estimate the several demonstrations as approval of the playing of the fine program, but it was always apparent that M. Rabaud accepted and appraised the tumult of hand-clapping as the suitable manifestation of the audience's pleasure over a most wonderfully played and all too brief list of selections.

Rabaud is very tall and slender. He towers above the desk, and there is an easy grace in every motion of his long, lithe figure. The sweep of his arm is undulous and mighty, and the air tracery of his baton is the airy sketch of the structural and interwoven miracles of the scores. And he looks seldom at the score, for his eyes are upon the several sections of his great instrument, reading his men into the full life and meaning of the music. In the "Eroica" I thought he did not quite achieve the ineluctible balance, the distribution of values in the sections or in the instrumental conversation. The strings seemed a trifle rough and the reeds hesitant. But in the Saint-Saens which opened the second half of the program everything was "there," and I thought that both M. Rabaud and his men showed in it the summit of their present form and feeling.

Beethoven Symphony the Feature.

Although it was properly the dominant feature of the program, the Beethoven Symphony (No. 3) in E flat major, "Eroica," did not seem to evoke either the attention or the instant acclaim which rewarded the later efforts of the orchestra. Conductor Rabaud was, as one might say, under the microscope of the amateur and professional criticasters who make up so large and so loyal a following here for the Boston orchestra, and not a gesture or a posture of the grizzled hero of so many European triumphs escaped the avid eyes of the crowded audience. How well he came through that perhaps hypercritical inspection (for it was more an optical than an aural analysis) was demonstrated when he reappeared after the intermission to lead his men bonnily and beautifully through the Elysian glories of "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," Saint-Saens's most exhilirating and diaphonously vivid symphonic poem.

But it was in the Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on Spanish Themes, played without pause and culminating in the dazzling and fantastic orchestral pyrotechnics of the fandango of the Asturias, that Conductor Ribaud led his enthusiastic orchestra and the now wholly captivated audience to the peak of a performance that will be remembered alike for its fortuitous introduction of Henri Rabaud as an American symphony conductor and for its complete demonstration of its renewed spirit, discipline and [illegible] he has conceived to

HERALD
New York City

HENRI RABAUD MAKES HIS NEW YORK DEBUT AS LEADER OF THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Eminent French Conductor and New Guiding Spirit of Famous Body of Musicians Proves To Be Leader of Marked Force and Individuality.

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

The second evening concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night was signalized, emphasized and made notable in musical annals by the first appearance in New York as a conductor of Mr. Henri Rabaud, the eminent French musician, conductor and composer, who is now the guiding spirit of this famous organization.

As night is to day, as darkness is to light, so was this second concert of the Boston Orchestra under its new chief as compared with the last previous one as directed by Mr. Monteux. I almost felt as a live thing the sweep of approval that went through the audience and made them almost voice aloud, as I felt inclined to do, with justified enthusiasm, a cry of "our beloved Symphony Orchestra redivivus."

I was inclined, too, to pat myself on the back as a foresighted prophet, because when I went over to Boston about two weeks ago to hear Mr. Rabaud, I said, "I think that New York will understand, like and approve of Mr. Rabaud as an orchestral conductor of marked force and individuality." And last night the authority, the sanity, the artistic sincerity of the great musician and conductor swept over the audience like a wave and gathered them in; for it was evident at once that with his first New York audience Mr. Rabaud made an immediate, definite, and unequivocal success.

They liked the man, modest, unassuming, and yet instinct with power which comes of definite fixity of purpose and a full equipment to compass and attain that purpose, and as a natural concomitant they liked, approved of and enjoyed his work.

Restored to Unity of Tone.

Even in two weeks since I heard the orchestra play in Boston under Mr. Rabaud's direction the same programme which was played last night, comprising Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Saint Saëns' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakow's gorgeous "Caprice on Spanish Themes," it has been, owing to Mr. Rabaud's efforts, restored to the pristine unity of tone and effort, the plasticity of orchestral expression, which made it once more the magnificent solo orchestra instrument that it once was.

There was still, perhaps, here and there slight waverings in tonal balance, slight crudities in expression which might well mark the gradual amalgamation into the orchestral melting pot of its twenty-seven new members. My prophecy after the first time that a simmering, sound process must inevitably and would soon take place, was again correct, for the orchestra to-day has regained the homogeneity of ensemble in artistic feeling and expression which has long made it famous.

My first impressions of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor in interpretation of the programme as above, when heard in Boston, were amply confirmed, and he even heightened last night. As I stated before, the programme furnished a good medium for the indication of the trend of Mr. Rebaud's musical thought and intent, and his general attitude toward the classic, the romantic and the modern in music. His interpretation of the Beethoven symphony contained, indeed, nothing new in the way of interpretation, but was sane, classic and insistent to a degree.

Idea of Napoleon Suggested.

The note of heroism, of martial spirit, of the idea of Napoleon, the conqueror, which was in Beethoven's mind when he wrote it, was struck at the outset and maintained to the end. One missed, perhaps, as I thought and said before, a note of poetry and sentiment which might justly be attributed to Beethoven as the first great romantic composer.

The funeral march in expression was martial rather than mournful and did not contain, to my thinking, the pathos which should make this wonderful inspiration a wail for the dead and the vanquished. The scherzo was captivating in its tripping pliancy, and it was refreshing to note that Mr. Rebaud had with care restored the Beethoven orchestration, of which, as he himself told me, he would not presume to change a note. The finale was brilliant and incisive, but it is hardly necessary to characterize in detail the reading of a work which, granting its premises of interpretation, was wholly consistent and thoroughly effective throughout, and except for some uncertainty in attack in the coda of the Allegro Con Brio was exceedingly well played by the orchestra.

Has Poetic Feeling.

That Mr. Rebaud has romanticism, poetic feeling and modernity to draw upon when he is so minded was amply evident in his reading of the other two numbers on the programme. The Saint-Saëns symphonic poem, a little disjointed and diffuse as I have always thought, was given with a wealth of detail, variety and contrast in the way of phrase and nuance which gave it unusual coherence, sequence and effect; while I could only feel that the composer of "Marouf" fairly revelled in that "colossal masterpiece of instrumentation," as Tschaikowsky put it, of Rimsky-Korsakow, which brought the programme to a glittering, spectacular and triumphant close.

In this number the supreme excellence of various orchestral units like Mr. Fradkin's violin, Mr. Mueller's English horn, Mr. Sand's clarinet in especial, stood out markedly in the various cadenzas of the Gypsy dance, and the whole number was played by the orchestra with a brilliancy of virtuosity which was wont to characterize their best efforts of bygone times when Nikisch reigned supreme.

I think that Mr. Rabaud has every reason to be gratified with his reception by the New York public last night, for I heard no dissenting voice raised as to his commanding merit as a conductor and his interesting personality; I think the Boston Orchestra has every reason to be congratulated on the acquisition of so competent a conductor to direct its artistic efforts toward the best in music; and I think too, that the public can feel decided pleasure and gratification in the thought that the Boston Orchestra has again returned to its own.

TRIBUNE
New York City

Music

The Boston Orchestra and Its New Conductor

By H. E. Krehbiel

The mission of the Boston Orchestra as an impetus to the appreciation of symphonic music is not to be lost to the people of New York. That was the teaching of the concert given in Carnegie Hall last night and it came through the conducting of Mr. Rabaud. The first two concerts left an apprehension that the effect of the obligatory organization of the band might have so seriously impaired its efficiency that its performances could no longer serve as a corrective and inspiration as it had done for many years. But the crudities apparent on the first visit have all but disappeared under the training of Mr. Rabaud, and the admirable qualities which he displayed as an interpreter justify the patrons of the orchestra in looking forward to the visits of the musicians from Boston with all the delightful anticipation which they have inspired for a quarter of a century. This is good and a fit cause for congratulations to the committee of gentlemen who have relieved Major Higginson of a heavy burden and to the music lovers of both Boston and New York.

Mr. Rabaud's programme last night was made up of three numbers only, but they were of a character to disclose the artistic stuff out of which the new conductor is made. They were Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes." A sympathetic reading of the French composition was to have been expected, and a colorful reproduction of the Spanish music passed through the alembic of a Russian who, like others of his fellows back to Glinka, the father of the school, has a liking for Oriental themes and manner of expression. So it was to the symphony that the curiously inquisitive looked for a real measure of the conductor's capacities. And the demonstration was in the highest degree satisfying. The reading was sincere, free from all attempts to disclose profundities never dreamed of by the composer, lucid in exposition without evidence of the use of the analytical scalpel, clear, the funeral march filled with manly sorrow but never turgid, the scherzo a marvel of lightness and grace, happily untroubled by the spirit which has so often weighted the music of the horns in the Trio with significances irreconcilable with any theory of the psychological contents of the work as a whole, and articulated in the finalé (taken at an unusually rapid tempo) with a distinctness which seemed to reveal hitherto unnoticed beauties. Masterful was the quiet but strong development of the climaxes, wholly charming to ear and fancy the nice adjustment of dynamic nuances. A noble performance.

The score lay open to the [illegible] theless the big Beethoven note was missing; passion, profound sentiment, storm and stress were kept in the back ground.

It was academic, not Napoleonic. The mighty paws of the lion were incased in the finest Parisian kid. This particularly applies to the first and second movements; to be sure there was crêpe and a discreet air of Grock, nevertheless, the dead hero of the Funeral March had shrunk to the proportions of a model bourgeois. Neither Beethoven nor the First Consul was among the mourners.

But the scherzo was like the rustling of the leaves in a gentle Autumn gale. He has a light wrist, this Mr. Rabaud, with a keen appreciation of tonal values. Overrefinement, "the scholar's fault," may be set against him; almost a minor virtue instead of a peccadillo. The symphonic poem by Camille Saint-Saëns, which began the latter half of a well-constructed program, was "The Youth of Hercules," not so popular as the other three poems, yet of deeper musical significance. It gave us a better chance than the symphony to gauge the many qualities of the conductor. The [illegible]

TIMES
New York City

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

Rabaud Conducts Boston Symphony.

Henri Rabaud was warmly welcomed at Carnegie Hall last night. It was his first appearance in this city, and the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Rabaud was not only greeted as the new conductor of the Boston band, but also as a distinguished musician, and the composer of that ingenious and fantastic opera, "Marouf," which has proved such an entertaining addition to the present répertoire of the Metropolitan Opera House. He is a tall, spare, gray-bearded man, with a scholarly stoop, who has the score in his head, and does not bury his head in the score. His gestures are economical, sober, and of an anxious rectitude. His beat is clear, rhythmic, and effective. It might be of interest briefly to sum up the predecessors of Mr. Rabaud in the conductor's pulpit of this famous orchestral organization. George Henschel, a singer whose orchestra did not sing; Wilhelm Gericke, a drillmaster of exquisite taste; Arthur Nikisch, a poet plus a prima donna; Emil Paur, a temperament without style; Fiedler, a German; Karl Muck, a stylist wihout dramatic temperament; Pierre Monteux, French, but not Gallic; Henri Rabaud—a conductor; and, as conductors go nowadays, that is praise, indeed.

He is a cerebral conductor. He is sensitive to form. His phrasing reveals not only the larger pulsation but also the articulation of the phrase; yet, he is not petit-maître, or meticulous. His feeling for nuance rather than undue insistence on color was rather a relief. In this he follows the lead of Paul Verlaine, who celebrated the superiority of nuance over color in a line that might have been written by the pedantic Boileau. And the mere rhetoric of conducting makes little appeal to the new man. In a word a Frenchman, ruled by tact and a fine sense of tonal balance. But cerebral. No fear of his ever taking the bit between his teeth and [illegible] the same token does

MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York City

Henri Raabaud Next Thursday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next, this time with its new and permanently engaged conductor, Henri Rabaud, who has recently arrived from France and fulfilled his distinguished function in Boston for an nntroductory two weeks.

Boston has declared itself fortunate, not only from the taste, but from the precedent. Mr Rabaud's father, grandfather and grand-aunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rome in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music conducted at the "Opera," the "Opera Comique," the Conservatoire and the "Lamoureux" concerts. He has a considerable list of compositions to his credit in small and large forms, of which the best known in this country are his Second Symphony and the opera "Marouf" of several years' standing at the Metropolitan Opera.

A classical symphony stands fittingly at the head of each concert—for Thursday evening Beethoven's "Eroica" and on Saturday afternoon Mozart's "Jupiter." The rest of the Thursday program is filled by Saint-Saens's Symphonic Poem, "The Youth of Hercules." and Rimsky-Korsakoff's multi-colored "Caprice on Spanish Themes." for which Mr. Rabaud admits an especial fondness. Its spirit and style, by the way, remind one repeatedly of "Marouf." Borodin is to provide the Russian number for the Saturday program with his Second Symphony, also highly and diversely colored. For the rest, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the brilliant and quick-witted Scherzo by the conductor's "confrere," Dukas, and Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe."

and dramatic emphasis which were lacking before, here were in high relief. More than a moiety of the old plangency of the strings was heard; and the elasticity of attack and release in massed episodes made me sure that the orchestra was ruled by a benign musical influence.

The evening closed with a brilliant interpretation of the Kaleidoscopic Caprice in Spanish Themes by Rimsky-Korsakov. We heard only the "Alborado," which Philip Hale told us in his Notes is a morning serenade, and in which is a theme from the Russian's "Tcherazade." The charm, swirling hues, and leaping rhythms were all so vividly exposed that we seemed to be peeping from a courtyard in old Seville. The large audience liked Henri Rabaud, liked the beautiful playing of the men from Boston, and testified to their admiration by generous applause. We expect to hear real Mozart music at the Saturday matinée, as the Jupiter Symphony is announced, and for this composer Mr. Rabaud must have a predilection.

EVENING SUN
New York City.

Rabaud Comes With His Bostons

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next, this concert being the first under the leadership of Henri Rabaud, the Parisian conductor and composer, and who has already pleased the Bostonians with his first two weeks in his new chair. New York's verdict will be heard after the concerts of the coming week. The composer of "Marouf" will have to face the batteries of the friendly if critical audience, who may be wondering whether this composer will be able to whip the scattered choir from the Commonwealth into its old angelically perfect unity. Boston and New York are known sometimes to flout the respective idols of the other's artistic adulation; next week will tell the tale of judgment.

For these concerts M. Rabaud has chosen programmes each one of which begins fittingly enough with a classical symphony — for Thursday evening Beethoven's "Eroica," and on Saturday afternoon Mozart's "Jupiter." The rest of the Thursday programme is filled by Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's multi-colored "Caprice on Spanish Themes." Borodin is to provide the Russian number for the Saturday programme with his Second Symphony, also highly and diversely colored. For the rest, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the brilliant and quick witted scherzo by the conductor's "confrere," Dukas, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

PLAYERS FROM BOSTON IMPROVED BY RABAUD

New Conductor Brings Out Fineness of Beethoven at Carnegie Hall Concert.

Boston Symphony Orchestra admirers, who have been justly concerned since the two introductory New York concerts of this season, given here last month, took heart last evening when the visiting organization from New England reappeared in Carnegie Hall.

The occasion was notable, through presenting before the public a newcomer in the person of the latest conductor, Henri Rabaud. The opening concerts were directed by Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and discriminating listeners will not soon forget M. Monteux's vigor, which was not suited to symphonic music.

It was a different orchestra, in the hearing, which the audience that crowded Carnegie Hall faced last evening. For in the few weeks M. Rabaud has been in control, he appears to have smoothed many rough edges and to have obtained a cohesiveness, a purer tone than was present last month.

His conducting of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony last evening was distinguished by elements of musicianship and understanding, as well as of genuine leadership abilities which make one regard him with respect. Whatever may or may not have been his rank as a conductor in France, he touched eminent standards in his reading of the third and fourth movements of the symphony last evening.

On Saturday further opportunity will be afforded in a different musical programme to judge of M. Rabaud, whose opera, "Marouf," is one of the current works in the metropolitan repertoire.

Address: New York City
Date

EXTEND OVATION TO HENRI RABAUD

Enthusiastic Audience at Carnegie Hall Welcomes New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FAMOUS FRENCHMAN IS MODEST

Composer of "Marouf" Makes Bow as Chosen French Successor to the Deposed Muck.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

An audience as responsive as it was large, and as inquisitive as it was sympathetic, greeted Henri Rabaud, the new French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, upon his first appearance in New York at Carnegie Hall last evening. Comparison between the methods and manners of the great French composer and conductor and his predecessor, Doctor Muck, about whom so much bitter and misinformed controversy raged, was inevitable. And yet, singularly enough, in the outward dignity, physical reticence and personal austerity of the two men there is not so much difference. But in the reading of the scores, in the development of every precious nuance, in the fanning into life of every lambent spark of musical appeal, Rabaud discloses a nimbleness of fancy, an alert and emotive energy, an impetuosity of desire and command that were never present in the cold precision, the almost automatic inevitableness of Muck's excessive efficiency as a conductor.

Ovations for Conductor Rabaud.

Rabaud's austerity of mien has a suavity, a calm and aloof repose that suggest the modesty of a thoughtful man of deep feeling and intense earnestness. His gestures are gracefully alert, without either nervousness or lassitude, and the certainty and comprehensiveness of his control over his men was so apparent last evening as to be taken as the entire and sufficient cause of the marked improvement of the orchestra over its earlier performances of the season here. So much of the applause was directed at Conductor Rabaud personally, however, that it was difficult to estimate the several demonstrations as approval of the playing of the fine program, but it was always apparent that M. Rabaud accepted and appraised the tumult of hand-clapping as the suitable manifestation of the audience's pleasure over a most wonderfully played and all too brief list of selections.

Rabaud is very tall and slender. He towers above the desk, and there is an easy grace in every motion of his long, lithe figure. The sweep of his arm is undulous and mighty, and the air tracery of his baton is the airy sketch of the structural and interwoven miracles of the scores. And he looks seldom at the score, for his eyes are upon the several sections of his great instrument, reading his men into the full life and meaning of the music. In the "Eroica" I thought he did not quite achieve the ineluctible balance, the distribution of values in the sections or in the instrumental conversation. The strings seemed a trifle rough and the reeds hesitant. But in the Saint-Saens which opened the second half of the program everything was "there," and I thought that both M. Rabaud and his men showed in it the summit of their present form and feeling.

Beethoven Symphony the Feature.

Although it was properly the dominant feature of the program, the Beethoven Symphony (No. 3) in E flat major, "Eroica," did not seem to evoke either the attention or the instant acclaim which rewarded the later efforts of the orchestra. Conductor Rabaud was, as one might say, under the microscope of the amateur and professional criticasters who make up so large and so loyal a following here for the Boston orchestra, and not a gesture or a posture of the grizzled hero of so many European triumphs escaped the avid eyes of the crowded audience. How well he came through that perhaps hypercritical inspection (for it was more an optical than an aural analysis) was demonstrated when he reappeared after the intermission to lead his men bonnily and beautifully through the Elysian glories of "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," Saint-Saens's most exhilirating and diaphonously vivid symphonic poem.

But it was in the Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on Spanish Themes, played without pause and culminating in the dazzling and fantastic orchestral pyrotechnics of the fandango of the Asturias, that Conductor Ribaud led his enthusiastic orchestra and the now wholly captivated audience to the peak of a performance that will be remembered alike for the fortuitous introduction of Henri Rabaud as an American symphony conductor and for its complete demonstration of the renewed spirit, discipline and [illegible] he has contrived to

HERALD
New York City

HENRI RABAUD MAKES HIS NEW YORK DEBUT AS LEADER OF THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Eminent French Conductor and New Guiding Spirit of Famous Body of Musicians Proves To Be Leader of Marked Force and Individuality.

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

The second evening concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night was signalized, emphasized and made notable in musical annals by the first appearance in New York as a conductor of Mr. Henri Rabaud, the eminent French musician, conductor and composer, who is now the guiding spirit of this famous organization.

As night is to day, as darkness is to light, so was this second concert of the Boston Orchestra under its new chief as compared with the last previous one as directed by Mr. Monteux. I almost felt as a live thing the sweep of approval that went through the audience and made them almost voice aloud, as I felt inclined to do, with justified enthusiasm, a cry of "our beloved Symphony Orchestra redivivus."

I was inclined, too, to pat myself on the back as a foresighted prophet, because when I went over to Boston about two weeks ago to hear Mr. Rabaud, I said, "I think that New York will understand, like and approve of Mr. Rabaud as an orchestral conductor of marked force and individuality." And last night the authority, the sanity, the artistic sincerity of the great musician and conductor swept over the audience like a wave and gathered them in; for it was evident at once that with his first New York audience Mr. Rabaud made an immediate, definite, and unequivocal success.

They liked the man, modest, unassuming, and yet instinct with power which comes of definite fixity of purpose and a full equipment to compass and attain purpose, and as a natural concomitant they liked, approved of and enjoyed work.

Restored to Unity of Tone.

Even in two weeks since I heard the orchestra play in Boston under Mr. Rabaud's direction the same programme which was played last night, comprising Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Saint Saëns' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakow's gorgeous "Caprice on Spanish Themes," it has been, owing to Mr. Rabaud's efforts, restored to the pristine unity of tone and effort, the plasticity of orchestral expression, which made it once more the magnificent solo orchestra instrument that it once was.

There was still, perhaps, here and there slight waverings in tonal balance, slight crudities in expression which might well mark the gradual amalgamation into the orchestral melting pot of its twenty-seven new members. My prophecy after the first time that a simmering, sound process must inevitably and would soon take place, was again correct, for the orchestra to-day has regained the homogeneity of ensemble in artistic feeling and expression which has long made it famous.

My first impressions of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor in interpretation of the programme as above, when heard in Boston, were amply confirmed, and he even heightened last night. As I stated before, the programme furnished a good medium for the indication of the trend of Mr. Rebaud's musical thought and intent, and his general attitude toward the classic, the romantic and the modern in music. His interpretation of the Beethoven symphony contained, indeed, nothing new in the way of interpretation, but was sane, classic and insistent to a degree.

Idea of Napoleon Suggested.

The note of heroism, of martial spirit, of the idea of Napoleon, the conqueror, which was in Beethoven's mind when he wrote it, was struck at the outset and maintained to the end. One missed, perhaps, as I thought and said before, a note of poetry and sentiment which might justly be attributed to Beethoven as the first great romantic composer.

The funeral march in expression was martial rather than mournful and did not contain, to my thinking, the pathos which should make this wonderful inspiration a wail for the dead and the vanquished. The scherzo was captivating in its tripping pliancy, and it was refreshing to note that Mr. Rebaud had with care restored the Beethoven orchestration, of which, as he himself told me, he would not presume to change a note. The finale was brilliant and incisive, but it is hardly necessary to characterize in detail the reading of a work which, granting its premises of interpretation, was wholly consistent and thoroughly effective throughout, and except for some uncertainty in attack in the coda of the Allegro Con Brio was exceedingly well played by the orchestra.

Has Poetic Feeling.

That Mr. Rebaud has romanticism, poetic feeling and modernity to draw upon when he is so minded was amply evident in his reading of the other two numbers on the programme. The Saint-Saëns symphonic poem, a little disjointed and diffuse as I have always thought, was given with a wealth of detail, variety and contrast in the way of phrase and nuance which gave it unusual coherence, sequence and effect; while I could only feel that the composer of "Marouf" fairly revelled in that "colossal masterpiece of instrumentation," as Tschaikowsky put it, of Rimsky-Korsakow, which brought the programme to a glittering, spectacular and triumphant close.

In this number the supreme excellence of various orchestral units like Mr. Fradkin's violin, Mr. Mueller's English horn, Mr. Sand's clarinet in especial, stood out markedly in the various cadenzas of the Gypsy dance, and the whole number was played by the orchestra with a brilliancy of virtuosity which was wont to characterize their best efforts of bygone times when Nikisch reigned supreme.

I think that Mr. Rabaud has every reason to be gratified with his reception by the New York public last night, for I heard no dissenting voice raised as to his commanding merit as a conductor and his interesting personality; I think the Boston Orchestra has every reason to be congratulated on the acquisition of so competent a conductor to direct its artistic efforts toward the best in music; and I think too, that the public can feel decided pleasure and gratification in the thought that the Boston Orchestra has again returned to its own.

TRIBUNE
New York City

We

By H. E. Krehbiel

The mission of the Boston Orchestra as an impetus to the appreciation of symphonic music is not to be lost to the people of New York. That was the teaching of the concert given in Carnegie Hall last night and it came through the conducting of Mr. Rabaud. The first two concerts left an apprehension that the effect of the obligatory organization of the band might have so seriously impaired its efficiency that its performances could no longer serve as a corrective and inspiration as it had done for many years. But the crudities apparent on the first visit have all but disappeared under the training of Mr. Rabaud, and the admirable qualities which he displayed as an interpreter justify the patrons of the orchestra in looking forward to the visits of the musicians from Boston with all the delightful anticipation which they have inspired for a quarter of a century. This is good and a fit cause for congratulations to the committee of gentlemen who have relieved Major Higginson of a heavy burden and to the music lovers of both Boston and New York.

Mr. Rabaud's programme last night was made up of three numbers only, but they were of a character to disclose the artistic stuff out of which the new conductor is made. They were Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes." A sympathetic reading of the French composition was to have been expected, and a colorful reproduction of the Spanish music passed through the alembic of a Russian who, like others of his fellows back to Glinka, the father of the school, has a liking for Oriental themes and manner of expression. So it was to the symphony that the curiously inquisitive looked for a real measure of the conductor's capacities. And the demonstration was in the highest degree satisfying. The reading was sincere, free from all attempts to disclose profundities never dreamed of by the composer, lucid in exposition without evidence of the use of the analytical scalpel, clear, the funeral march filled with manly sorrow but never turgid, the scherzo a marvel of lightness and grace, happily untroubled by the spirit which has so often weighted the music of the horns in the Trio with significances irreconcilable with any theory of the psychological contents of the work as a whole, and articulated in the finalé (taken at an unusually rapid

TIMES
New York City
DEC 6 - 1912

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

Rabaud Conducts Boston Symphony.

Henri Rabaud was warmly welcomed at Carnegie Hall last night. It was his first appearance in this city, and the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Rabaud was not only greeted as the new conductor of the Boston band, but also as a distinguished musician, and the composer of that ingenious and fantastic opera, "Marouf," which has proved such an entertaining addition to the present répertoire of the Metropolitan Opera House. He is a tall, spare, gray-bearded man, with a scholarly stoop, who has the score in his head, and does not bury his head in the score. His gestures are economical, sober, and of an anxious rectitude. His beat is clear, rhythmic, and effective. It might be of interest briefly to sum up the predecessors of Mr. Rabaud in the conductor's pulpit of this famous orchestral organization. George Henschel, a singer whose orchestra did not sing; Wilhelm Gericke, a drillmaster of exquisite taste; Arthur Nikisch, a poet plus a prima donna; Emil Paur, a temperament without style; Fiedler, a German; Karl Muck, a stylist wihout dramatic temperament; Pierre Monteux, French, but not Gallic; Henri Rabaud—a conductor; and, as conductors go nowadays, that is praise, indeed.

He is a cerebral conductor. He is sensitive to form. His phrasing reveals not only the larger pulsation but also the articulation of the phrase; yet, he is not petit-maitre, or meticulous. His feeling for nuance rather than undue insistence on color was rather a relief. In this he follows the lead of Paul Verlaine, who celebrated the superiority of nuance over color in a line that might have been written by the pedantic Boileau. And the mere rhetoric of conducting makes little appeal to the new man. In a word a Frenchman, ruled by tact and a fine sense of tonal balance. But cerebral. No fear of his ever taking the bit between his teeth and bolting. Nor by the same token does he let the grass grow under his feet; witness the fleetness of his tempi in the Eroica Symphony, the last movement. As might have been expected, the Beethoven work was as clear as a June morning; almost Mozartean in the first movement. Transparent, clarity itself, the score lay open to the gaze, nevertheless the big Beethoven note was missing; passion, profound sentiment, storm and stress were kept in the back ground.

It was academic, not Napoleonic. The mighty paws of the lion were incased in the finest Parisian kid. This particularly applies to the first and second movements; to be sure there was crêpe and a discreet air of Groeb, nevertheless, the dead hero of the Funeral March had shrunk to the proportions of a model bourgeois. Neither Beethoven nor the First Consul was among the mourners.

But the scherzo was like the rustling of the leaves in a gentle Autumn gale. He has a light wrist, this Mr. Rabaud, with a keen appreciation of tonal values. Overrefinement, "the scholar's fault," may be set against him; almost a minor virtue instead of a peccadillo. The symphonic poem by Camille Saint-Saëns, which began the latter half of a well-constructed program, was "The Youth of Hercules," not so popular as the other three poems, yet of deeper musical significance. It gave us a better chance than the symphony to gauge the many qualities of the conductor. The grand and dramatic emphasis which were lacking before, here were in high relief. More than a moiety of the old plangency of the strings was heard; and the elasticity of attack and release in massed episodes made me sure that the orchestra was ruled by a benign musical influence.

The evening closed with a brilliant interpretation of the Kaleidoscopic Caprice in Spanish Themes by Rimsky-Korsakov. We heard only the "Alborado," which Philip Hale told us in his Notes is a morning serenade, and in which is a theme from the Russian's "Tcherazade." The charm, swirling hues, and leaping rhythms were all so vividly exposed that we seemed to be peeping from a courtyard in old Seville. The large audience liked Henri Rabaud, liked the beautiful playing of the men from Boston, and testified to their admiration by generous applause. We expect to hear real Mozart music at the Saturday matinée, as the Jupiter Symphony is announced, and for this composer Mr. Rabaud must have a predilection.

EVENING SUN
From
Address: New York City.
Date

Rabaud Comes With His Bostons.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next, this concert being the first under the leadership of Henri Rabaud, the Parisian conductor and composer, and who has already pleased the Bostonians with his first two weeks in his new chair. New York's verdict will be heard after the concerts of the coming week. The composer of "Marouf" will have to face the batteries of the friendly if critical audience, who may be wondering whether this composer will be able to whip the scattered choir from the Commonwealth into its old angelically perfect unity. Boston and New York are known sometimes to flout the respective idols of the other's artistic adulation; next week will tell the tale of judgment.

For these concerts M. Rabaud has chosen programmes each one of which begins fittingly enough with a classical symphony — for Thursday evening Beethoven's "Eroica," and on Saturday afternoon Mozart's "Jupiter." The rest of the Thursday programme is filled by Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's multi-colored "Caprice on Spanish Themes." Borodin is to provide the Russian number for the Saturday programme with his Second Symphony, also highly and diversely colored. For the rest, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the brilliant and quick witted scherzo by the conductor's "confrere," Dukas, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

PLAYERS FROM BOSTON IMPROVED BY RABAUD

New Conductor Brings Out Fineness of Beethoven at Carnegie Hall Concert.

Boston Symphony Orchestra admirers, who have been justly concerned since the two introductory New York concerts of this season, given here last month, took heart last evening when the visiting organization from New England reappeared in Carnegie Hall.

The occasion was notable, through presenting before the public a newcomer in the person of the latest conductor, Henri Rabaud. The opening concerts were directed by Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and discriminating listeners will not soon forget M. Monteux's vigor, which was not suited to symphonic music.

It was a different orchestra, in the hearing, which the audience that crowded Carnegie Hall faced last evening. For in the few weeks M. Rabaud has been in control, he appears to have smoothed many rough edges and to have obtained a cohesiveness, a purer tone than was present last month.

His conducting of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony last evening was distinguished by elements of musicianship and understanding, as well as of genuine leadership abilities which make one regard him with respect. Whatever may or may not have been his rank as a conductor in France, he touched eminent standards in his reading of the third and fourth movements of the symphony last evening.

On Saturday further opportunity will be afforded in a different musical programme to judge of M. Rabaud, whose opera, "Marouf," is one of the current works in the metropolitan repertoire.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date

Henri Raaband Next Thursday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next, this time with its new and permanently engaged conductor, Henri Rabaud, who has recently arrived from France and fulfilled his distinguished function in Boston for an nntroductory two weeks.

Boston has declared itself fortunate, not only from the taste, but from the precedent. Mr Rabaud's father, grandfather and grand-aunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rome in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music conducted at the "Opera," the "Opera Comique," the Conservatoire and the "Lamoureux" concerts. He has a considerable list of compositions to his credit in small and large forms, of which the best known in this country are his Second Symphony and the opera "Marouf" of several years' standing at the Metropolitan Opera.

A classical symphony stands fittingly at the head of each concert—for Thursday evening Beethoven's "Eroica" and on Saturday afternoon Mozart's "Jupiter." The rest of the Thursday program is filled by Saint-Saens's Symphonic Poem, "The Youth of Hercules." and Rimsky-Korsakoff's multi-colored "Caprice on Spanish Themes," for which Mr. Rabaud admits an especial fondness. Its spirit and style, by the way, remind one repeatedly of "Marouf." Borodin is to provide the Russian number for the Saturday program with his Second Symphony, also highly and diversely colored. For the rest, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the brilliant and quick-witted Scherzo by the conductor's "confrere," Dukas, and Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe."

BROOKLYN EAGLE, DECEMBER 7.

Rabaud Conducts at Academy; Divides Honors with Hofmann

Henri Rabaud made his first Brooklyn appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last evening. When the orchestra gave its first concert of the present season in the same hall a month ago, it played under the direction of Pierre Monteux, conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, and loaned by that august institution to the band for the first few weeks of the season, pending the arrival in this country of the permanent conductor. Last evening Mr. Monteux sat in one of the stage boxes and listened to the conducting of his confrere and the playing of the orchestra for which he had done so much of the tedious work of initial rehearsing.

For his first Brooklyn program Mr. Rabaud selected the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the Saint-Saen's symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," played the previous evening in Carnegie Hall, and the E Minor Piano Concerto of Chopin. For soloist in the last named he had the services of no less a pianist than Josef Hofmann. It was a program of sufficient variety of kind and manner to afford full opportunity to form opinion of the orchestra and of the conductor.

The Beethoven Symphony in A major was termed by the ever-terminizing Richard Wagner as the "apotheosis of the dance," and since Wagner's time we have had innumerable conductors who, relying on the immortal Richard's dictum, have convinced their admirers that a rigid reading is thereby justified. To the glory and credit of Mr. Rabaud, Beethoven apparently means something more, and last evening we heard a human and humanizing publication of the symphony's movements that probably approached nearer to the Beethoven spirit than any we have heard of recent years. The symphony, in addition to affording this test of the conductor's predilections and taste, also afforded a measure of the orchestra's attainments.

During the few weeks that Mr. Rabaud has had the men under his control he has whipped them into an interpretative medium of high rank, one that takes position alongside the Boston Symphony of other years and other conditions, and in one respect at least—the quality of its tone—superior to the bands who annually have journeyed from the Hub to shed effulgence upon the local seasons. The contemplative measures of the Allegretto will linger long in the memory of all who heard them last evening, so lustrous was the tone and so compelling the details of execution.

But Mr. Rabaud is just as successful in movements that call for rapidity of tempo, and the band just as successful in realizing the conductor's call for virtuosity. Mr. Rabaud fears not a rapid tempo. Last evening he took the finale at an exhilarating pace, and under the deftness and pliancy of wrist that characterizes his conducting of an allegro passage the rhythms of this joyous music crackled and sparkled, now rising to a forte of power, now sinking into whisperings of tonal beauty.

The combination of Hofmann's exquisite playing and rare accompanying on the part of orchestra and leader provided a rarely beautiful reading of the concerto. Only once did the combination slip. It was not apparent to the man in the audience who was responsible, whether Hofmann in a mental lapse made the false entry or whether the conductor's beat was not precise enough; but the indecision of a few measures soon resolved itself into the necessary co-ordination. Hofmann's fingers sang last evening as eloquently as the human voice. The details of his playing provided such sensuous joy as Chopin dreamed, yet appreciation of the lovely moments only prepared for the fuller satisfaction of the contemplation of the entire structure. A noble work, nobly planned.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The whole country is to be congratulated that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is re-established in its old position of musical pre-eminence under a leader who gives abundant promise of maintaining its high standards. M. Henri Rabaud has conducted two concerts in this city, one in Carnegie Hall and one in the Brooklyn Academy, and there is general recognition of the persistence of those technical excellencies for which this band has long been renowned, and which were liable to be impaired because of the excision of a considerable body of enemy alien players following the internment of Dr. Muck, as well as of the suitability of M. Rabaud for the high post to which he has been called.

This is something far broader and more significant than the fate of the individual musicians involved in the reorganization. Since the days when Theodore Thomas dominated the musical life of America the Boston Symphony Orchestra has carried on the work which Thomas began, of teaching the American people to love the higher forms of music, to know and appreciate the best that has been written, and to insist that that best receive worthy interpretation.

In this city our own Philharmonic is an older body, but its influence has been confined to New York until recently. Its disbandment would be a local loss, but the failure of the Boston Symphony would be a nation-wide misfortune, removing our standard by which the work of local organization is judged. That such failure has not followed the weeding out of the German element in the band is matter for rejoicing. So also is the fact that the new conductor reveals broad and high standards and the indications that his interpretation of the musical classics is not to be marred by personal eccentricities or through any vain desire to make the conductor appear greater than the composer whom it is his duty to interpret. We have quite enough personal advertisement through the medium of music. It is highly desirable that the leader of our chief orchestra should not be affected by that itch and M. Rabaud's freedom from it is not the least of his merits.

From EVENING JOURNAL

Address New York City

Date DEC 9 1918

3 ORCHESTRAS IN WEEK-END CONCERTS

Two of the town's three permanent orchestras—the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic—and the visiting Boston band displayed their several musical virtues and vices in concerts over the week-end to large gatherings joyous in their delight over the one and successively unmindful of the other. Virtue's story being proverbially brief, and that of its opposite more than a twice-told tale in this column, one may address himself, at least for the time, to the former.

The concert of the Boston Orchestra, from the standpoint of the matinee audience in Carnegie Hall on Saturday, held the virtue of more music for one afternoon than even the unlamented Karl Muck was wont to regale them with. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor, presented two symphonies, the "Jupiter" of Mozart and the B minor of the Russian, Borodin, and between them Dukas' orchestral scherzo, "L'apprenti sorcier." Preceding the Mozart symphony came Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," as well as the introductory "Star Spangled Banner" and "God Save the King."

Mr. Rabaud's virtues as an orchestral conductor, pointed out after his first appearance last Thursday evening, are a gentle and soothing touch, a precise and unemotional energy, an acceptance of ancient and honorable but uninteresting routine. There was nothing disclosed on Saturday to add to the catalogue. The Boston audience, from Mozart through Borodin, was not troubled in its mind by intercomplexities of revelation, nor unduly disturbed in its emotions by any fierce incandescence of passion blazing at its heart. And if such virtues of negation are their own reward, the Boston audience was rewarded.

Yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall Walter Damrosch and his orchestra also pursued the wondrous flowery course of Mozart, playing the G minor symphony. For novelty, the conductor brought forward an orchestral treatment by Arthur de Greef, a [illegible] old Flemish folk

m STANDARD UNION

ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

e DEC 10

"MAROUF" IN BROOKLYN.

The dazzling Oriental spectacle made in Paris by a French composer whose American premiere last season aroused considerable discussion entertained a responsive audience at the Academy of Music last night. Henri Rabaud's "Marouf," a typical tale from the "Thousand and One Nights," given in New York with a luxury of scenic detail that could hardly be duplicated in the whole world, was bound to make something of a sensation. Though its music has not been especially acclaimed, being scholarly rather than spontaneous, with lilting melody far from its prime idea, the thing, as a whole, is much more interesting than similar output by American composers or the frenzied finance of "Le Coq d'Or," sprung upon the unsuspecting citizen about the same time. After that sting in the tail of the past season, Rabaud's plausible fantasy seems as reasonable as an old friend, and while there is little chance for vocal display, good singing and animated action flourish in abundance, besides melodic intervals of true Oriental coloring, the cry of the muezzin from the minarets proving especially effective, while the orchestral undercurrent, if lacking the glory of Wagner, is at least harmonious and well scored.

The cast, practically the same as a year ago, consists of fifteen identified persons, but only three or four who greatly count. First of these is Mme. Alda, as the Princess, whose singing these days is lovely, and she is good to look upon, on the stage or off, with a clever knack at comedy, and a gorgeous wardrobe that at times filis the boards. Her physique, somewhat Oriental, if not Semitic, in its opulence of color and line, is such that she can yield to this feminine weakness with far better results than Geraldine Farrar, who always seems ultrafeathered and overloaded, like the questionable characters she so often elects to play. Alda's sartorial extravagance is quite within the picture, since "Marouf" is an ebullient comedy and not like "Thais," less a light woman than the intellectual courtesan of the ancient Greeks, a tragic tale of life and love and duty. But for downright worth, quite apart from any extraneous help, DeLuca is easily the star. "Marouf" is a part which this artistic baritone with the tenor reaches in his upper tones especially relishes, for he both sings and acts it with gusto, subtle skill and infinite humor. Certainly Marouf's enterprise in escaping from discordant matrimony to masquerade as a millionaire with a caravan at his call, which, together with his ingratiating personality, won a Princess of the realm, eventually to elope with her into happiness everlasting is a delicious and amusing story, ever if it cost the Metropolitan a pretty sum and musically falls short of a masterpiece.

It is for us to laugh and look, not ask the reason why. There is genuine love to the open, but it is of the surface rather than the depths. Still exotic scenes, ravishing trappings pretty women and the hum of rich orchestration, with a really timely Arabian Night's tale, is not at all bad—when you remember how so many of our operatic aspirants have missed it; there is spice in his if not absolute genius. Then the light ballet of which Rosina Galli is queen and Bonpglio king, who does not rise to this little lady, not so vained in characterization or so free in movement as Pavlowa, but still a lissome thing of life and beauty, with eager youth in her expressive, sparkling eyes and wonder in her steel-like toes! In any opera not of supreme consequence musically, and there are several of such these novelty-seeking days, she is the first object to be welcomed and the last to be forgotten.

Pierre Monteux, as conductor of his countryman's work, probably did better than would have Rabaud himself, now director of the Boston Sympohny Orchestra, for few are the composers who successfully lead their own compositions. Certainly Mr. Monteux, who has devoted much time to "Marouf," brought out every idea possible, not to mention a few from Wagner, often present in other men's works, while not permitted to come openly to the feast—though the Democracy he struggled for all his life is now on top!

A highly interested auditor of the performance was Mr. Rabaud himself, a tall, spare man, with gray beard and a stoop, who witnessed it for the first time outside of Europe, though it has been sung in South America as well as North.

In one of the boxes, offered to the Commandant of the Navy Yard by the directors of the Academy, were Captain and Mrs. Lewis Morris, Captain and Mrs. H. T. Wright, and Commander and Mrs. F. G. Pine.

HERALD

New York City

60

MR. RABAUD REPEATS SUCCESS AT BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCER

Interesting Programme Admirably Interpreted at the Second Local Appearance of Famous Organization Under French Conductor.

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

Orchestral history in New York is being made these days!

The attitude of the audience at the second matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, as pleasantly expectant, genial and reposeful, was in marked contrast to that exhibited at the last afternoon concert of this notable organization.

Great are the uses of adversity—I should say of advertisement; for having by now been assured by general critical opinion that the Boston Orchestra was by no manner of means on its last legs, and that what they were going to hear from the new conductor, Mr. Henri Rabaud, was well worthy of being heard, they at once settled down to complete enjoyment of the very varied and interesting programme presented, and were markedly receptive, cordial and enthusiastic.

The doubt about Mr. Rataud's possibilities of romantic conception and expression which has been raised remained still unsolved after Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, which opened the programme, and Mozart's "Jupiter" C major Symphony, which followed. Weber's overture is supposed to introduce a "grand heroic-romantic" opera, and it was certainly the heroic mood which characterized Mr. Rabaud's reading.

There was dramatic color and contrast, picturesque and scenic feeling in the interpretation, but, as I thought, little of either romance or poetry. And yet it was forcible, rhythmic and duly effective. I heard some one sitting near me say:—"If Mr. Rabaud has romantic and poetic feeling he camouflages it pretty well; but I like him immensely as a conductor just the same; he is so sincere." What professional critic could express him better?

Mozart Symphony Heard.

Again, in the Mozart symphony, there was reverential classical feeling, crispness of rhythm, artistic finish highly evolved in detail of nuance and climax, but even Mozart must have had his romantic moments and strove to express them; so I found the lovely andante a trifle monotone, dry and, therefore, unduly dull.

Two thoughts occurred to me pointedly in hearing this symphonic master work, so pure in style, so finished, so inspired melodically. The first, that, given Mozart's limited means of orchestral expression, how far had even the ultra-moderns, with all their improved orchestral material, gone beyond him in legitimate orchestral effect? And again, a realization which came to me of the value as regards potent emotional effect of formal simplicity when supported and illustrated by genuine melodic inspiration. Mozart, modernized, will come back to us some day, fresh and vital and progressive.

The Dukas scherzo "L'Apprenti Sorcier," played recently by the French Couservatory Orchestra under Messager, and again on Friday by the Philharmonic, inevitably suggested comparisons which may not be criticism but are nevertheless instructive. Of the three performances I am free to say that I liked Mr. Rabaud's with the Boston Orchestra best, as being—in spite of an accelerated tempo—more varied, more dramatic, more scenic and dynamic, and therefore more in accord with the purely pictorial meaning and intent of the work. And certainly the orchestra played it in real virtuoso fashion, magnificently. Quite the high light of the concert, to my thinking.

Strings and Wood Wind.

I must not in this connection forget to mention the assurance, discretion and classic elegance and finish of the strings in the Mozart symphony, nor omit reference to the lovely tone quality and balance noticeable in the work of that wonderful group of wood wind instruments of which this orchestra can justly boast of as supreme in artistic completeness.

The Borodin Bruinor Symphony, No. 2, which closed the programme, was played with admirable and characteristic force and rhythm by the orchestra, and read by Mr. Rabaud with evident artistic appreciation of its markedly national color and meaning as a picture of old Russian chivalry and feudal life. But the audience did not, as it seemed to me, enjoy this really typical and inspired work as much as other portions of the programme.

At the beginning of the second half of the programme after the Mozart symphony the orchestra, in honor of Britain's day, played "God Save the King," followed by prolonged applause with the evident intent to induce Mr. Rabaud to play "The Marseillaise," but the conductor would not be "drawn," and without turning to acknowledge the demonstration proceeded quickly with the programme.

The heat of battle of a first appearance having cleared away, one could at this concert sit down more calmly to a considered appreciation of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor, and I can only say that I am more than ever convinced of his artaistic sincerity and commanding ability and authority as an orchestral conductor of the first rank; feeling too, and with some satisfaction, that his first New York audences entirely agreed wth me.

Again I say with real conviction and enthusasm the Boston Symphony Orchestra, redivivus!

n EVENING POST

ress: New York City

Rabaud Conducts Again.

British Day was celebrated at Saturday afternoon's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the playing, after the intermission, of the English national hymn. The American, of course, opened the proceedings and was followed by a German and an Austrian composition; Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, and Mozart's amiable "Jupiter" symphony.

The new conductor of the Boston Orchestra has already firmly established the fact that he is conservative; that he does not approve of reading between the lines, or of modern emendations of the classics. For him there are no "new readings of old scores." A Mozart symphony is, of course, not a Jupiter Tonans; there is no thunder in Mozart's symphonic works as there is in his "Don Giovanni," in the final scenes. That opera, by the way, is casually suggested in all the movements of the "Jupiter" except the third, but not in blatant, brassy fashion. Under M. Rabaud the orchestra played this famous work with much grace, polish, and elegance of style. In the "Euryanthe" overture he succeeded beyond expectation in suggesting the romantic and mysterious spirit underlying the tomb motive, and the faster music was duly exultant. The final number on the programme, Borodin's second symphony, was preceded by Paul Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which was played in a somewhat restrained way, but with tremendous virtuosity. There was much applause for all the pieces played.

MORNING TELEGRAPH

ess: New York City

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

Musical interest during the past week was generously and impartially distributed between the first New York appearance of Henri Rabaud, the new French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the amazing success of the revival of "The Gondoliers" by the Society of American Singers and the anticipated joys of hearing three new Puccini operas on one evening of next week at the Metropolitan Opera House. Of M. Rabaud's musical scholarship, of his fame as an inspirational orchestral reader and leader and of his compositional powers the musical public of America has been well advised. Only last week we heard "Boris Godunoff," his chief operatic work, and the hearing added zest to the reception with which he was acclaimed at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening.

The impression which he made was that of an earnest, highly enlightened, thoroughly disciplined and yet very imaginative musician. The conservatism which is evidently his is the conservatism of the rational artist, the devoted student, the veteran leader, the gentleman of cultivation and native good taste. The imaginative enthusiasm which is also his is the irrepressible boyish spirit of France, the zeal for beauty and the gallant heart for high emprise in the gay fields of music as on the fateful fields of war. Watching the alert, nervous, youthful figure of Rabaud I liked to think of him as a Petain, a Mangin, perhaps even a Foch of the French grand army of art, and somewhat of the atmosphere of bonny authority, coolly gay audacity, I thought, showed betimes in the airy motions of his baton and in the genial and buoyant carriage of this grizzled veteran of the conservatoire.

EVENING POST
New York City

Boston Orchestra Under Rabaud.

Few real Americans would hesitate to give a month or two of their lives to be able to be in Paris just now for a month or two. Few of us can do it, but haven't we a good deal of Paris right among us, military and musical? We have a French theatre, and Yvette Guilbert is here to delight us. The famous orchestra of the Conservatoire is on a visit here, and we have also had a chance to hear the best French military band. The Metropolitan is paying more attention to French opera than it has done since the days of Maurice Grau. Three of the most prominent French conductors, André Messager, Pierre Monteux, and Henri Rabaud, are showing us the French way of interpreting operas and concerts, and two of them are to remain with us, M. Monteux at the Metropolitan, and M. Rabaud as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its usual five pairs of concerts in our Carnegie Hall this season.

The action of these three eminent Parisians has been a stinging rebuke to those fanatics who wanted to banish all German music from American concert programmes. Though the French suffered infinitely more from the war than we did, they rightly reason that to boycott German music would be a way to hurt, not the Teutons, but themselves. Above all things, the French hate to make themselves ridiculous. Classical music, as Vincent d'Indy has said, has nothing to do with nationality. It is universal, and Messager, Monteux, and Rabaud included Beethoven, Mozart, and Weber in their American programmes.

It was with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony that M. Rabaud introduced himself to a New York audience last night. It was a large audience; it welcomed him most cordially, and applauded his reading of the score as fervently as it ever applauded Dr. Muck's. It was a literal reading he gave, closely following the printed page, freed from the readings between the lines which have been in vogue in Germany ever since Richard Wagner conducted them in accordance with his own ideas of pace modifications, which, he claimed, were Beethoven's own. M. Rabaud probably has not read Weingartner's book on the modern interpretation of Beethoven; or, if he has read it, he has paid no attention to it. Wagner's way pleased even his arch enemy, Dr. Hanslick, who wrote in 1872: "His energetic reproduction of the 'Eroica' symphony, with its fine and peculiar nuances, also gave us on the whole a genuine pleasure."

Debussy, who at one time wrote musical criticisms, declared that Beethoven had plenty of genius, but lacked taste. To a Frenchman taste is even above genius. M. Rabaud's reading of the "Eroica" was in the best taste imaginable—delightfully refined, polished, balanced, and with plenty of nice distinctions in loudness. But personally Beethoven was anything but polished. His rough, uncouth individuality is reflected in his music, and must not be filed away. Beethoven's friends declared that he revelled particularly in stormy outbursts of passion. Of this there was little evidence in M. Rabaud's reading of the "Eroica." In the funeral march he did not build so thrilling a climax as others, notably Gustav Mahler, used to build—a climax which was an agonized outcry as if uttered by human voices in a moment of mortal anguish. The funeral march last night was sad, but not overwhelming. There was in it more taste than genius, more intellect than emotion.

It was in the heroic opening movement, and in the sprightly, airy scherzo that M. Rabaud was at his best. The final allegro was taken at an unusually fast pace, yet there was no suggestion of the triviality which this part has been accused of, except at the end—and that wasn't the conductor's fault, but Beethoven's. As for the Boston Orchestra itself, it seemed more like its former self than at its first visit a month ago. But it will take time for the twenty-seven new members to prove themselves the equals of the artists they superseded. There was a lack of euphony where those who remembered the former orchestra expect it. Nor can it be said that Rimsky-Korsakoff's vivacious "Caprice on Spanish Themes" effaced memories of former performances here. Not all the details made their mark.

It was in the beautiful symphonic poem of Saint-Saëns, "La Jeunesse d'Hecsule," that both the orchestra and its new conductor were at their best. Never before had this work, which is played as often as its companions,

TELEGRAM
New York City.

NEW LEADER HELPS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Henri Rabaud Wins Approval in First Concert at Carnegie Hall.

ORCHESTRA AGAIN SAFE

Conductor Achieves Effects Without Distortions or Erratic Rushes.

The December evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening was one of uncommon interest. The close approach of the organization to dissolution at the end of last season and the altogether comforting internment of Karl Muck at Fort Oglethorpe are incidents second in the public mind only to the deep uncertainty as to the discovery of a new conductor of sufficient prestige to sustain the fame of the orchestra when it emerged this autumn under new management.

Henri Rabaud, known to the casual music lover as the composer of the opera "Marouf," was finally engaged, but was unable to reach this country in time for the first concerts. Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera House conducted them with results described once and for all in this place. Last evening Mr. Rabaud made his New York debut. He conducted Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Saint-Saens's "La Jeunesse d'Hercule" and Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Rabaud Fills Bill Admirably.

Mr. Rabaud brought relief. The orchestra is again in safe hands. He is a tall man of spare figure with a serious, well bearded face. He conducts with wide sweeping gesture in the larger moments and with almost microscopic motion in the pianissimi. His beat is as clean and clear as crystal and just as sharp in its angles as a prism. Precision streams from his baton. Attack is perfect under him. There can be no mistakes in entries, and let him have the shock of a thunderous burst into a forte and he is a military commander of the highest rank.

But this is only the beginning of things. Balance and clarity have been restored to the orchestra. Everything sounds in its right place and its right proportion. The transparent beauty of tone which has long been one of the Boston Orchestra's purest excellences is again found. Mr. Rabaud shows himself to be a conductor of fine sensibility, of keen perception, and a master of orchestral technics.

His treatment of the Beethoven symphony was admirable. He achieved effects without distortions of tempi, without erratic rushes forward or leanings backward. Dynamics and a perfect proportion of the voices were his chief means. To this end he restored Beethoven's instrumentation, subjected to many "improvements" by the late Dr. Muck. Mr. Rabaud elided all the additions. He banished the added wood winds and horns. We heard the trio of the scherzo from three horns as Beethoven wrote it, and it sounded just.

Plan Is Sure and Confident.

His tempi were all of the best, except perhaps that of the last movement, which was a trifle swift, but he had a sure and confident plan for the development of the movement and it was most persuasive. If the romantic note was not strong in the symphony it was heard more clearly in the work of Saint-Saens, in which the singing of the strings was filled with ravishing beauty of tonal quality and with throbbing nuance. It was a very beautiful performance, exquisitely graded in its dynamics and yet continent in the treatment of the tempting tutti, easily carried into noise.

Mr. Rabaud was received with great cordiality by the Boston adherents and warmly recalled, especially after the symphony. That he is a conductor who thoroughly knows his profession and has, moreover, a fastidious appreciation of the artistic qualities of the scores before him was proved. Whether he will rise to stormy heights of passionate interpretation is yet to be seen.

SUN
New York City.

Music

The Re-born Boston.

Last night's first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of its new and permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud, must have had its anticipatory strain for the cream of the concert going world who are that orchestra's subscribers. For the troublous governmental and physical changes through which this classic organization has had to struggle, and struggling, has attempted to maintain some semblance of its old perfect entity, are trials in themselves potentially destructive. Such violences might well take off the polish and shadow the bloom of this corporation out of Boston, which for all its unangelic doctor and the chilling restraint of the sacred codfish was an excellent handmaiden to Art.

The lovers and friends of this handmaiden, however, who may have waited with anguish through the sordid revelation of the Muckian divorce and the noisy rows of the Monteux trial marriage—chastening as the discipline may have been—must have come away somewhat reassured last night. The first concert of any director, like the first week of marriage, is no fair telling of either a mediocre or a golden future; but the general optimistic impression conveyed last night by M. Rabaud's leading and the playing of the orchestra was that this holy trust has fallen in wise, reverent, if very discreet, hands. Rabaud is perhaps too much of a composer to make a great director; but the fact that he is a creative artist of extreme subtlety and sensitiveness may constitute him an excellent director for this somewhat battered and not completely one souled crew. Lacking the fire of a Stokowski or the steel-like dynamism of the late Muck, he is better equipped to isave the Boston's soul because he will handle it gently—like St. Catherine of Siena, with "sacred saving hands."

The programme which Mr. Rabaud—as he may be called in America—had chosen for this critical night was a happy one. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony began it well, and for the second half there were added Saint-Saens's "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," and the delightful caprice on Spanish themes of Rimsky-Korsakoff. It was a programme with which to feed the austere soul and to pander to the romantic, for if the great "Eroica" is Beethoven the Russian "Caprice," which ended the programme, is surely sun baked, shadowy, severe but dancing Spain. Through these pieces of separate and differing beauty Mr. Rabaud led his orchestra with a singular and distinct precision, a lightness and sureness of rhythm, and an almost academic carefulness, which, apparently damning quality as it is in these careless days, never for one moment muffled the speaking voice of the music. There are certain qualities of style and feeling which the world has labelled French, and the ineffable mentality and character behind the smooth softness of the Rabaud touch quality to make his achievement French in the highest sense of that all too comprehensive adjective.

Wherefore the majestic "Eroica" came off his baton last night in a sure and delightful reading. The first and last Allegros were pictures of beauty and chapters on rhythm; the Funeral March Adagio was sublimely restrained and gentle, but the mad scherzo was like nothing but fleeting fairies' feet, ever beyond and out of the slow and stupid eye. The Saint-Saens Symphonic Poem was well worthy of its Hercules, and the caprice of Rimsky-Korsakoff was a Spain reincarnate. Mr. Rabaud is in more than mere conducting an interesting conductor. He is an extraordinary figure on the stage of Carnegie, for he combines with the carefulness and hungry attention of a tall bearded father confessor the impetuous angularity in his business of leading of a college cheer leader. He has none of the mad stylistic eruptiveness of the Slavic or Latin conductor, for he is strangely sedate and academic in appearance, savoring of the Sorbonne or the Athenæum, or some remote Harvard seminar. His is a gentle hand apparently, for he does not whip his men into action, nor does he push the fire of sound into them with the Muckian paw. Rather does he lean gently over his children, cajoling them and precisely picking forth what he wants of them. These are apparently good days and a happy future for the band from Boston.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
DEC 6 1916

NEW CONDUCTOR LEADS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Henri Rabaud, from Paris Conservatoire, Welcomed at Carnegie Hall Concert.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, presenting Henri Rabaud as the new conductor of the still famous band impelled the reviewer to rather voluminous, not to say copious rumination between Carnegie Hall and his typewriter, some of it pertinent and a portion of it undisguisedly impertinent. And the precise and uncompromising writing machine which so often serves as a reducing solvent of too profuse cogitation perversely lured one to seeming irrelevancies.

M. Rabaud's "Marouf," brought out at the Metropolitan last year, and still sung at this curiously eclectic institution, and his E minor symphony, played last season by Walter Damrosch's orchestra, flapped the extraordinary dullness before one's mind and recalled one's decision, after having attended upon both to the indubitable end, that as a composer M. Rabaud must be an excellent conductor. It is folly to fear paradox. Therefore, after hearing him in the manifestation of conductor, one concludes that he is an excellent composer. Moreover, the paradox's apparent contradiction may be extracted of sting since one has no intention of listening either to "Marouf" or to this symphony again.

M. Rabaud, as a conductor, called up the image of Charles Evans Hughes become musical, exchanging the Statesmen's Year Book for a symphonic score. It needs only to consider Mr. Hughes to have submitted to the always rather exotic touch of a French chirurgien-barbier and presto, M. Rabaud stands before you.

M. Rabaud, moreover, is no Knight of Parlous Venture. Nor can one imagine him to have ridden the charger Innovation, even as a younger man. For of all the thousand and three items of the orchestral repertoire, it was the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven with which he introduced himself to New York. This is notoriously the stop-gap of the commonplace to the orchestral leader, the first lesson in the primer of the baton. It is known of all upside down and inside out and only playing it that way could perhaps justify M. Rabaud's choice of it as introductory pedestal.

But M. Rabaud calmly and angularly took his stand upon the little platform of convention. One has no hankering for any conductor to do violent hari-kari upon the "Eroica," but no more does one expect him to seek it as an isle of safety or of refuge either for the Boston Orchestra or its new leader. The E-flat symphony can be made to strike into one's emotions, familiar as it is in its every bar, if it be played with passion—with surge of belief in its beauty of penultimate as well as ultimate optimism, with profound throb of [illegible] for its dirge. Mr. Rabaud submitted it to the gentle and soothing touch of the chirurgien-barbier.

After the Third Symphony of Beethoven, surely this French conductor went to the great repositories of the musical art of his own land for further matter; to Berlioz, the precursor; to the other great nineteenth centurions, or to the later and latest word in Gallic originality for orchestra. Surely he did nothing whatever of the sort. Surely, he went to one of the flattest banalities of Saint-Saens, himself of the flattest banalties among French composers—the thrice-watered Liszt and Wagner of "Le Jeunesse d'Hercule." And at the end of the evening Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," which orchestral conductors here and hereabouts have been winding up programs with for so long that the thing has become almost a tradition.

M. Rabaud, in short, proved himself to be a typical product of the Conservatoire, where his career burgeoned until he became a conductor at the Opera and later of the Conservatoire Orchestra. The importation and dissemination of Conservatoire ideals and reactionism here is not likely to redound to the greater glory of French musical art, now the most interesting, in its venturesome spirit, anywhere along the shores of the seven seas, but still excommunicate of the Conservatoire. Under such direction the Boston Orchestra has apparently slipped into the pool of mediocrity. Only Georges Longy and his oboe still rose above it last night.

STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The second of its Brooklyn series of concerts was given last evening at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The occasion was marked with increased interest by reason of the first appearance here of Henri Rabaud, conductor and composer, of France, who now presides over the musical destinies of the famous organization from America's great city of culture. It was an immense and enthusiastically demonstrative audience that greeted M. Rabaud upon his entrance and he was obliged to bow acknowledgments of the salutations of applause for several minutes before being allowed to enter upon his duties of the evening. The new conductor's fame as a composer has preceded his entry upon the platform where have stood such giants of the baton as Gericke, Pauer, Nikisch, Muck and Fiedler. M. Rabaud's task is no light one, for he must set as an ideal the elevating of the orchestra's playing to those standards of perfection previously attained by these illustrious predecessors. Can he succeed in reaching the high tide of artistic excellence that is associated with the remembrance of Gericke and Nikisch he will have performed a national service. The new conductor, apart from several orchestral works, is best known here by his opera "Marouf," to be given at the Academy this evening by the Metropolitan Opera Company, upon which occasion M. Rabaud will be a guest of honor to witness, for the first time in America, the presentation of his own opera. This is truly Rabaud week in Brooklyn. As conductor of the Boston Orchestra, M. Rabaud proved himself last evening to be an active and energetic force. He is tall and gaunt, his features are adorned with the silken beard so typical of Gallic scholars, the seemingly frail framework of his physique is kindled with intense physical power, a power well Governed by restraint, he holds himself with poise and counter-poise, splendid assurance and a compatable degree of grace in gesture of movement. The playing of his men last evening showed a decided improvement over that of a month ago. They are falling into the form of former years, but there is still room for added improvement in the tonal qualities and nuances of the separate choirs. This will come in due time without a doubt. It cannot be said that last evening's programme afforded M. Rabaud a full opportunity for the best display of his musical measure. Beethoven's seventh symphony and Saine-Saen's "La Jeunesse d'Hercule" were its purely instrumental offerings. Of Beethoven's nine symphonies the A major is the most readily understood. Apart from its allegretto variations no deep emotion asserts itself throughout the four movements. Its thematic material is comparatively trivial, though developed in a very imposing manner. Its simple harmonic basis on fundamental triads lacks variety, but Beethoven's great art of introducing unexpected and powerful modulatory changes atones for this lack. Mr. Rabaud laid reasonable stress upon the inner details of the score. He brought out fine shadings and the rhymical accentuations were noticeably pronounced. The scherzo he took at a terrific pace and with a special point made of light spiccato bowing in the strings. Its humorous exuberancy contrasted well with the tragic cast of the allegretto. In this latter fine work was contributed by the 'cellos in their contrapuntal associate melodies. The fugal section also was given with color. Superb climaxes were achieved in the furiously animated finale. Saint-Saens' "The Youth of Hercules" is infrequently heard. Although forty years old, it is a novelty for the younger generation. It is not the most attractive of Saint-Saens' four symphonic poems. It is pseudo-classic, entirely pleasing, not particularly important, and has the two-edged virtue of being both prgrammatic and absolute. It is a very splendid idea of M. Rabaud to introduce these unknown French scores to American audiences, for although many of them are seemingly superficial they also embody music of compelling charm.

Josef Hofmann, the incomparable, was soloist in the Chopin F minor pianoforte concerto. It is superfluous to dwell upon his dazzling performance. The opening themes were enunciated with commanding dignity, the Romance was done in a pretty way and the rondo with sparkling virtuosity. Mr. Hofmann enjoyed six recalls.

EVENING WORLD
New York City.
DEC 6 1916

Henri Rabaud, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, his second appearance here, distinguished himself and made manifest the qualities of the orchestra in the highest degree by what, perhaps, was the most brilliant exposition of Du Kas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" ever vouchsafed to us. On the programme also were Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Borodin's symphony in B minor No. 2 and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

EVENING SUN

ss: Baltimore, Md.

DEC 3 - 1916

THE THREE ARTS

MUSIC DRAMA PAINTING

WORD comes from Boston that insomuch as Baltimore has already been treated to such a perfect plethora of Beethoven during the current season the Seventh Symphony, which has just been played here, will be omitted from the program tomorrow evening and in its place Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Schubert's beautiful "unfinished" symphony will be given, preceding the intermission. The remainder of the program will be as originally announced and will consist of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas, and the second symphony of Alex. Porphyrjevitch Borodin, the one in B minor.

Borodin, who died in 1887, was one of the original group of neo-Russian composers. He was a professor at the Petrograd Medico-Surgical Institute, a counselor of state and a knight, and he was president of the Music Society of Amateurs. At the suggestion of Balakirev he studied music, and he it was who composed the picturesque opera, "Prince Igor," which was not finished at the time of his death, but which was afterward completed by Rimsky-Korsakov and produced in 1891. He also wrote, in addition to numerous works for the orchestra, three symphonies and some string quartets.

The concert tomorrow will be one of exceptional interest in that it will serve to introduce to the Baltimore public Henri Rabaud, the Boston Orchestra's new conductor. He comes of a family with splendid musical traditions. His father was Hippolyte Francois Rabaud, who was awarded the first prize for violoncello playing at the Paris Conservatoire in 1861. His grandfather, on his mother's side, was the celebrated flutist, Vincent Joseph Dorus (born Vansteenkiste), so that Henri Rabaud is a grandnephew of the famous singer, Julie Aimee Josephe Dorus-Gras. M. Rabaud studied composition with Massenet at the Conservatoire, where, in 1894, he was awarded the first Grand Prix de Rome.

After four years at the Villa Medici he organized and directed the Max d'Ollone orchestral concerts in Rome and in Vienna for the purpose of spreading a knowledge of contemporary French music. In 1908 he conducted several German and French works at the Paris Opera, and in the same year he directed a Lamoureux concert. In 1914 he was appointed first conductor of the Paris Opera, succeeding Paul Vidal. During the season of 1914-15, just after the war broke out, he was one of the conductors of the conservatory orchestra concerts at the Sorbonne. On May 2, 1915, M. Rabaud's opera, "Marouf," which is one of the successes of the current season at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, was revived at the Opera Comique in Paris, its composer directing the performance.

As we have relatively few symphony concerts in Baltimore and there are so many symphonies with which we should become familiar, it is just as well that, for the time being at least, the oft-repeated Beethoven works be omitted from the programs. But later on it will be both interesting and significant to hear Henri Rabaud interpret one of these master works, for he has very definite and, from the modern point of view, reactionary ideas as to how they should be played. He brought this out in the interview he gave Reginald de Koven in the New York Herald a few days ago.

"I was looking over the parts of Beethoven's 'Eroica' symphony, as habitually played by the Boston Orchestra," the Frenchman said, "and I found that former conductors had practically reorchestrated Beethoven, and I was put to no little trouble in attempting to restore the original Beethoven expression. I discovered that the trumpet parts had been entirely rewritten. This, of course, owing to the inferior qualities of the instruments in Beethoven's time, might be considered permissible. But the tampering with the other parts, such as arranging the scherzo for eight horns instead of three, and the doubling and entire disturbance of the wood wind conditions, strikes me as pure vandalism. As an earnest upholder of the pure Beethoven tradition I personally would not presume to change one note of a Beethoven score, and I considered that any modern conductor, be he Mahler, Muck or any other, who has presumed to tamper with the greatest masterworks that the Art of Music knows, is not only presumptuous but even impudent."

From which it will be seen that M. Rabaud has little sympathy with the restless musical intransigeants who maintain that Beethoven will never prove interesting to the modern concertgoer unless his works be reorchestrated by Richard Strauss!

NEWS

ress: Baltimore, Md.

NOV 30

Society will be well represented at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Wednesday night. This will be the occasion of the local debut of the Orchestra's new director, M. Henri Rabaud, who is one of the most distinguished of modern French musicians.

The first Boston Symphony concert revealed the fact that the difficulties the organization has experienced during the last year had the effect of diminishing the subscription list considerably, but it is expected that it will gradually regain its social prestige. The Boston patronage is extremely fashionable.

n SUN

ress: New York City.

DEC 8 - 1916

RABAUD LEADS WITH BRILLIANT CLARITY

Matinee of Boston Symphony Orchestra Proves Joy to Music Admirers.

CLASSIC AND ROMANTIC

Conductor's Sense of Humor Revealed in Selections for Varied Programme.

The matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was one of much beauty. Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer, who has become conductor of the organization, had prepared a programme in which the contrasts were like Ouida's lemons and rum, very chic. Weber's glowing overture to "Euryanthe," Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier" and Borodin's B minor symphony swept a chromatic scale of opulent character. It was a programme to display the most intimate qualities of the orchestra and to publish the conductor's feeling for both classic and romantic music as well as his sense of humor.

Mr. Rabaud survived his self-appointed ordeal in excellent condition. There have been more turbulent readings of the Weber overture, but this one realized the gallant splendors of the mediæval court, the sophisticated elegance of Adolar's love song and even the hazy symbolism of the pictorial episode so dear to the historians. Weber's brilliancy and incisiveness lost nothing at Mr. Rabaud's hands.

Jupiter Proves a Delight.

The Mozart performance was a joy of joys. Many learned Thebans have told us reasons why this symphony was honored with the title of the chief god of Rome. It has been declared that its calm serenity was its claim to resemblance to the majestic front of Jove, and Mr. Rabaud's reading did indeed present us such a symphony, smiling

As Jupiter
On Juno smiles when he impregns the clouds
That shed May flowers.

Martial glory, romantic adoration and mystery pervaded the Weber work, but through the clear pages of this symphony as we heard it yesterday shone the wholesome and golden rays of unsullied sunlight. The performance was one of ravishing clarity, balance and smoothness, while in the entrance of the fugato in the finale there was one brief but convincing proclamation of Jove's majesty. Let it be added that again Mr. Rabaud commanded the gratitude of those who reverence the classics by using just those wind instruments prescribed by Mozart and no others.

A Body of Beautiful Sound.

For the rest of the programme nothing much need be said, except perhaps this, that Mr. Rabaud brought out the chameleon color scheme and relentless rhythm of the Dukas scherzo admirably. Furthermore he found it practicable to make the climax with which the composer seeks to denote the apprentice's catastrophe without causing the splitting of any brass blower's lips or the breaking of any drum head. That fine feeling for tonal quality in an orchestra which distinguishes the French was manifested in a comforting manner. We may cherish a reasonable confidence that no matter what the Boston symphonists may play under Mr. Rabaud's beat they will always produce a body of beautiful sound.

As usual the national anthem was played before the concert. Before the Dukas number the orchestra rose and under Mr. Rabaud's direction played "God Save the King," in honor of the day. The audience received the British hymn with prolonged applause.

TIMES

ess: New York City

DEC 8 - 1

Rabaud Gets Ovation at "Marouf."

New York's interest in the newest musician from overseas was shown again when an audience at the Brooklyn Academy last night gave an ovation to Henri Rabaud, the Boston Symphony conductor, who had waited over to hear his opera "Marouf" sung by a Metropolitan cast. The smaller house enhanced both play and music, and when Chairman Leaming of the Brooklyn opera committee congratulated M. Rabaud, who rose to meet him, there was prolonged applause. The composer sent a wreath to his opera's heroine, Mme. Melda, who sang the British anthem in honor of Britain's Day.

EVENING TELEGRAM

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 3 - 1916

RABAUD PROVES A FINE CONDUCTOR

Leads Boston Symphony in Highly Diversified Program With Great Success

Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who conquered by proxy as the composer of "Marouf" at the opening of the local opera season, conquered in person last evening at the head of his orchestra, which appeared in the second concert at the Academy.

Mr. Rabaud gave a highly diversified program, consisting of the classic Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the modern French "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas and the Neo-Russian Second Symphony of Borodin. Thanks to our own Philadelphia Orchestra, whose conductor, Mr. Stokowski, keeps local musical circles well informed as to modern compositions as well as keeping the classics well in mind, all of these numbers were familiar to the audience.

The Boston Orchestra shows a decided improvement since its appearance here last month. While it cannot be said that it has fully regained the perfection of orchestral technique it once had, still there was a noticeable improvement in tone quality, attack and precision. The chief fault last evening was in the uncertainty as to "letting go" of the longer notes, and in this the first violins were the chief offenders. This fault, however, disappeared almost altogether after the first movement of the Beethoven Symphony. Above all, there was an absence of the restlessness and uncertainty which was very apparent in the orchestra at the first concert.

The chief interest of the concert naturally centered in the conducting of Mr. Rabaud, who proved himself to be one of the best orchestral leaders that has been heard here in a long time. He is perfectly at home in the three different schools of which his program was made up and showed himself a musician of taste, wide culture and strong though cultivated temperament. Unlike most of the French conductors, he is not afraid to use the full strength of the orchestra in the fortissimos, although the tone is not forced, and his pianissimos are not so exaggerated as to lose all color. The Beethoven Symphony was read with a force and spirit in the allegros which was well in keeping with the best traditions of Beethoven. Strangely enough, the famous Allegretto was taken at a rather vigorous speed and the orchestral tone at times lacked smoothness. The Scherzo and the Finale, however, have had few finer readings in this city. Mr. Rabaud's interpretation may be described as classic in its general outlines, although full of temperament and not refined to a point inconsistent with the vigor which is always found in a Beethoven Symphony.

In the Dukas Scherzo, Mr. Rabaud's reading may be taken as authoritative, as he is a contemporary composer with Dukas and knew him in Paris musical circles. It was taken considerably slower than has been heard here before and worked out in the greatest detail. It is program music of the most pronounced type, meaning nothing unless the story which it describes is understood clearly.

The Borodin Symphony, with its barbaric melodic cast and its Oriental color, was also admirably rendered by Mr. Rabaud, who clearly is as much at home in the Neo-Russian school as he is in the classic or the modern French. The richness of the orchestration and the scholarly working out of the thematic development were empasized by the conductor in such a way as almost to conceal the thinness of invention and of melodic inspiration which the composition shows at times, especially in the slow movement.

Mr. Rabaud, like Mr. Monteux, who conducted the first concert of the orchestra, showed himself a master of detail; but, unlike him, it is a mastery of orchestral detail rather than detail of composition such as Mr. Monteux revealed to such a remarkable degree in the Cesar Franck Symphony. Every accent, every entrance of the various instruments and every dynamic change was clearly indicated by the conductor, who is not economical of gesture and who subordinates grace to effectiveness. The program was short, even though it contained two symphonies, and the conductor held the closest attention of the audience from the first note until the last.

Eagle

ess Brooklyn, N. Y

Boston Symphony Orchestra

An important event to many will be the appearance of Josef Hofmann with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening next. But far more important to all, despite Mr. Hofmann's choice of the beloved concerto of Chopin in E minor, will be the introductory bow to Brooklyn of Henri Rabaud as the new and permanently engaged conductor of the orchestra.

If his acclaim in Boston is any sign, Mr. Rabaud has more than qualified for the distinguished place. And behind Boston lies a precedent of long years to his credit. Of musical parentage, of early academic attainments, he has ranked with the first conductors of Paris at opera and concert both. More than this, and what is rare among the best of conductors, he has been a prolific and successful composer both in small and large forms, of which the Second Symphony has often been performed in this country, and the piquant opera, "Marouf," is well known at the Metropolitan Opera.

The program opens fittingly with a classic, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, wherein Brooklyn may pass upon the judgment of Boston that Mr. Rabaud's is a martial, vigorous and keen-visioned reading. In addition to the Chopin concerto there will be the symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," by the conductor's compatriot, Saint-Saens.

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music tomorrow night will be conducted by Henri Rabaud, the new permanent French conductor. This will be M. Rabaud's first appearance here with the orchestra, which was directed by Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, at its first concert in this city. Since M. Rabaud's career, personal characteristics and achievements were discussed in these columns in connection with the presentation of his opera "Marouf" here three weeks ago, it is unnecessary to add personal details at this time.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night will begin the Beethoven Seventh Symphony. The second number will be Borodin's Second Symphony. The program will conclude with "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," of Dukas.

"Who is so foolish as to confuse Mozart, Beethoven and Haydn with the spirit of Prussianism?" said Mr. Rabaud, in commenting on the first number on his program. "You are giving the 'Huns' too much credit."

In this connection it seems about time to remind some of our timorous program makers that the best years of Wagner's life were spent in waging so bitter a war against autocracy that he was forced to live in exile in Switzerland for years because of his political reform activities. Yet Wagner, despite his fight for democracy in Germany, despite the cosmopolitanism of his mighty music, and despite the plain fact that the war is over, remains excluded from orchestral programs and the opera season as well. It would be more than interesting to know just what definite reason can be vouchsafed for such a state of affairs while both the French conductor of the Boston Orchestra, and the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra give us Beethoven symphonies and we are given as well the music of Brahms, who was one of Wagner's contemporaries.

If our intellectual standards and musical tastes are to be patterned after the ridiculous example set by Pittsburgh last season, when the police department of that enlightened city undertook to censor the program arranged by Mr. Stokowski containing orchestral excerpts from "Tristan," then let us frankly acknowledge that fact. Else let us have again the music which is no more the property of Prussianism than are sunlight and air.

IN "TOSCA" ON TUESDAY

Further to deny ourselves the greatest music the world has ever known because of prejudice founded in ignorance, is as sensible at it would be for a starving Belgian to refuse to eat grain that might, by chance, have been grown in Germany. The enormous appetite for Wagnerian music which has been sufficient to crowd the Academy of Music to overflowing for every all-Wagner program in the past has not suddenly vanished. It is an appetite that will sooner or later cry for food. The conductor who is astute and courageous enough to recognize it as a great popular demand and satisfy it will have the honor of performing a lasting service for the cause of music, and will win the gratitude of hosts of real music lovers.

Walter Damrosch has already announced his intention of playing Wagnerian music in Philadelphia this season with the New York Symphony. At his first Philadelphia concert in the Academy of Music last Wednesday night, Mr. Damrosch personally told the writer the only reason that could be advanced for excluding it was the German language. This objection, of course, cannot be applied to orchestral programs.

If the language is the real objection in the field of opera, why not have versions of the music dramas prepared in French, Italian, Spanish, Esperanto, or as a last desperate resort, in English. The Scheldt River in "Lohengrin" might be renamed the Marne and the characters relabeled all around, and the names of Greek mythology might be substituted for the heroes of Norse legend in the "Nibelungen Ring," with similar changes in the other music dramas, wherever desirable. But let us have the music that is the culmination of musical progress or a substantial reason for relegating it any longer to senseless oblivion.

TRIBUNE

ess New York City

DEC 1 1

Composer of 'Marouf' Will Conduct Here Next Thursday

Henri Rabaud, the new and permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season, will make his first appearance in New York with the orchestra on Thursday evening, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Rabaud comes of a musical family. As a young man he won the Prix de Rome. He has conducted at the Paris Opera, the Opera Comique and at concerts given by the Lamoureux and Conservatorie orchestras. In Rome and Vienna he organized concerts to introduce contemporary French music.

He has many compositions to his credit. Among them his opera "Marouf" is perhaps the best known here in New York.

om EVENING GLOBE

ddress: New York City

ate DEC 6 -

Music.

Henri Rabaud Conducts the Boston Symphony.

When the reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra visited New York last month for its first concerts of the new season, Pierre Monteux, the admirable French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was temporarily filling the conductorship. After the New York concerts Mr. Monteux returned to his post at the opera house and Henri Rabaud, the newly engaged permanent conductor of the orchestra, who was late in reaching this country, took up the baton. It was Mr. Rabaud who conducted the Boston orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening and will conduct it there again to-morrow afternoon.

A tall, spare man, somewhat bald, with grizzling beard, a modest scholar in appearance, Mr. Rabaud walked to the conductor's desk quite without fuss and feathers—a simplicity that characterized all his behavior of the evening. His bearing, indeed, was matter of fact; he might have been conducting at that desk for the thousandth time instead of the first. His beat is sharp and decisive, whether he reduces it almost to the imperceptible or resorts to more lavish gesture. A quiet conductor, he nevertheless impresses by his authority both as musician and as man. The great audience applauded him moderately on his entrance, but after he had led the National Anthem it gave him a longer and more cordial greeting. The cordiality increased into enthusiasm as Mr. Rabaud gave evidence of his ability in a programme that consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Although new to us as a conductor, Mr. Rabaud of Paris is already known and liked as the composer of Arabian "Marouf," the performance of which at the Brooklyn Academy of Music to-morrow night he is to witness. Likewise many Americans must have observed him in the past as a conductor at the Paris Opéra. To students of operatic history it is further interesting to know that he is a grand-nephew of Mme Dorus-Gras, one of the great singers of Paris in the first half of the nineteenth century, who "created" Alice in "Robert le Diable," the Queen in "Les Huguenots," and Eudoxie in "La Juive," being the associate of such singers as Cinti-Damereau, Cornélie Falcon, Nourrit, and Levasseur. It is noteworthy that Mme Dorus-Gras survived until 1896 and Mme Falcon until 1897, though careless persons remembering their names might have supposed both dead for decades!

The Beethoven symphony, stripped of "improvements" introduced by Dr. Muck, was read with a Gallic clarity. The first movement seemed almost Mozartean in limpidity and stressed perfection of form. The funeral march was of a noble simplicity. Inevitably one thought of the men who in this war have given their lives that the world may be free. Anything less than such a simplicity would have been inexpressibly cheap. The scherzo worked up to the tempestuous after its trio re-Beethovenized. For the finale Mr. Rabaud set a dashing pace, but at times greatly broadened its flow, though never to the detriment of his general design.

The Saint-Saëns piece, a beautiful work, unjustly neglected here in favor of its companion piece "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," was given superbly. There was tremendous verve and a broad grasp of design, as well as exquisite articulation of detail. The Rimsky-Korsakoff caprice was a riot of orchestral splendor; you forgot it was a Russian viewing Spain, you were blinded by the red and gold of Spain itself, wooed by its warmth.

Altogether a notable concert and a brilliant début for the distinguished Frenchman who has come to rule the Boston orchestra with such final ability. As for the orchestra itself, an additional month of rehearsing together has further fused the parts of the ensemble and smoothed away any roughnesses that were detected when it played here in November. The work of reconstruction so capably begun by Mr. Monteux Mr. Rabaud has supplemented admirably. In particular the strings are glowing again like burnished gold.

PITTS SANBORN.

NEWS

ess: Baltimore, Md.

DEC 5 - 19

Many society people will be at the Lyric tonight to hear the second performance of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to greet the organizations' new director, Henri Rabaud, the celebrated French conductor and composer, who will make his local debut. The numbers will include Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "The Youth of Hercules"; Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

ENQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 3 1918

HENRI RABAUD'S DEBUT WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Proves Conductor of Exceptional Merit in Season's Second Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the present season at the Academy of Music last evening when Mr. Henri Rabaud made his local debut as its conductor, and a programme was presented which comprised Beethoven's Seventh symphony in A major, the second symphony of Borodin in B minor, and the sparkling scherzo by Dukas entitled, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." It cannot be said that this arrangement is one that augers well for Mr. Rabaud's abilities as a programme maker. He was presumably not responsible for the circumstance that the Beethoven number was played here by the Symphony Society of New York no longer ago than last week. That was presumably one of those curious coincidences which occur from time to time with such mysterious frequency and which one wishes that there were some way of avoiding. But although there is good authority for placing two symphonies on a single programme to do so is not judicious and a selection of another character would have been preferable.

Mr. Rabaud's coming to this city with the Boston organization as a successor to the unlamented Muck had been awaited with a good deal of interest, and it is not supposable that any of the expectations with which it had been regarded were disappointed in the result. There is nothing sensational about Mr. Rabaud's methods. He is a gentleman of a retiring disposition who took his place on the conductor's stand with a self effacing modesty, and whose reading of the Beethoven score was not remarkable for any disturbing originality of view or precedent breaking innovations. Its distinctive features were rather grace and charm and a beautiful refinement than breadth or vigor, and it was more in the lovely allegretto, which was played with an extraordinary refinement of tone and eloquence of sentiment, than in the movements requiring more fire and force and fervor, that it was most artistically effective and satisfying. Yet in its entirety the performance was lucid and vital and intelligently sympathetic, and the enjoyment which it afforded was great.

It is as yet too early to form a definite judgment, for a single hearing does not furnish a sufficiently broad criterion to justify an unreserved opinion, but so far as could be determined from last evening's demonstration, Mr. Rabaud is a conductor of exceptional merit and ability. That he has a strong feeling for rhythm was shown by the flexible and sinuous motion which he imparted to the dancing measures of the Beethoven music, while his keen sense of proportion appeared in an analysis and accentuation of the score before him which invested each detail with its due importance and constantly preserved the perspective of the whole. His gradations of light and shade were also very skillfully and artistically managed and altogether the impression which he produced was distinctly favorable. He was most cordially received and the audience went out of its way to express its appreciation of his work. When he shall have as good material to handle as had his predecessor and when he shall have trained his forces to the same degree of efficiency and homogeneity he may be expected to do better still.

Although of less interest and smaller consequence than the other, the Borodin symphony is yet a work which contains so much of melodic beauty and harmonic impressiveness as to be very well worth hearing, and it is not imaginable that any of its value or significance was lost in Mr. Rabaud's careful and appreciative interpretation of it. Midway on the programme came the Dukas scherzo which afforded the orchestra an opportunity for the exhibition of its technique, of which it made the most, and its delivery of this sparkling and fascinating music was not the least notable feature of the evening's entertainment. The next of these concerts will occur on Monday evening, January 6.

EVENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 30 1918

RABAUD WILL DIRECT

First Appearance Here To Be With Boston Symphony.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its second appearance of the season in the Lyric next Wednesday evening, Henri Rabaud, the distinguished Parisian conductor, will make his first bow to Baltimore as its permanent head.

If the acclaim of Boston is any sign, Mr. Rabaud may be depended upon not only to maintain the old traditional standard, but to enhance it. At the Conservatoire he won the Prix de Rome, and later organized and led concerts in Rome and Vienna. He has since conducted at the Paris Opera regularly, at the Opera Comique, the Lamoureux and Conservatoire concerts from time to time.

The program for Wednesday opens with a classic, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. "The Sorcerr's Apprentice," by Dukas, will represent the music of his own country. Finally, Borodin's Second Symphony in B minor will try Rabaud's skill.

m TIMES
ress: New York City
DEC 8

gram-maker of taste. On the present occasion there were two symphonies, and if that sounds appaling to those guileless and tone-deaf souls who can endure unmusical comedy (?) by the hour, let us explain that the first symphony was Mozart's in C, called the "Jupiter," though for modern ears there is little that is Jovian in its charming measures. As we thought the new conductor was at his happiest in it, though he rather dragged the Menuetto and did not rush the Finale. But he made up speed in his reading of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas, which under his spirited whip-lash went at a True Scherzo pace—taking Mendelssohn, and not Beethoven or Chopin as models in tempo.

It was a highly colored performance, showing off to advantage the splendid material of the various orchestral choirs. A clever composition it is with its evanescent memories of Wagner—the "Ho-Yo-To-Ho" and of Liszt; even a morsel of Puccini anticipates the "Tosca." And Grieg, in the limping rhythms of "The Hall of the Mountain King," (Peer Gynt suite;) and Gounod in his "Funeral March of a Marionette." Dukas is well versed in the literature of his art.

The afternoon began with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" and ended with Borodine's B minor symphony. Both were accorded a vigorous interpretation, though the Russian melancholy was not profoundly felt in the Andante of the Borodine work. Not having swallowed enough music during the last week, we braved tunnels and bridges Friday evening and heard Mr. Rabaud conduct Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in Brooklyn. As was the case with the Eroica the previous night at Carnegie Hall, there was more light than heat in the performance. He gave Josef Hofmann a careful accompaniment to the Chopin E minor concerto, but in the Rondo there was a perilous episode, an anxious moment when scrambled eggs were overheard frying. But whether it was the too rigid beat of the conductor or a lapse of memory on Hofmann's part, deponent saith not. All ended brilliantly.

a PUBLIC LEDGER
ress Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, will give its second concert this season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2.

Interest in this concert will naturally center in the new conductor, who is making his first appearance here. Mr. Rabaud, one of the most distinguished musicians of France, has had a long and brilliant career as conductor both of opera and concert. He was received by the symphony audiences in Boston with the greatest enthusiasm and won immediate favor. A tall, slender, dignified man of kindly appearance, he has shown already in his work there that he is full of real Gallic fire.

Philip Hale, in the Boston program book, provides the following biographical sketch of Mr. Rabaud:

"Henri Benjamin Rabaud was born in Paris November 10, 1873. He is the son of Hippolyte Francois Rabaud (1839-1900), who was awarded the first prize for violoncello playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1861. Henri Rabaud's grandfather on his mother's side was the celebrated flutist, Vincent Joseph Dorus, born Vansteenkiste (1812-96). He is, therefore, a grand-nephew of the singer Julie Aimee Josephe Dorus-Gras (1804-96). Flutist and singer were born at Valenciennes.

Mr. Rabaud studied composition with Massenet at the Paris Conservatory where in 1894 he was awarded the first grand prix de Rome. After four years at the Villa Medicis he organized and directed with Max d'Ollone orchestral concerts in Rome (1898) and in Vienna (1899) for the purpose of introducing in those cities compositions of contemporaneous French musicians.

As conductor at the Opera, Paris, Mr Rabaud made his first appearance on February 1, 1908. The opera was "Lohengrin." Among the operas he conducted that year were "Tristan and Isolde," "Thais" and Tannhauser." In 1908 he also conducted a Lamoureux concert (February 23). On January 3, 1914, he was appointed first conductor of the Opera in place of Paul Vidal. The war broke out. In 1914-15 he was one of the conductors of the Conservatory Orchestra concerts then given at the Sorbonne. On May 2, 1915, "Marouf," revived at the Opera-Comique, was conducted by the composer. This work by Mr. Rabaud was given at the Metropolitan Opera House in Philadelphia November 19.

The program which Mr. Rabaud has announced for Philadelphia, December 2, is as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A major
Dukas....."L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice.")
Borodin.....Symphony No. 2 in B minor

WORLD
New York City
DEC 8 1918

NO more convincing proof of what may be done with an orchestra by a conductor having finesse and musicianship has been forthcoming than in the case of the Boston Symphony. Considerably changed in personnel from that of last year, this organization came to us a few weeks ago for its opening concerts. In the delayed arrival of its new conductor, Henri Rabaud, the preliminary training was done by Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who also directed the early concerts.

New York was astounded at the changed Boston Symphony Orchestra as fashioned by M. Monteux. It was blatantly noisy and wholly lacking in the tonal refinement which had been its dominant point of distinction. Last Thursday night and yesterday afternoon the visiting organization gave its third and fourth concerts—under M. Rabaud—and it sounded like another orchestra. We would not pronounce it the equal of the old Boston Symphony, but at least it satisfied in reasonable measure.

* * *

One cannot unfailingly estimate the complete worth of either a creative or an interpretative musician by two works or by the same number of performances. We have yet to become thoroughly acquainted with M. Rabaud before pronouncing final judgment upon his capacities to fill his new post. In his start, however, he has made friends. Without fuss or the display of any prima donna airs he has gained the respect of many who know efficient conducting when they sit in its presence and who recognize the effect of skilled and intelligent training.

After Thursday's concert there were several persons who spoke condescendingly of M. Rabaud's abilities. They referred to him as an experienced routinier. And it was amusing to hear the comments of these experts, who are prone to measure a man by what he may have done rather than by his accomplishment of the moment; who belong to the "I-knew-him-when" brigade, living in the past and measuring all present achievements by recollections gone rusty by myopic minds and small-town vision. M. Rabaud may prove to be only a moderately fair conductor, but on Thursday his ability was unquestioned in his interpretation of the greater part of Beethoven's "Eroica," in which his presentation of the continuous flow of the melody was as evident as was his capacity to mould a phrase, to vary his dynamics with unerring taste and to maintain at all times a pure tone from every section of the orchestra that held its balance unwaveringly.

* * *

NO more convincing proof of what may be done with an orchestra by a conductor having finesse and musicianship has been forthcoming than in the case of the Boston Symphony. Considerably changed in personnel from that of last year, this organization came to us a few weeks ago for its opening concerts. In the delayed arrival of its new conductor, Henri Rabaud, the preliminary training was done by Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who also directed the early concerts.

New York was astounded at the changed Boston Symphony Orchestra as fashioned by M. Monteux. It was blatantly noisy and wholly lacking in the tonal refinement which had been its dominant point of distinction. Last Thursday night and yesterday afternoon the visiting organization gave its third and fourth concerts—under M. Rabaud—and it sounded like another orchestra. We would not pronounce it the equal of the old Boston Symphony, but at least it satisfied in reasonable measure ss Philadelphia, Pa.

PUBLIC LEDGER
DEC - 3 1918

HENRI RABAUD LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

New Director Cordially Received at Second Concert in the Academy

PROGRAM

Beethoven.....The Seventh Symphony
Dukas.....Scherzo, "Sorcerer's Apprentice"
Borordin.....Symphony in B minor, No. 2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in its second concert of the season at the Academy last evening. Interest centered largely in the debut of the new permanent director, Henri Rabaud. At the beginning of 1914 Mr. Rabaud was made first conductor of the Paris Opera, and his other distinctions as conductor and composer are many.

Mr. Rabaud takes his art, his audience and himself in the last place seriously and makes his distinctive personality felt at once. His hearers—who were not so numerous as the interest of the occasion warranted—gave a cordial welcome when he first entered to a figure obviously intellectual, aristocratic, distinguished. He is tall, bearded and dignified of aspect, with the demeanor of the contemplative scholar.

The reading of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony was preëminently French. He brought out the more delicate nuances with a scrupulous, painstaking precision. He did not seek to release the full resources of sound latent in his instruments. He dealt in none of those noisy climaxes which are dear to the heart of some leaders. His beat is definite though graceful, his vigilance unceasing. Though evidently a disciplinarian firm of hand, he is not a frigid martinet. At the close of the symphony there was long-continued applause of unmistakable spontaneity. It brought the conductor back from the wings several times, until the men stood with him, and even after that it was not quick to die away.

The familiar "Sorcerer's Apprentice" scherzo, with its humorous relief in which the bassoon is chief comedian, had been skillfully interposed between the two symphonies of which the program was unusually constructed. But for this well-placed humor the concert would have been of a character distinctly somber, for Borodin's muse, speaking in minor accents in his second symphony, does not attempt a suave, mellifluous, ear-tickling strain.

Instead, the first movement deals huge, bold strokes like hammer-blows upon a forge. The material is heroic and epic. Mr. Rabaud gave himself with sympathy to these grandiose moods. In the second movement ("molto vivo") the curious pattering monotone of the stopped horns in the background was deftly introduced. Again in the Andante there was a lyric voice of great beauty from the horns. The first and the third movements seemed to please the audience better than the second and the fourth. The national feeling, as in the case of Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," is strong throughout the work.

F. L. W.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date DEC 7 - 1918

The commendation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new conductor seems to indicate that getting away from German traditions of leadership has not adversely affected it, after all.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 3 - 1918

DEBUT OF RABAUD

French Conductor Directs Boston Symphony Concert Here.

As a pianist is judged by Chopin playing, an orchestral conductor rises or falls by his ability as a Beethoven interpreter. In selecting the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven for his first Philadelphia concert Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at once presented himself as a musician of exceptional power.

Rabaud comes to the Orchestra with the prestige of a distinguished foreign career. He has been identified with both the opera and concert life of Paris, but is first of all a composer of great individuality and charm. His symphonies have been presented here with success, while his Oriental opera, "Marouf," has won wide recognition.

There is little in the appearance of Rabaud to suggest the musician. Tall, thin and ascetic-looking, he might easily be selected as a scientist or doctor of philosophy or letters. His resemblance to Charles Evans Hughes, sometime candidate for the Presidency of the United States, is striking. Rabaud has the glowing temperament of a genuine musician, however, and he did not fail to win his audience last night. His Beethoven playing was of great interest. The hackneyed Seventh Symphony was transformed into something fresh and vital and endowed with a charm that arrested at every turn. The first movement was taken with a more deliberate tempo than we are accustomed to, but the finesse of the orchestral manipulation amply justified the departure. Every voice of the orchestra was heard and the ensemble was perfection itself. Rabaud draws a noble tone, not merely big, but strikingly vital and inspiring.

The allegretto, which we are inured to hearing at funeral pace, was done with a slightly accelerated motion and gained immensely in chorus. The third movement was a veritable ripple of light, sensuous tone. There were marked variations of tempi. Rabund does not hesitate to introduce strong contrasts, both in tone and tempo, but his effects are always surprisingly novel and decidedly unusual. In the finale he worked up a magnificent climax and the conclusion of the symphony found him established with a Philadelphia audience, at least, as a conductor of pronounced ability and one for whom it is safe to predict future popularity.

Unlike his motionless predecessor, Rabund, as a very energetic leader. His motions, however, are so apparently the result of genuine musical inspiration and are so lacking in pose that they are never obtrusive, but soon become part of the man's personal expression.

Last night's audience was small for a Boston Orchestra concert. Probably the two symphonies proved alarming to some unaccustomed to that foreign habit. The Brodin B minor was another form of triumph for Rabaud, the eastern style seeming as much his medium as the Beethoven. Doubtless he is a man of universal musical tastes and power to present any type of music well.

The "L'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, played between the symphonies, aroused great enthusiasm.

CITIZEN
: Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 7 1918

HENRY RABAUD WELCOMED HERE

Boston Orchestra's New Conductor Takes Big Audience by Storm

It was very evident at the Academy of Music last night that exceptional interest was taken in the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This was because of the first appearance in Brooklyn, of the new director, Henri Rabaud. Before the introduction to the first number on the programme, was finished the large audience was ready to give testimony to the fact that the famous organization of artists was again under the direction of a master musician, capable of putting life, sympathy and soul into his work. It is seldom that a Brooklyn assemblage of music lovers lets go of itself completely. That is what occurred last night at the conclusion of Beethoven's seventh symphony. It was a marked tribute to the artistry of the new director of the Boston orchestra that the gathering literally broke loose in applause that did not spend itself until several seconds had elapsed.

One did not have to be "educated" in music to understand and appreciate that the magnificent organization was in thorough sympathy with the man who wielded the baton. He was in absolute control of the interpretation in its every phase. There seemed to be a delightful magic in the way the various instruments responded to his will and there was fascination in the movement of his wand. It commanded thunder or zephyr and all the scale between them and the blending together of emotions in the music was perfect.

The programme was made up of the Beethoven Symphony already referred to, Chopin's Concerto in E minor for piano with orchestra, Josef Hofman being the soloist, and Saint-Saens' "The Youth of Hercules."

The Hofmann number was a wonderful production. The exquisite relations between the great orchestra and the solo harmony of the piano were marvelous.

The new conductor is a prolific composer and remains in Brooklyn to-day to be present this evening at the production of his opera, "Maronf," which will be presented at the Academy.

EVENING MAIL
ss: New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next, this time with its new and permanently engaged conductor, Henri Rabaud, who has recently arrived from France and fulfilled his distinguished function in Boston for an introductory two weeks.

Boston has declared itself fortunate, not only from the taste but from the precedent. Mr. Rabaud's father, grandfather and grand-aunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rom. in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music, conducted at the Opera, the Opera Comique, the Conservatoire and the Lamaoureux concerts. He has a considerable list of compositions to his credit in small and large forms, of which the best known in this country are his Second Symphony, and the opera "Marouf" of several years' standing at the Metropolitan Opera.

A classical symphony stands fittingly at the head of each concert—for Thursday evening Beethoven's "Eroica," and on Saturday afternoon, Mozart's "Jupiter." The rest of the Thursday programme is filled by Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's multi-colored "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Borodin is to provide the Russian number for the Saturday programme with his Second Symphony. For the rest, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the brilliant and quick-witted scherzo by the conductor's "confrere" Dukas, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

ENQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 3 1918

HENRI RABAUD'S DEBUT WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Proves Conductor of Exceptional Merit in Season's Second Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the present season at the Academy of Music last evening when Mr. Henri Rabaud made his local debut as its conductor, and a programme was presented which comprised Beethoven's Seventh symphony in A major, the second symphony of Borodin in B minor, and the sparkling scherzo by Dukas entitled, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." It cannot be said that this arrangement is one that augers well for Mr. Rabaud's abilities as a programme maker. He was presumably not responsible for the circumstance that the Beethoven number was played here by the Symphony Society of New York no longer ago than last week. That was presumably one of those curious coincidences which occur from time to time with such mysterious frequency and which one wishes that there were some way of avoiding. But although there is good authority for placing two symphonies on a single programme to do so is not judicious and a selection of another character would have been preferable.

Mr. Rabaud's coming to this city with the Boston organization as a successor to the unlamented Muck had been awaited with a good deal of interest, and it is not supposable that any of the expectations with which it had been regarded were disappointed in the result. There is nothing sensational about Mr. Rabaud's methods. He is a gentleman of a retiring disposition who took his place on the conductor's stand with a self effacing modesty, and whose reading of the Beethoven score was not remarkable for any disturbing originality of view or precedent breaking innovations. Its distinctive features were rather grace and charm and a beautiful refinement than breadth or vigor, and it was more in the lovely allegretto, which was played with an extraordinary refinement of tone and eloquence of sentiment, than in the movements requiring more fire and force and fervor, that it was most artistically effective and satisfying. Yet in its entirety the performance was lucid and vital and intelligently sympathetic, and the enjoyment which it afforded was great.

It is as yet too early to form a definite judgment, for a single hearing does not furnish a sufficiently broad criterion to justify an unreserved opinion, but so far as could be determined from last evening's demonstration, Mr. Rabaud is a conductor of exceptional merit and ability. That he has a strong feeling for rhythm was shown by the flexible and sinuous motion which he imparted to the dancing measures of the Beethoven music, while his keen sense of proportion appeared in an analysis and accentuation of the score before him which invested each detail with its due importance and constantly preserved the perspective of the whole. His gradations of light and shade were also very skillfully and artistically managed and altogether the impression which he produced was distinctly favorable. He was most cordially received and the audience went out of its way to express its appreciation of his work. When he shall have as good material to handle as had his predecessor and when he shall have trained his forces to the same degree of efficiency and homogeneity he may be expected to do better still.

Although of less interest and smaller consequence than the other, the Borodin symphony is yet a work which contains so much of melodic beauty and harmonic impressiveness as to be very well worth hearing, and it is not imaginable that any of its value or significance was lost in Mr. Rabaud's careful and appreciative interpretation of it. Midway on the programme came the Dukas scherzo which afforded the orchestra an opportunity for the exhibition of its technique, and of which it made the most, and its delivery of this sparkling and fascinating music was not the least notable feature of the evening's entertainment. The next of these concerts will occur on Monday evening, January 6.

TIMES
New York City

gram-maker of taste. On the present occasion there were two symphonies, and if that sounds appaling to those guileless and tone-deaf souls who can endure unmusical comedy (?) by the hour, let us explain that the first symphony was Mozart's in C, called the "Jupiter," though for modern ears there is little that is Jovian in its charming measures. As we thought the new conductor was at his happiest in it, though he rather dragged the Menuetto and did not rush the Finale. But he made up speed in his reading of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas, which under his spirited whip-lash went at a True Scherzo pace—taking Mendelssohn, and not Beethoven or Chopin as models in tempo.

It was a highly colored performance, showing off to advantage the splendid material of the various orchestral choirs. A clever composition it is with its evanescent memories of Wagner—the "Ho-Yo-To-Ho" and of Liszt; even a morsel of Puccini anticipates the "Tosca." And Grieg, in the limping rhythms of "The Hall of the Mountain King," (Peer Gynt suite;) and Gounod in his "Funeral March of a Marionette." Dukas is well versed in the literature of his art.

The afternoon began with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" and ended with Borodine's B minor symphony. Both were accorded a vigorous interpretation, though the Russian melancholy was not profoundly felt in the Andante of the Borodine work. Not having swallowed enough music during the last week, we braved tunnels and bridges Friday evening and heard Mr. Rabaud conduct Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in Brooklyn. As was the case with the Eroica the previous night at Carnegie Hall, there was more light than heat in the performance. He gave Josef Hofmann a careful accompaniment to the Chopin E minor concerto, but in the Rondo there was a perilous episode, an anxious moment when scrambled eggs were overheard frying. But whether it was the too rigid beat of the conductor or a lapse of memory on Hofmann's part, deponent saith not. All ended brilliantly.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, will give its second concert this season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2.

Interest in this concert will naturally center in the new conductor, who is making his first appearance here. Mr. Rabaud, one of the most distinguished musicians of France, has had a long and brilliant career as conductor both of opera and concert. He was received by the symphony audiences in Boston with the greatest enthusiasm and won immediate favor. A tall, slender, dignified man of kindly appearance, he has shown already in his work there that he is full of real Gallic fire.

Philip Hale, in the Boston program book, provides the following biographical sketch of Mr. Rabaud:

"Henri Benjamin Rabaud was born in Paris November 10, 1873. He is the son of Hippolyte Francois Rabaud (1839-1900), who was awarded the first prize for violoncello playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1861. Henri Rabaud's grandfather on his mother's side was the celebrated flutist, Vincent Joseph Dorus, born Vansteenkiste (1812-96). He is, therefore, a grand-nephew of the singer Julie Aimee Josephe Dorus-Gras (1804-96). Flutist and singer were born at Valenciennes.

Mr. Rabaud studied composition with Massenet at the Paris Conservatory where in 1894 he was awarded the first grand prix de Rome. After four years at the Villa Medicis he organized and directed with Max d'Ollone orchestra concerts in Rome (1898) and in Vienna (1899) for the purpose of introducing in those cities compositions of contemporaneous French musicians.

As conductor at the Opera, Paris, Mr Rabaud made his first appearance on February 1, 1908. The opera was "Lohengrin." Among the operas he conducted that year were "Tristan and Isolde," "Thais" and Tannhauser." In 1908 he also conducted a Lamoureux concert (February 23). On January 3, 1914, he was appointed first conductor of the Opera in place of Paul Vidal. The war broke out. In 1914-15 he was one of the conductors of the Conservatory Orchestra concerts then given at the Sorbonne. On May 2, 1915, "Marouf," revived at the Opera-Comique, was conducted by the composer. This work by Mr. Rabaud was given at the Metropolitan Opera House in Philadelphia November 19.

The program which Mr. Rabaud has announced for Philadelphia, December 2, is as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A major
Dukas....."L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice.")
Borodin.....Symphony No. 2 in B minor

WORLD
New York City

NO more convincing proof of what may be done with an orchestra by a conductor having finesse and musicianship has been forthcoming than in the case of the Boston Symphony. Considerably changed in personnel from that of last year, this organization came to us a few weeks ago for its opening concerts. In the delayed arrival of its new conductor, Henri Rabaud, the preliminary training was done by Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who also directed the early concerts.

New York was astounded at the changed Boston Symphony Orchestra as fashioned by M. Monteux. It was blatantly noisy and wholly lacking in the tonal refinement which had been its dominant point of distinction. Last Thursday night and yesterday afternoon the visiting organization gave its third and fourth concerts—under M. Rabaud—and it sounded like another orchestra. We would not pronounce it the equal of the old Boston Symphony, but at least it satisfied in reasonable measure.

* * *

One cannot unfailingly estimate the complete worth of either a creative or an interpretative musician by two works or by the same number of performances. We have yet to become thoroughly acquainted with M. Rabaud before pronouncing final judgment upon his capacities to fill his new post. In his start, however, he has made friends. Without fuss or the display of any prima donna airs he has gained the respect of many who know efficient conducting when they sit in its presence and who recognize the effect of skilled and intelligent training.

After Thursday's concert there were several persons who spoke condescendingly of M. Rabaud's abilities. They referred to him as an experienced routinier. And it was amusing to hear the comments of these experts, who are prone to measure a man by what he may have done rather than by his accomplishment of the moment; who belong to the "I-knew-him-when" brigade, living in the past and measuring all present achievements by recollections gone rusty by myopic minds and small-town vision. M. Rabaud may prove to be only a moderately fair conductor, but on Thursday his ability was unquestioned in his interpretation of the greater part of Beethoven's "Eroica," in which his presentation of the continuous flow of the melody was as evident as was his capacity to mould a phrase, to vary his dynamics with unerring taste and to maintain at all times a pure tone from every section of the orchestra that held its balance unwaveringly.

* * *

NO more convincing proof of what may be done with an orchestra by a conductor having finesse and musicianship has been forthcoming than in the case of the Boston Symphony. Considerably changed in personnel from that of last year, this organization came to us a few weeks ago for its opening concerts. In the delayed arrival of its new conductor, Henri Rabaud, the preliminary training was done by Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who also directed the early concerts.

New York was astounded at the changed Boston Symphony Orchestra as fashioned by M. Monteux. It was blatantly noisy and wholly lacking in the tonal refinement which had been its dominant point of distinction. Last Thursday night and yesterday afternoon the visiting organization gave its third and fourth concerts—under M. Rabaud—and it sounded like another orchestra. We would not pronounce it the equal of the old Boston Symphony, but at least it satisfied in reasonable measure

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC - 3 1918

HENRI RABAUD LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

New Director Cordially Received at Second Concert in the Academy

PROGRAM

Beethoven.....The Seventh Symphony
Dukas.....Scherzo, "Sorcerer's Apprentice"
Borordin.....Symphony in B minor, No. 2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in its second concert of the season at the Academy last evening. Interest centered largely in the debut of the new permanent director, Henri Rabaud. At the beginning of 1914 Mr. Rabaud was made first conductor of the Paris Opera, and his other distinctions as conductor and composer are many.

Mr. Rabaud takes his art, his audience and himself in the last place seriously and makes his distinctive personality felt at once. His hearers—who were not so numerous as the interest of the occasion warranted—gave a cordial welcome when he first entered to a figure obviously intellectual, aristocratic, distinguished. He is tall, bearded and dignified of aspect, with the demeanor of the contemplative scholar.

The reading of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony was preëminently French. He brought out the more delicate nuances with a scrupulous, painstaking precision. He did not seek to release the full resources of sound latent in his instruments. He dealt in none of those noisy climaxes which are dear to the heart of some leaders. His beat is definite though graceful, his vigilance unceasing. Though evidently a disciplinarian firm of hand, he is not a frigid martinet. At the close of the symphony there was long-continued applause of unmistakable spontaneity. It brought the conductor back from the wings several times, until the men stood with him, and even after that it was not quick to die away.

The familiar "Sorcerer's Apprentice" scherzo, with its humorous relief in which the bassoon is chief comedian, had been skillfully interposed between the two symphonies of which the program was unusually constructed. But for this well-placed humor the concert would have been of a character distinctly somber, for Borodin's muse, speaking in minor accents in his second symphony, does not attempt a suave, mellifluous, ear-tickling strain.

Instead, the first movement deals huge, bold strokes like hammer-blows upon a forge. The material is heroic and epic. Mr. Rabaud gave himself with sympathy to these grandiose moods. In the second movement ("molto vivo") the curious pattering monotone of the stopped horns in the background was deftly introduced. Again in the Andante there was a lyric voice of great beauty from the horns. The first and the third movements seemed to please the audience better than the second and the fourth. The national feeling, as in the case of Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," is strong throughout the work.

F. L. W.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

HENRY RABAUD WELCOMED HERE

Boston Orchestra's New Conductor Takes Big Audience by Storm

It was very evident at the Academy of Music last night that exceptional interest was taken in the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This was because of the first appearance in Brooklyn, of the new director, Henri Rabaud. Before the introduction to the first number on the programme, was finished the large audience was ready to give testimony to the fact that the famous organization of artists was again under the direction of a master musician, capable of putting life, sympathy and soul into his work. It is seldom that a Brooklyn assemblage of music lovers lets go of itself completely. That is what occurred last night at the conclusion of Beethoven's seventh symphony. It was a marked tribute to the artistry of the new director of the Boston orchestra that the gathering literally broke loose in applause that did not spend itself until several seconds had elapsed.

One did not have to be "educated" in music" to understand and appreciate that the magnificent organization was in thorough sympathy with the man who wielded the baton. He was in absolute control of the interpretation in its every phase. There seemed to be a delightful magic in the way the various instruments responded to his will and there was fascination in the movement of his wand. It commanded thunder or zephyr and all the scale between them and the blending together of emotions in the music was perfect.

The programme was made up of the Beethoven Symphony already referred to, Chopin's Concerto in E minor for piano with orchestra, Josef Hofman being the soloist, and Saint-Saens' "The Youth of Hercules."

The Hofmann number was a wonderful production. The exquisite relations between the great orchestra and the solo harmony of the piano were marvelous.

The new conductor is a prolific composer and remains in Brooklyn to-day to be present this evening at the production of his opera, "Marouf," which will be presented at the Academy.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date DEC 7 - 1918

The commendation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new conductor seems to indicate that getting away from German traditions of leadership has not adversely affected it, after all.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 2 - 1918

DEBUT OF RABAUD

French Conductor Directs Boston Symphony Concert Here.

As a pianist is judged by Chopin playing, an orchestral conductor rises or falls by his ability as a Beethoven interpreter. In selecting the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven for his first Philadelphia concert Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at once presented himself as a musician of exceptional power.

Rabaud comes to the Orchestra with the prestige of a distinguished foreign career. He has been identified with both the opera and concert life of Paris, but is first of all a composer of great individuality and charm. His symphonies have been presented here with success, while his Oriental opera, "Marouf," has won wide recognition.

There is little in the appearance of Rabaud to suggest the musician. Tall, thin and ascetic-looking, he might easily be selected as a scientist or doctor of philosophy or letters. His resemblance to Charles Evans Hughes, sometime candidate for the Presidency of the United States, is striking. Rabaud has the glowing temperament of a genuine musician, however, and he did not fail to win his audience last night. His Beethoven playing was of great interest. The hackneyed Seventh Symphony was transformed into something fresh and vital and endowed with a charm that arrested at every turn. The first movement was taken with a more deliberate tempo than we are accustomed to, but the finesse of the orchestral manipulation amply justified the departure. Every voice of the orchestra was heard and the ensemble was perfection itself. Rabaud draws a noble tone, not merely big, but strikingly vital and inspiring.

The allegretto, which we are inured to hearing at funeral pace, was done with a slightly accelerated motion and gained immensely in chorus. The third movement was a veritable ripple of light, sensuous tone. There were marked variations of tempi. Rabund does not hesitate to introduce strong contrasts, both in tone and tempo, but his effects are always surprisingly novel and decidedly unusual. In the finale he worked up a magnificent climax and the conclusion of the symphony found him established with a Philadelphia audience, at least, as a conductor of pronounced ability and one for whom it is safe to predict future popularity.

Unlike his motionless predecessor, Rabund, as a very energetic leader. His motions, however, are so apparently the result of genuine musical inspiration and are so lacking in pose that they are never obtrusive, but soon become part of the man's personal expression.

Last night's audience was small for a Boston Orchestra concert. Probably the two symphonies proved alarming to some unaccustomed to that foreign habit. The Brodin B minor was another form of triumph for Rabaud, the eastern style seeming as much his medium as the Beethoven. Doubtless he is a man of universal musical tastes and power to present any type of music well.

The "L'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, played between the symphonies, aroused great enthusiasm.

EVENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 30 1918

RABAUD WILL DIRECT

First Appearance Here To Be With Boston Symphony.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its second appearance of the season in the Lyric next Wednesday evening, Henri Rabaud, the distinguished Parisian conductor, will make his first bow to Baltimore as its permanent head.

If the acclaim of Boston is any sign, Mr. Rabaud may be depended upon not only to maintain the old traditional standard, but to enhance it. At the Conservatoire he won the Prix de Rome, and later organized and led concerts in Rome and Vienna. He has since conducted at the Paris Opera regularly, at the Opera Comique, the Lamoureux and Conservatoire concerts from time to time.

The program for Wednesday opens with a classic, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. "The Sorcerr's Apprentice," by Dukas, will represent the music of his own country. Finally, Borodin's Second Symphony in B minor will try Mr. Rabaud's skill.

EVENING MAIL
New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next, this time with its new and permanently engaged conductor, Henri Rabaud, who has recently arrived from France and fulfilled his distinguished function in Boston for an introductory two weeks.

Boston has declared itself fortunate, not only from the taste but from the precedent. Mr. Rabaud's father, grandfather and grand-aunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rome in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music, conducted at the Opera, the Opera Comique, the Conservatoire and the Lamaoureux concerts. He has a considerable list of compositions to his credit in small and large forms, of which the best known in this country are his Second Symphony, and the opera "Marouf" of several years' standing at the Metropolitan Opera.

A classical symphony stands fittingly at the head of each concert—for Thursday evening Beethoven's "Eroica," and on Saturday afternoon, Mozart's "Jupiter." The rest of the Thursday programme is filled by Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's multi-colored "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Borodin is to provide the Russian number for the Saturday programme with his Second Symphony. For the rest, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the brilliant and quick-witted scherzo by the conductor's "confrere" Dukas, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

ENQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

...ner Bldg., report transactions yester... as follows:

Stocks.	High.	Low.	Close.	Net change.
INDUSTRIALS.
Aetna Expl	5⅝	5⅜	5⅜	— ⅛
Am Marc	4⅝	4½	4⅝	..
Barnt O&G	5-16	¼	¼	— 1-16
Burns Bros	44	44	44	— 1
Car Light.	2⅛	2⅛	2⅛	— 2
Cosd & Co	7	6¾	6⅞	— ⅛
Curt Aero	16	13	13	— 2
Elk Bas Pet	6⅛	6	6	..
Esmer Oil	05½	04	04	—02
Federal O.	28	22	22	— ⅛

Proves Conductor of Exceptional Merit in Season's Second Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the present season at the Academy of Music last evening when Mr. Henri Rabaud made his local debut as its conductor, and a programme was presented which comprised Beethoven's Seventh symphony in A major, the second symphony of Borodin in B minor, and the sparkling scherzo by Dukas entitled, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." It cannot be said that this arrangement is one that augers well for Mr. Rabaud's abilities as a programme maker. He was presumably not responsible for the circumstance that the Beethoven number was played here by the Symphony Society of New York no longer ago than last week. That was presumably one of those curious coincidences which occur from time to time with such mysterious frequency and which one wishes that there were some way of avoiding. But although there is good authority for placing two symphonies on a single programme to do so is not judicious and a selection of another character would have been preferable.

Mr. Rabaud's coming to this city with the Boston organization as a successor to the unlamented Muck had been awaited with a good deal of interest, and it is not supposable that any of the expectations with which it had been regarded were disappointed in the result. There is nothing sensational about Mr. Rabaud's methods. He is a gentleman of a retiring disposition who took his place on the conductor's stand with a self effacing modesty, and whose reading of the Beethoven score was not remarkable for any disturbing originality of view or precedent breaking innovations. Its distinctive features were rather grace and charm and a beautiful refinement than breadth or vigor, and it was more in the lovely allegretto, which was played with an extraordinary refinement of tone and eloquence of sentiment, than in the movements requiring more fire and force and fervor, that it was most artistically effective and satisfying. Yet in its entirety the performance was lucid and vital and intelligently sympathetic, and the enjoyment which it afforded was great.

It is as yet too early to form a definite judgment, for a single hearing does not furnish a sufficiently broad criterion to justify an unreserved opinion, but so far as could be determined from last evening's demonstration, Mr. Rabaud is a conductor of exceptional merit and ability. That he has a strong feeling for rhythm was shown by the flexible and sinuous motion which he imparted to the dancing measures of the Beethoven music, while his keen sense of proportion appeared in an analysis and accentuation of the score before him which invested each detail with its due importance and constantly preserved the perspective of the whole. His gradations of light and shade were also very skillfully and artistically managed and altogether the impression which he produced was distinctly favorable. He was most cordially received and the audience went out of its way to express its appreciation of his work. When he shall have as good material to handle as had his predecessor and when he shall have trained his forces to the same degree of efficiency and homogeneity he may be expected to do better still.

Although of less interest and smaller consequence than the other, the Borodin symphony is yet a work which contains so much of melodic beauty and harmonic impressiveness as to be very well worth hearing, and it is not imaginable that any of its value or significance was lost in Mr. Rabaud's careful and appreciative interpretation of it. Midway on

EVENING SUN

s: Baltimore, Md.

NOV 30 1918

RABAUD WILL DIRECT

First Appearance Here To Be With Boston Symphony.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its second appearance of the season in the Lyric next Wednesday evening, Henri Rabaud, the distinguished Parisian conductor, will make his first bow to Baltimore as its permanent head.

If the acclaim of Boston is any sign, Mr. Rabaud may be depended upon not only to maintain the old traditional standard, but to enhance it. At the Conservatoire he won the Prix de Rome, and later organized and led concerts in Rome and Vienna. He has since conducted at the Paris Opera regularly, at the Opera Comique, the Lamoureux and Conservatoire concerts from time to time.

The program for Wednesday opens with a classic, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. "The Sorcerr's Apprentice," by Dukas, will represent the music of his own country. Finally, Borodin's second Symphony in B minor will try Mr. Rabaud's skill.

m TIMES

ress: New York City

e

Henri Rabaud Conducts Again.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, presenting a well-arranged and interesting program. Thus far in his three concerts given in Greater New York—one of them occurred last Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music—Henri Rabaud has revealed himself as a program-maker of taste. On the present occasion there were two symphonies, and if that sounds appaling to those guileless and tone-deaf souls who can endure unmusical comedy (?) by the hour, let us explain that the first symphony was Mozart's in C, called the "Jupiter," though for modern ears there is little that is Jovian in its charming measures. As we thought the new conductor was at his happiest in it, though he rather dragged the Menuetto and did not rush the Finale. But he made up speed in his reading of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas, which under his spirited whip-lash went at a True Scherzo pace—taking Mendelssohn, and not Beethoven or Chopin as models in tempo.

It was a highly colored performance, showing off to advantage the splendid material of the various orchestral choirs. A clever composition it is with its evanescent memories of Wagner—the "Ho-Yo-To-Ho" and of Liszt; even a morsel of Puccini anticipates the "Tosca." And Grieg, in the limping rhythms of "The Hall of the Mountain King," (Peer Gynt suite;) and Gounod in his "Funeral March of a Marionette." Dukas is well versed in the literature of his art.

The afternoon began with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" and ended with Borodine's B minor symphony. Both were accorded a vigorous interpretation, though the Russian melancholy was not profoundly felt in the Andante of the Borodine work. Not having swallowed enough music during the last week, we braved tunnels and bridges Friday evening and heard Mr. Rabaud conduct Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in Brooklyn. As was the case with the Eroica the previous night at Carnegie Hall, there was more light than heat in the performance. He gave Josef Hofmann a careful accompaniment to the Chopin E minor concerto, but in the Rondo there was a perilous episode, an anxious moment when scrambled eggs were overheard frying. But whether it was the too rigid beat of the conductor or a lapse of memory on Hofmann's part, deponent saith not. All ended brilliantly.

a PUBLIC LEDGER

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, will give its second concert this season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2.

Interest in this concert will naturally center in the new conductor, who is making his first appearance here. Mr. Rabaud, one of the most distinguished musicians of France, has had a long and brilliant career as conductor both of opera and concert. He was received by the symphony audiences in Boston with the greatest enthusiasm and won immediate favor. A tall, slender, dignified man of kindly appearance, he has shown already in his work there that he is full of real Gallic fire.

Philip Hale, in the Boston program book, provides the following biographical sketch of Mr. Rabaud:

"Henri Benjamin Rabaud was born in Paris November 10, 1873. He is the son of Hippolyte Francois Rabaud (1839-1900), who was awarded the first prize for violoncello playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1861. Henri Rabaud's grandfather on his mother's side was the celebrated flutist, Vincent Joseph Dorus, born Vansteenkiste (1812-96). He is, therefore, a grand-nephew of the singer Julie Aimee Josephe Dorus-Gras (1804-96). Flutist and singer were born at Valenciennes.

Mr. Rabaud studied composition with Massenet at the Paris Conservatory where in 1894 he was awarded the first grand prix de Rome. After four years at the Villa Medicis he organized and directed with Max d'Ollone orchestra concerts in Rome (1898) and in Vienna (1899) for the purpose of introducing in those cities compositions of contemporaneous French musicians.

As conductor at the Opera, Paris, Mr Rabaud made his first appearance on February 1, 1908. The opera was "Lohengrin." Among the operas he conducted that year were "Tristan and Isolde," "Thais" and Tannhauser." In 1908 he also conducted a Lamoureux concert (February 23). On January 3, 1914, he was appointed first conductor of the Opera in place of Paul Vidal. The war broke out. In 1914-15 he was one of the conductors of the Conservatory Orchestra concerts then given at the Sorbonne. On May 2, 1915, "Marouf," revived at the Opera-Comique, was conducted by the composer. This work by Mr. Rabaud was given at the Metropolitan Opera House in Philadelphia November 19.

The program which Mr. Rabaud has announced for Philadelphia, December 2, is as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A major
Dukas....."L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice.")
Borodin.....Symphony No. 2 in B minor

WORLD

New York City

NO more convincing proof of what may be done with an orchestra by a conductor having finesse and musicianship has been forthcoming than in the case of the Boston Symphony. Considerably changed in personnel from that of last year, this organization came to us a few weeks ago for its opening concerts. In the delayed arrival of its new conductor, Henri Rabaud, the preliminary training was done by Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who also directed the early concerts.

New York was astounded at the changed Boston Symphony Orchestra as fashioned by M. Monteux. It was blatantly noisy and wholly lacking in the tonal refinement which had been its dominant point of distinction. Last Thursday night and yesterday afternoon the visiting organization gave its third and fourth concerts—under M. Rabaud—and it sounded like another orchestra. We would not pronounce it the equal of the old Boston Symphony, but at least it satisfied in reasonable measure.

* * *

One cannot unfailingly estimate the complete worth of either a creative or an interpretative musician by two works or by the same number of performances. We have yet to become thoroughly acquainted with M. Rabaud before pronouncing final judgment upon his capacities to fill his new post. In his start, however, he has made friends. Without fuss or the display of any prima donna airs he has gained the respect of many who know efficient conducting when they sit in its presence and who recognize the effect of skilled and intelligent training.

After Thursday's concert there were several persons who spoke condescendingly of M. Rabaud's abilities. They referred to him as an experienced routinier. And it was amusing to hear the comments of these experts, who are prone to measure a man by what he may have done rather than by his accomplishment of the moment; who belong to the "I-knew-him-when" brigade, living in the past and measuring all present achievements by recollections gone rusty by myopic minds and small-town vision. M. Rabaud may prove to be only a moderately fair conductor, but on Thursday his ability was unquestioned in his interpretation of the greater part of Beethoven's "Eroica," in which his presentation of the continuous flow of the melody was as evident as was his capacity to mould a phrase, to vary his dynamics with unerring taste and to maintain at all times a pure tone from every section of the orchestra that held its balance unwaveringly.

* * *

NO more convincing proof of what may be done with an orchestra by a conductor having finesse and musicianship has been forthcoming than in the case of the Boston Symphony. Considerably changed in personnel from that of last year, this organization came to us a few weeks ago for its opening concerts. In the delayed arrival of its new conductor, Henri Rabaud, the preliminary training was done by Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who also directed the early concerts.

New York was astounded at the changed Boston Symphony Orchestra as fashioned by M. Monteux. It was blatantly noisy and wholly lacking in the tonal refinement which had been its dominant point of distinction. Last Thursday night and yesterday afternoon the visiting organization gave its third and fourth concerts—under M. Rabaud—and it sounded like another orchestra. We would not pronounce it the equal of the old Boston Symphony, but at least it satisfied in reasonable measure ss Philadelphia, Pa.

PUBLIC LEDGER

DEC - 3 1918

HENRI RABAUD LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

New Director Cordially Received at Second Concert in the Academy

PROGRAM

Beethoven.....The Seventh Symphony
Dukas.....Scherzo, "Sorcerer's Apprentice"
Borordin.....Symphony in B minor, No. 2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in its second concert of the season at the Academy last evening. Interest centered largely in the debut of the new permanent director, Henri Rabaud. At the beginning of 1914 Mr. Rabaud was made first conductor of the Paris Opera, and his other distinctions as conductor and composer are many.

Mr. Rabaud takes his art, his audience and himself in the last place seriously and makes his distinctive personality felt at once. His hearers—who were not so numerous as the interest of the occasion warranted—gave a cordial welcome when he first entered to a figure obviously intellectual, aristocratic, distinguished. He is tall, bearded and dignified of aspect, with the demeanor of the contemplative scholar.

The reading of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony was preëminently French. He brought out the more delicate nuances with a scrupulous, painstaking precision. He did not seek to release the full resources of sound latent in his instruments. He dealt in none of those noisy climaxes which are dear to the heart of some leaders. His beat is definite though graceful, his vigilance unceasing. Though evidently a disciplinarian firm of hand, he is not a frigid martinet. At the close of the symphony there was long-continued applause of unmistakable spontaneity. It brought the conductor back from the wings several times, until the men stood with him, and even after that it was not quick to die away.

The familiar "Sorcerer's Apprentice" scherzo, with its humorous relief in which the bassoon is chief comedian, had been skillfully interposed between the two symphonies of which the program was unusually constructed. But for this well-placed humor the concert would have been of a character distinctly somber, for Borodin's muse, speaking in minor accents in his second symphony, does not attempt a suave, mellifluous, ear-tickling strain.

Instead, the first movement deals huge, bold strokes like hammer-blows upon a forge. The material is heroic and epic. Mr. Rabaud gave himself with sympathy to these grandiose moods. In the second movement ("molto vivo") the curious pattering monotone of the stopped horns in the background was deftly introduced. Again in the Andante there was a lyric voice of great beauty from the horns. The first and the third movements seemed to please the audience better than the second and the fourth. The national feeling, as in the case of Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," is strong throughout the work.

F. L. W.

From WORLD

Address: New York City

Date DEC 7 - 1918

The commendation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new conductor seems to indicate that getting away from German traditions of leadership has not adversely affected it, after all.

RECORD

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 9 - 1918

DEBUT OF RABAUD

French Conductor Directs Boston Symphony Concert Here.

As a pianist is judged by Chopin playing, an orchestral conductor rises or falls by his ability as a Beethoven interpreter. In selecting the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven for his first Philadelphia concert Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at once presented himself as a musician of exceptional power.

Rabaud comes to the Orchestra with the prestige of a distinguished foreign career. He has been identified with both the opera and concert life of Paris, but is first of all a composer of great individuality and charm. His symphonies have been presented here with success, while his Oriental opera, "Marouf," has won wide recognition.

There is little in the appearance of Rabaud to suggest the musician. Tall, thin and ascetic-looking, he might easily be selected as a scientist or doctor of philosophy or letters. His resemblance to Charles Evans Hughes, sometime candidate for the Presidency of the United States, is striking. Rabaud has the glowing temperament of a genuine musician, however, and he did not fail to win his audience last night. His Beethoven playing was of great interest. The hackneyed Seventh Symphony was transformed into something fresh and vital and endowed with a charm that arrested at every turn. The first movement was taken with a more deliberate tempo than we are accustomed to, but the finesse of the orchestral manipulation amply justified the departure. Every voice of the orchestra was heard and the ensemble was perfection itself. Rabaud draws a noble tone, not merely big, but strikingly vital and inspiring.

The allegretto, which we are inured to hearing at funeral pace, was done with a slightly accelerated motion and gained immensely in chorus. The third movement was a veritable ripple of light, sensuous tone. There were marked variations of tempi. Rabund does not hesitate to introduce strong contrasts, both in tone and tempo, but his effects are always surprisingly novel and decidedly unusual. In the finale he worked up a magnificent climax and the conclusion of the symphony found him established with a Philadelphia audience, at least, as a conductor of pronounced ability and one for whom it is safe to predict future popularity.

Unlike his motionless predecessor, Rabund, as a very energetic leader. His motions, however, are so apparently the result of genuine musical inspiration and are so lacking in pose that they are never obtrusive, but soon become part of the man's personal expression.

Last night's audience was small for a Boston Orchestra concert. Probably the two symphonies proved alarming to some unaccustomed to that foreign habit. The Brodin B minor was another form of triumph for Rabaud, the eastern style seeming as much his medium as the Beethoven. Doubtless he is a man of universal musical tastes and power to present any type of music well.

The "L'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, played between the symphonies, aroused great enthusiasm.

EVENING MAIL

ss: New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next, this time with its new and permanently engaged conductor, Henri Rabaud, who has recently arrived from France and fulfilled his distinguished function in Boston for an introductory two weeks.

Boston has declared itself fortunate, not only from the taste but from the precedent. Mr. Rabaud's father, grandfather and grand-aunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rom, in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music, conducted at the Opera, the Opera Comique, the Conservatoire and the Lamaoureux concerts. He has a considerable list of compositions to his credit in small and large forms, of which the best known in this country are his Second Symphony, and the opera "Marouf" of several years' standing at the Metropolitan Opera.

A classical symphony stands fittingly at the head of each concert—for Thursday evening Beethoven's "Eroica," and on Saturday afternoon, Mozart's "Jupiter." The rest of the Thursday programme is filled by Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's multi-colored "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Borodin is to provide the Russian number for the Saturday programme with his Second Symphony. For the rest, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the brilliant and quick-witted scherzo by the conductor's "confrere" Dukas, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

CITIZEN

: Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 7 1918

HENRY RABAUD WELCOMED HERE

Boston Orchestra's New Conductor Takes Big Audience by Storm

It was very evident at the Academy of Music last night that exceptional interest was taken in the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This was because of the first appearance in Brooklyn, of the new director, Henri Rabaud. Before the introduction to the first number on the programme, was finished the large audience was ready to give testimony to the fact that the famous organization of artists was again under the direction of a master musician, capable of putting life, sympathy and soul into his work. It is seldom that a Brooklyn assemblage of music lovers lets go of itself completely. That is what occurred last night at the conclusion of Beethoven's seventh symphony. It was a marked tribute to the artistry of the new director of the Boston orchestra that the gathering literally broke loose in applause that did not spend itself until several seconds had elapsed.

One did not have to be "educated" in music" to understand and appreciate that the magnificent organization was in thorough sympathy with the man who wielded the baton. He was in absolute control of the interpretation in its every phase. There seemed to be a delightful magic in the way the various instruments responded to his will and there was fascination in the movement of his wand. It commanded thunder or zephyr and all the scale between them and the blending together of emotions in the music was perfect.

The programme was made up of the Beethoven Symphony already referred to, Chopin's Concerto in E minor for piano with orchestra, Josef Hofman being the soloist, and Saint-Saens' "The Youth of Hercules."

The Hofmann number was a wonderful production. The exquisite relations between the great orchestra and the solo harmony of the piano were marvelous.

The new conductor is a prolific composer and remains in Brooklyn to-day to be present this evening at the production of his opera, "Marouf," which will be presented at the Academy.

EAGLE

Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 8 1918

RABAUD AT "MAROUF" IN THE ACADEMY

Composer in Audience—Presents Wreath to Alda—English Anthem Sung.

MAROUF.

Opera Comique in four acts and five scenes (in French). Book by Lucien Nepoty. Music by Henri Rabaud.

Marouf ..... Giuseppe de Luca
The Princess .....Frances Alda
The Sultan .....Leon Rothier
Fatimah .....Kathleen Howard
The Vizier .....Andreas de Segurola
Ali .....Thomas Chalmers
A Pastry Cook.....Paolo Ananian
A Fellah .....Rafaelo Diaz
Chief Sailor .....Albert Reiss
Merchants .....Giordano Paltrinieri, Giulio Rossi
The Cadi .....Giulio Rossi
Muezzin .....Rafaelo Diaz, Giordano Paltrinieri
A Donkey Driver.....Pietro Audisio

Court ladies, inmates of the harem, dignitaries, ministers, policemen, merchants, slaves, negroes, dancers, eunuchs, mamelukes.

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who made his bow to Brooklyn audiences in that position Friday evening, heard his opera, "Marouf," at the Academy of Music last evening. Though seated inconspicuously in the midst of orchestra, Mr. Rabaud was soon recognized by the audience, and after the first act was obliged to bow in acknowledgement to the general applause of an audience that filled every seat.

To honor Frances Alda, the prima donna of the evening, the composer had sent her a wreath of flowers. When it was presented at the close of the second act, the lady still in the costume of the Princess of Kaitan, took her honors graciously and responded by singing "God Save the King." The singing of the British National Air and the waving of a Union Jack was in special tribute to England's Day of Celebration.

First "Marouf" a Year Ago.

"Marouf" was brought out at the Metropolitan Opera House December 19, 1917, with the same cast, at least so far as the principals are concerned, that sang the work in the Academy last evening. It received repetitions throughout the subscription nights, but did not win popular favor. Rather surprisingly, therefore, it remained in the repertory. To date this year it has been given two performances, one at the Metropolitan, another in Philadelphia.

As everyone knows by this time, its story, based upon one of the many tales which Scheherezade told, was done into the present libretto by Lucien Nepoty. For this story of the Cobbler who wins wife and position through Eastern lies and who pays only the Eastern price for his moral defections, Rabaud has fashioned a musical background of Orientalism and the Metropolitan Opera House a pictorial setting of glittering gorgeousness. Though as is so often the case with operatic splendor, all is not gold that glitters.

Orientalism in Music.

Obviously in seting such a story to music, the composer must perforce fall back upon the accepted symbols of the musical East. There is authority for the statement that he has made use of definite Arabian melodies. Most of the thematic material is such as we have heard in the Russian composers' portraits in musical terms of Eastern magnificence. The chromatics and the major seconds of Rimsky - Korsakoff's "Scheherezade" Suite are in "Marouf."

An imperfect Wagnerite Rabaud uses representative themes, but makes no attempt to develop them symphonically. They portray character, mood, emotion, appear and reappear under the necessary spur of scene and character for musical representation; but are employed in an orchestral canvas that depends for its color and transparency upon swift sure strokes and not upon the piling of color-mass on color-mass.

Colorful Orchestration.

So this orchestration provides characterization, colorful mood and incident, provides a narrative painting of the emotional and dramatic substance. But unfortunately only at times does it probe the depths of human emotion or paint vivid and memorable pictures. For the most part it flows with the sluggishness of an artificial stream. This music never threatens to overflow its banks. Between the carefully constructed dykes of academicism it runs its placid course, stagnating in eddies of reminiscence and with its surface calmed with midnight oil.

And over this orchestral texture the voices of the drama rise and sink in a tone speech that only in one moment rises from arioso into a lyric aria. (But this, the aria in the third act where the Princess sings her love for Marouf, was interpolated that the the prima donna might have more of glory than the composer had originally allotted.) Yet without its emotional moments this tone speech is dramatic and essentially French. Its full appreciation can never be achieved by such an audience as filled the Academy last evening, an audience that missed practically all the humor of the lines, and appreciated only that manifested through the obvious means of gesture.

Performance as in Manhattan.

Last evening's performance was in all respects similar to those which the opera has received in Manhattan, though much of the comedy that was lost in the performances across the river assumed new and marked significance in the smaller reaches of the Academy. The scenery was the same and just as brilliant as ever, though it seemed somewhat crowded on the smaller Academy stage.

As of old, the honors of the evening fell to De Luca, in the title role; to Frances Alda as the Princess, to Thomas Chalmers as Ali and to Bo-thier as the Sultan. De Segurola provided his share of the funmaking in the unsympathetic role of the Vizier, ever the scapegoat of an Arabian fairy tale. The cast was universally in good voice, though these declamatory measures do not provide a medium for the display of sustained singing.

Mr. Monteux gave an illuminative and eloquent reading of the score, and under his direction there was coherence and co-ordination of the various elements of the performance. Rosina Galli, Giuseppe Bonfiglio and tehir dancing associates furnished the necessary choreographic delights of the second act.

"Aida" December 24.

The next performance of opera in Brooklyn will be the evening of December 24, when "Aida "will be presented. The cost has not eben announced as yet.

ING WORLD

w York City.

Rabaud Scores As Conductor of Boston Orchestra

By Sylvester Rawling.

HENRI RABAUD, the French composer-conductor, made a notable New York debut at Carnegie Hall last night as leader of the reconstructed Boston Symphony Orchestra. A crowded house greeted him with a warmth of welcome such as New York audiences invariably bestow upon a distinguished stranger. After "The Star-Spangled Banner," which disclosed something of his mettle, the demonstration was continued. Then there was a settling down to absorbed attention, and keen observation of Mr. Rabaud's personality and musical worth. On the first count, he is tall, spare and dignified, commanding, without mannerisms; on the second, whatever diversity of opinion there may be among professional musicians and critics, the cultivated audience acclaimed him a master and established him at once a favorite.

Mr. Rabaud did not try to feel his way by starting with an overture. He plunged into [illegible] of the greatest of symphonies, B[illegible]en's third, the "Eroica." He re[illegible]e work with an understanding that was noble, with an inciseness and a clarity that are rare, neglecting no detail, but always conserving it to the whole. The funeral march was virile as well as sombre, the scherzo went atripping with fairy lightness, the horn trio, deliciously played, was kept in its proper place, the finale, taken almost at a gallop, was never slurred or blurred in the rapid tempo. Something, it is true, was lacking of poetic imagination in the interpretation. Mr. Rabaud seems to be essentially academic. One of my colleagues who went to Boston for Mr. Rabaud's initial performance there put it aptly by saying that Mr. Rabaud's admiration was for Beethoven the classicist, not for Beethoven the romanticist.

The rest of the programme consisted of Saint-Saens's symphonic poem "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes. In these compositions, as well as in the symphony, the orchestra showed a restoration of the qualities that, for long, have made it the premier orchestra of the world. A fine tribute to Mr. Rabaud's genius, for he has been in control only a few weeks.

Mr. Rabaud will hear his opera, "Marouf," for the first time in America when it is performed to-morrow night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

n SUN

ress: Baltimore, Md.

te

Boston Orchestra.

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its second appearance of the season in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening the last spectre of trouble will have departed, for Mr. Henri Rabaud, the distinguished Parisian conductor, will make his first bow to Baltimore as its permanent head.

If the acclaim of Boston is any sign, Mr. Rabaud may be depended upon not only to maintain the old traditional standard, but to enhance it. Moreover, behind his brief Boston career of two weeks lies an extensive precedent. At the Conservatoire he won the Prix de Rome, and later organized and led concerts in Rome and Vienna for the purpose of making known contemporary French music. He has since conducted at the Paris "Opera" regularly, at the "Opera Comique," the Lamoureux and Conservatoire concerts from time to time.

The program for Wednesday opens fittingly with a classic—Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas, avowedly a test piece for wit, agility and manifold imagination on the part of any conductor and orchestra, will represent the music of his own country. Finally, Borodin's Second Symphony in B Minor will try Mr. Rabaud's skill with native Russian colorings.

AMERICAN

New York City.

DEC

RABAUD A FOCH OF CONDUCTORS

Boston's Orchestra Regains Its Wonted Greatness Under French Leader.

By MAX SMITH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a real conductor. That was made plain at Thursday night's concert in Carnegie Hall and confirmed at yesterday's matinee, when Henri Rabaud made his second appearance here at the head of Boston's famous band.

He put the virtuoso musicians from the Hub on their feet once more. He restored the self-confidence and assurance that had been petering out under the stress of trying experiences. He revived the waning morale and led on to victory.

A veritable Marshal Foch among symphonic generals is Henri Rabaud. Learned, erudite, keen; versed in the science, in the strategy and tactics of his profession, he is not only "a scholar and a ripe and a good one," but a forcible drillmaster and a persuasive leader of men.

Enthusiasm, perhaps, ought to be tempered by discretion until Monsieur Rabaud has shown his hand more completely than Thursday's and yesterday's programme permitted. How, one wonders, would he deal with Brahms, with Berlioz, with Wagner, with Strauss, or with some of the most modern composers—Debussy, [illegible] Pavel Strawinsky!

It must be admitted, that no French conductor since Edouard Colonne has made as favorable an impression here as Henri Rabaud of the lanky figure and aquiline face; and, personally, I prefer him to his distinguished forerunner because he combines with the grace and politeness characteristic of his race a rugged simplicity and directness that the other wielder of the baton did not possess.

Henri Rabaud is neither sleek and unctuous, nor dry and ascetic. Aristocratic as he is in his taste, in his sense of balance and proportion, no one can justly accuse him of being distant and unapproachable; but neither can any one assert that he is too affable and communicative. He is gentle, yet manly; considerate, yet firm; sympathetic, responsive, amiable, yet rigorously conscientious in his demands.

Monsieur Rabaud's most striking traits, as revealed on Thursday in Beethoven's "Eroica," and yesterday in Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, are his highly developed feeling for symmetry and proportion, his passion for sharpness of definition and his exquisite sense for dynamic gradations of tone.

That there is more of the academic than the romantic in his make-up Henri Rabaud showed yesterday in his reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, which opened the matinee programme. The mystic episode of the vision, voiced by the muted strings, with supple shading of tone and nuance, was set forth poetically. The swelling melody of the love-theme, however, lacked something in ardor and exuberance.

As an interpreter of Mozart, too Monsieur Rabaud is less effective than as an interpreter of Beethoven. Excellent as was his exposition of the "Jupiter" symphony, especially in the final polyphonic pages, the interlocking parts of which stood out in chiselled perfection, it seemed somewhat heavy and stolid.

Of the performance of Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," on the other hand, one can speak only in terms of the utmost enthusiasm. Clean-cut, vigorous, forcible, tremendously incisive in attack and stirring in rhythm, it was probably the most thrilling performance of the famous Scherzo ever heard in New York.

Borodin's Symphony in B minor, No. 2, brought the matinee to an impressive close. Monsier Rabaud, it is easy to see, is not an out-and-out classicist, though he shows almost religious respect for the intentions of the masters.

s: Baltimore, Md.

SUN

DEC 1 - 1918

RABAUD WILL DIRECT

First Appearance Here To Be With Boston Symphony.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its second appearance of the season in the Lyric next Wednesday evening, Henri Rabaud, the distinguished Parisian conductor, will make his first bow to Baltimore as its permanent head.

If the acclaim of Boston is any sign, Mr. Rabaud may be depended upon not only to maintain the old traditional standard, but to enhance it. At the Conservatoire he won the Prix de Rome, and later organized and led concerts in Rome and Vienna. He has since conducted at the Paris Opera regularly, at the Opera Comique, the Lamoureux and Conservatoire concerts from time to time.

The program for Wednesday opens with a classic, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. "The Sorcerr's Apprentice," by Dukas, will represent the music of his own country. Finally, Borodin's Second Symphony in B minor will try Mr. Rabaud's skill.

m BULLETIN

ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 3 - 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Henri Rabaud's First Appearance As Conductor of Famous Organization

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-eighth series of concerts in Philadelphia, at the Academy of Music last evening, was made especially notable by the first appearance in this city of Henri Rabaud, who recently assumed the post of permanent conductor of the famous organization. Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer, principally of a symphony which has been played by the Philadelphia Orchestra, and of the opera, "Marouf," produced at the Metropolitan two weeks ago.

Taking the place formerly occupied by such conductors as Gericke, Muck, and earlier this season temporarily by one of his countrymen, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished Frenchman attracts attention because of the important task which he has undertaken as well as by the fame that he has acquired and through the curiosity aroused by the introduction of so interesting a personality.

Unusually tall, decidedly slender, and looking considerably older than the forty-five years (born in 1873) that the program states him to be, Rabaud, with a good-sized bald spot, a rather long face, partially concealed by a grey beard, and giving little evidence of "personal magnetism," does not particularly suggest the musician. That is to say, there is little that is romantic or striking in his personality, ingratiating and impressive though it may be. In his conducting of the program, which included Beethoven's seventh symphony in A major: "L'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, and the second, B minor, symphony of Borodin, there was more of energy than of subtlety, and of firm commanding earnestness than of the suave ease and grace of manner that is supposed to characterize the typical French conductor.

The Beethoven symphony, of course was splendidly played. The Boston musicians do nothing less than well, seldom fall below absolute brilliancy, and while there were moments last evening when the orchestra did not seem to be all that it has been in the past, the high standard for the most part was maintained. It was reached, at any rate, in the wholly delightful delivery of the allegretto in the Beethoven work, while the presto measures of the third movement scarcely could have been more felicitously done, and there was nothing lacking in the grand finale.

Rabaud conducts with a free movement of his long arms, which he is inclined to "wave," and also he has the habit of lowering his body and then rising even above his natural height, as if eager to throw himself bodily into the task before him—though never with a sense of undue self-assertiveness. It is, at times, as if he were driving the musicians, instead of leading them—something which he will soon discover, no doubt, that there is no need for him to do with the Boston players. In this respect he suggests the fact that his experience has been largely as an operatic conductor—at both the Opera and Opera Comique, in Paris, though he has led many Conservatory and other orchestral concerts as well—and the indications are that he has not yet had time fully to adjust himself to his new position and that eventually he will be able to prove that the management of the Boston organization made no mistake in engaging him.

The capricious, tricky music of the Dukas composition, full of daring instrumental experiments and "comic" tonal effects—truly a scherzo in its rollicking humor as a "musical joke"—was remarkably played. It was, in truth, an amazingly skillful interpretation of the French composer's elucidation of the Goethe ballad, and in his leading of it Rabaud seemed to show wherein perhaps lie his best capabilities. The somewhat ponderous work of the Russian composer, Borodin—a symphony of much melodious beauty, despite its prevailing solemnity and heaviness—also was admirably done, though it did not escape altogether the effect of reiteration and long-drawn-out-ness.

The reception accorded the new conductor, upon his first appearance, as well as the applause given him after each number or movement, and at the end of the concert, was cordial and sincere, though the audience was noticeably smaller than usual at the Boston concerts, with many vacant seats to be seen in all parts of the house.

n WORLD

ress: New York City

American Singers
Park Theatre

HENRI RABAUD, New Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra

rom TIMES

ddress: Washington, D. C.

ate 64 DEC 4 - 1918

M. RABAUD GIVEN WARM RECEPTION

A warm reception was accorded Henri Rabaud as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon by the capacity audience at the National Theater, when an all-orchestral program was given. It was the first appearance of M. Rabaud with the orchestra in Washington and one felt that he had a distinctive music message to convey through the medium of his players.

It was a tone painter, par excellence, that M. Rabaud became in the subtle nature music of Saint Saens' "Youth of Hercules." This tone poem was executed with a rare repose in which the varied orchestration was brought out with a detailed perfection and ever vibrant a[illegible]here. One had marked M. Rabaud's vitality at the outset—but here was a charming delicacy, a murmuring nature with its pastoral quietude, until the god Pan seemed to awake to a Bacchanale with a soaring Romanza. In M. Rabaud's "France," however, the solemn religious spirit is ever present, and it held a reverent note in a tone picture of exquisite beauty.

In the Beethoven symphony, the "Eroica," which opened the program, there was a rather pedantic touch in the decisive beat that M. Rabaud used in a sharply accented reading. Vital he was and decisive more than dramatic, it seemed, until the last two movements into which he instilled a spirit of real gayety, with a humor at times grotesque in its blitheness.

The scherzo held this airy lightness with forceful dynamics, while mood dominated the finale that was given with suavity, facile execution and again markedly rugged impress. It was rarely executed and the minor episode for winds was an unusual andante.

It was a tone painter par excellence that M. Rabaud became in the Yet again there was another touch in the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes." Here was verve, temperamental spirited understanding of the several "scenes in tone" one might call them—for scenes there were in the orchestral color of the instruments and a whole dramatis personae in the Carmenesque abandon of the gypsy scene, with its several gifted solos for solo violin played by Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster. The "Fandango" at the close, with its gusto and its syncopation, was splendidly developed, holding the bold dance spirit that is native alike of the Spain of the theme and the Russia of the composer.

J. MacB.

EVENING MAIL

New York City

With the Musi

WHEN Henri Rabaud made his bow from the conductor's stand in Carnegie Hall last evening all New York and his wife saw a tall, spare, bearded, sober-faced man in the early fifties who looked like a down east Yankee deacon about to pass the plate. But the programme he gave belied his appearance and must have caused some of the old ladies in the typical Boston Symphony audience to gasp with a pleased sense of impropriety.

The programme opened innocently enough with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. In this number M. Rabaud showed beyond a doubt that he has his fingers at the heart strings of his players. Never has the famous organization performed with more precision, deeper feeling and higher spirit. The scherzo and the finale were a delight.

In Saint-Saens's "La Jeunesse d'Hercule" M. Rabaud gave another test of the quality of his leadership and the mettle of the orchestra which he has rescued from artistic disintegration.

But the thing that made the old ladies gasp was Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," opus 34. This work is musical caviare of the best Volga quality. M. Rabaud's reading was of the sort that the composer of "Marouff" might be expected to give to an oriental fantasy. There was by turns fine restraint and fiery onslaught, and the languid provocation of Ouled-Nail dancing girls in it. There is one Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Rabaud promises to be his prophet.

M. Rabaud also promises to be a great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for he can not only strike fire out of his men, but he can also make programmes—as witness the initial feast that he set out for New York last night, in spite of the fact that he served caviare instead of sweets for the last course.

S.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
DEC 9 -

Music.

Rabaud Again With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Henri Rabaud led his second Carnegie Hall concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon in the presence of a very large and cordially approving audience. There was no trace of favoritism in his programme, which consisted of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Dukas's scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the second symphony, in B minor, of Borodin.

The Weber overture was played with notable brilliance. There were the pomp and strut of chivalry, the authentic "Weberian flourish"; the song theme was sung tenderly, the mysterious largo conveyed the proper shudder. Mozart's symphony was set forth with clarity and polish, though only in the finale did leader and men find the Jovian note. But the sensational feature of the concert turned out to be the performance of the Dukas scherzo.

That work has served the Boston orchestra as a battle horse ever since Mr. Gericke took it up a decade and a half ago. It has had innumerable performances in this town by the Boston and other orchestras, but only twice, in all probability, has it been really played—when Mr. Monteux led it at a Civic concert in the summer of 1917 and on Saturday. Both French leaders turned the battle horse, which, like the joke, had gone stale under a series of sluggish Germanic dobbin-joggers, into a fiery host of snorting chargers and the joke into humor colossal, Gargantuan, as if for Rabelais's private pleasure. Only, Mr. Rabaud, though the Civic orchestra was good, had the better band.

After so rehabilitating the droll tale of Dukas, Mr. Rabaud led an imposing performance of Borodin's symphony. Why have the conductors of our neighborhood so neglected this symphony, finished in 1877, produced in America as long ago as 1898? Here is another splendid work out of Russia that holds the listener spellbound from the first note to the last. There is an opening movement of feudal ceremony and color, in which the composer is said to have in mind the ancient gatherings of Russian princes. The Slav troubadours, the bayans, sing their melodious lays through the adagio, and in the finale heroes banquet jubilantly "to the sound of the guzla and the bamboo flute in the midst of the rejoicing crowd." There is a scherzo, a Muscovite one-step, the listener can interpret as he will—perhaps again Mazeppa, if we stick to feudal times; if not, perhaps the Moscow-Petersburg flier, in the days before the latter city had Russianized her name.

In any case, the symphony is vastly worth rescuing from neglect. One of the everlasting four of Brahms, or even one of Beethoven's overworked nine, to say nothing of the entire Tchaikovsky chain gang, could take a needed rest while the whole public becomes acquainted with the beauties of Borodin's B minor.

"The Star-Spangled Banner" prefaced the concert and before the second part of the programme Mr. Rabaud led "God Save the King" in honor of the day. The English anthem received long and hearty applause.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
ress: New York City

FESTAL CONCERT BY PHILHARMONIC

Boston Orchestra, With Conductor Rabaud Conducting, Delights Matinee Audience.

ORGANIST BONNET'S RECITAL

A festival concert by the Philharmonic Society at Carnegie Hall last evening in celebration of the foundation of the Czecho-Slovak Republic, was featured by the playing of Dvorak's noble symphony, "The New World," followed by three numbers by Smetana, Firich's "Evening Idyll" and properly concluding an all-Czecho-Slovak program with Dvorak's two Slavic Dances. Conductor Stransky and his men showed to far better advantage than in their Friday adventure among strange gods, and the large audience manifested unqualified satisfaction.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted a record-breaking matinee audience to Carnegie Hall yesterday when Conductor Rabaud again was the modest recipient of a pronounced demonstration of approval. Mozart's Symphony in C major, with the "Jupiter" fugue finale, showed the great instrument finally and completely under the gently vigorous command of the new conductor, and in the Borodin Symphony, which concluded the brief but most commendably chosen program, the Bostonians showed all the ...ness, unanimity and instant response which were characteristic of the

WORLD
s: New York City
DEC 8 1918

HENRI RABAUD WINS NEW LAURELS HERE

New Conductor of Boston Orchestra Confirms First Favorable Impression.

It needed only one more appearance of Henri Rabaud in the role of orchestral conductor to confirm the belie of those who passed judgment on hin last Thursday in his splendid abili ties. M. Rabaud led the Boston Symphony musicians for the second tim here in Carnegie Hall yesterday after noon, and he touched and maintaine a high artistic mark.

The Weber "Euryanthe" overtur which opened the programme, wa performed with the necessary plasti vitality; and the majestic C majo symphony of Mozart (the "Jupiter" with a clarity of musical enunciatio and a purity of classic style that re flected Rabaud's aristocratic leaning

He preserved, as on Thursday eve ning, the uninterrupted flow of th melodic line, and his dynamic co trasts were of the best and seldo too sharply drawn. Perhaps nowhe was this more perfectly displaye than in the descriptive piece, "Th Sorcerer's Apprentice," of Duka Nothing finer in tonal orchestr coloring has been heard here sin the season opened.

The Borodin B minor symphor concluded the concert.

The tone of the Boston musicia and their attack and finish of phra again commanded admiration. In improved musical state and unde its new conductor, the visiting o chestra will be welcome here.

CITIZEN
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

RABAUD'S OPERA PRESENTED HERE

Boston Orchestra's Leader Attends Performance

HEARS HIS WORK FOR FIRST TIME IN AMERICA

"Marouf" Splendidly Sung—Musical Version of "Arabian Nights' Tale" Delights All—Frances Alda, De Luca and Rothier in Cast.

At the Academy of Music last evening the Metropolitan Opera Company gave Henri Rabaud's fantastic opera, "Marouf." It was the first presentation of the opera in Brooklyn and what added considerable to the interest of the occasion was the fact that the composer, who is now conductor of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and appeared here Friday evening, remained in Brooklyn for last night's performance; it was the first time he had heard his opera in this country.

The audience, which was a large one, was enthusiastic in his praise and that of the opera itself. A splendid cast, practically the same that introduced the opera in its American premiere in Manhattan, gave a delightful and inspiring performance.

Frances Alda as the volatile Princess delighted with her finished singing and acting. She wore some marvelous dresses. In the famous courtyard scene the audience was captivated by her costume, but she was even more richly and beautifully clad in the harem scene.

Her pure soprano voice was a delight and she played the part with pure comedy spirit. She received spontaneous applause throughout.

Guiseppe De Luca as the armorous Marouf was most happily cast; the music suited his voice admirably and his acting throughout was of the highest order. In act three especially his gayety was infectious and his efforts were warmly greeted.

Leon Rothier was a stalwart Sultan. Kathleen Howard as the shewish wife was excellent. Andreas de Segurola appeared as the Vizier; Thomas Chalmers was Ali, and others in the cast were Paolo Ananian, Angelo Bada, Albert Reiss, Pompilo Malatesta, Giulio Rossi, Giordano Paltrimeri and Pietro Audisio. All were very good.

The Oriental divertisement was danced by the inimitable Rosina Galli, Guiseppe Bonfiglio and the entire ballet.

Pierre Monteux conducted the opera, which was sung in French in masterly style.

The story o fthe opera opens with Marouf, the cobbler, possessed of a great envy for those who possess fair wives, bewailing his own lot as the husband of an "old witch." His wife comes and demands certain things which he cannot supply, and she causes him to be beaten. Whereupon he runs away, aided by some sailors.

Marouf is shipwrecked, and Act II. finds him in the care of Ali, a prosperous merchant of Khartan. Ali is an old schoolmate, and, hearing Marouf's story, plans to raise him to great honor. He dresses Marouf richly arousing the interest of the populace. Marouf, as coached, boasts of his caravan and of his proposed gift of thirty bags of precious stones to the Sultan.

The Sultan, wandering in disguise, hears all this, and disclosing himself to the astonished Marouf invites him to dine with him.

Affairs progress, and the Sultan is about to give his daughter to Marouf in marriage, but he fears many things. When the princess raises her veil he faints at her beauty. She has fallen in love with him, and they run away.

The last act finds them at the home of a native, who goes to prepare food while Marouf continues the ploughing; the plow catches in a ring which is set in a cover that conceals a subterranean passage; the ring comes out, and the princess polishes it to read what is engraved thereon, whereupon the natives appears as a geenii, who provides them with a caravan such as Marouf boasted about, and which arrives just as the Sultan overtakes them —and all ends happily.

Brooklyn, N. Y.
ess
DEC 6 1918

HENRI RABAUD CONDUCTS

Permanent Conductor of Boston Symphony Proves Worth—In Brooklyn This Evening.

Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first Metropolitan appearance in that capacity in Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Rabaud is familiar primarily because he is the composer of "Marouf," the opera which will be given in Brooklyn Saturday evening. The program including the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony, Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes provided an adequate test for orchestra and conductor alike.

With the departure of the unlamented Dr. Muck and the band's purging of the German element, consisting of 22 players, considerable doubt existed on the part of the many admirers and supporters of the orchestra as to whether it could under new and novel conditions retain its place as the premier orchestra of the country The first visit of the band last month to the Metropolitan district, when the concerts were conducted by Pierre Monteux, proved that its personnel was as good as ever, and in certain respects superior, notably in the more colorful and more highly emotional quality of the strings; but at the same time, it was realized that for it to continue to hold its proud position a conductor of achievement and magnetism was necessary. That factor seems to have been supplied in Henri Rabaud.

Tall, spare, angular, Mr. Rabaud looks more a genial New England preacher than a foreign conductor. In the direction of his men he varies his beat to suit the occasion, at times depending upon the slightest movement of the wrist, at others, when a climax would be achieved, using full, sweeping gestures of the entire arms. Though he conducts from a score, his knowledge of the music is such as to enable him to follow the second half of the old description that there are "two kinds of conductors, those that have the score in their heads, and those that have their heads in the score."

Mr. Rabaud is a master of euphony, of balance, of precision. Under his conducting last evening every attack was precise, the individual choirs spoke their musical messages with smoothness and unanimity of utterance, the range of dynamics was wide, and crescendi and diminuendi were built evenly and gradually. More intellectual than emotional, traditional rather than revolutionarily dramatic, reverential rather than individual—such were the readings vouchsafed us. The Beethoven Symphony was a model of clarity, and if lacking on the emotional and sentimental side, the lack was welcome. Last evening we heard Beethoven's epical work given in its original purity. Only three horns sounded the trio passages While differences may exist as to the advisability of rescoring the Beethoven works because of the tonal and dynamic divergences of the modern orchestra from that for which the composer wrote, certainly Mr. Rabaud's dependence last evening upon the original scoring is not censurable. The result certainly justified the means.

The interpretation of the Saint-Saens was undoubtedly a labor of love to Mr. Rabaud. Probably never in

EAGLE
s Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 7 1918

Rabaud Conducts at Academy; Divides Honors with Hofmann

Henri Rabaud made his first Brooklyn appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last evening. When the orchestra gave its first concert of the present season in the same hall a month ago, it played under the direction of Pierre Monteux, conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, and loaned by that august institution to the band for the first few weeks of the season, pending the arrival in this country of the permanent conductor. Last evening Mr. Monteux sat in one of the stage boxes and listened to the conducting of his confrere and the playing of the orchestra for which he had done so much of the tedious work of initial rehearsing.

For his first Brooklyn program Mr. Rabaud selected the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the Saint-Saen's symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," played the previous evening in Carnegie Hall, and the E Minor Piano Concerto of Chopin. For soloist in the last named he had the services of no less a pianist than Josef Hofmann. It was a program of sufficient variety of kind and manner to afford full opportunity to form opinion of the orchestra and of the conductor.

The Beethoven Symphony in A major was termed by the ever-terminizing Richard Wagner as the "apotheosis of the dance," and since Wagner's time we have had innumerable conductors who, relying on the immortal Richard's dictum, have convinced their admirers that a rigid reading is thereby justified. To the glory and credit of Mr. Rabaud, Beethoven apparently means something more, and last evening we heard a human and humanizing publication of the symphony's movements that probably approached nearer to the Beethoven spirit than any we have heard of recent years. The symphony, in addition to affording this test of the conductor's predilections and taste, also afforded a measure of the orchestra's attainments.

During the few weeks that Mr. Rabaud has had the men under his control he has whipped them into an interpretative medium of high rank, one that takes position alongside the Boston Symphony of other years and other conditions, and in one respect at least—the quality of its tone—superior to the bands who annually have journeyed from the Hub to shed effulgence upon the local seasons. The contemplative measures of the Allegretto will linger long in the memory of all who heard them last evening, so lustrous was the tone and so compelling the details of execution.

But Mr. Rabaud is just as successful in movements that call for rapidity of tempo, and the band just as successful in realizing the conductor's call for virtuosity. Mr. Rabaud fears not a rapid tempo. Last evening he took the finale at an exhilarating pace, and under the deftness and pliancy of wrist that characterizes his conducting of an allegro passage the rhythms of this joyous music crackled and sparkled, now rising to a forte of power, now sinking into whisperings of tonal beauty.

The combination of Hofmann's exquisite playing and rare accompanying on the part of orchestra and leader provided a rarely beautiful reading of the concerto. Only once did the combination slip. It was not apparent to the man in the audience who was responsible, whether Hofmann in a mental lapse made the false entry or whether the conductor's beat was not precise enough; but the indecision of a few measures soon resolved itself into the necessary co-ordination. Hofmann's fingers sang last evening as eloquently as the human voice. The details of his playing provided such sensuous joy as Chopin dreamed, yet appreciation of the lovely moments only prepared for the fuller satisfaction of the contemplation of the entire structure. A noble work, nobly planned.

m EAGLE
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The whole country is to be congratulated that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is re-established in its old position of musical pre-eminence under a leader who gives abundant promise of maintaining its high standards. M. Henri Rabaud has conducted two concerts in this city, one in Carnegie Hall and one in the Brooklyn Academy, and there is general recognition of the persistence of those technical excellencies for which this band has long been renowned, and which were liable to be impaired because of the excision of a considerable body of enemy alien players following the internment of Dr. Muck, as well as of the suitability of M. Rabaud for the high post to which he has been called.

This is something far broader and more significant than the fate of the individual musicians involved in the reorganization. Since the days when Theodore Thomas dominated the musical life of America the Boston Symphony Orchestra has carried on the work which Thomas began, of teaching the American people to love the higher forms of music, to know and appreciate the best that has been written, and to insist that that best receive worthy interpretation.

In this city our own Philharmonic is an older body, but its influence has been confined to New York until recently. Its disbandment would be a local loss, but the failure of the Boston Symphony would be a nation-wide misfortune, removing our standard by which the work of local organization is judged. That such failure has not followed the weeding out of the German element in the band is matter for rejoicing. So also is the fact that the new conductor reveals broad and high standards and the indications that his interpretation of the musical classics is not to be marred by personal eccentricities or through any vain desire to make the conductor appear greater than the composer whom it is his duty to interpret. We have quite enough personal advertisement through the medium of music. It is highly desirable that the leader of our chief orchestra should not be affected by that itch and M. Rabaud's freedom from it is not the least of his merits.

STAR
om Washington, D. C. ldress
ate DEC 4 - 1918

Boston Symphony Concert.

With a program representing the French, the German and the Russian musical art, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Henri Rabaud, gave its second concert of the season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica" and this was followed by Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," and the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes." The audience manifested great enthusiasm and gave to the new conductor an ovation. "The Star Spangled Banner" was played at the opening.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
DEC 9 -

Music.

Rabaud Again With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Henri Rabaud led his second Carnegie Hall concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon in the presence of a very large and cordially approving audience. There was no trace of favoritism in his programme, which consisted of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Dukas's scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the second symphony, in B minor, of Borodin.

The Weber overture was played with notable brilliance. There were the pomp and strut of chivalry, the authentic "Weberian flourish"; the song theme was sung tenderly, the mysterious largo conveyed the proper shudder. Mozart's symphony was set forth with clarity and polish, though only in the finale did leader and men find the Jovian note. But the sensational feature of the concert turned out to be the performance of the Dukas scherzo.

That work has served the Boston orchestra as a battle horse ever since Mr. Gericke took it up a decade and a half ago. It has had innumerable performances in this town by the Boston and other orchestras, but only twice, in all probability, has it been really played—when Mr. Monteux led it at a Civic concert in the summer of 1917 and on Saturday. Both French leaders turned the battle horse, which, like the joke, had gone stale under a series of sluggish Germanic dobbin-joggers, into a fiery host of snorting chargers and the joke into humor colossal, Gargantuan, as if for Rabelais's private pleasure. Only, Mr. Rabaud, though the Civic orchestra was good, had the better band.

After so rehabilitating the droll tale of Dukas, Mr. Rabaud led an imposing performance of Borodin's symphony. Why have the conductors of our neighborhood so neglected this symphony, finished in 1877, produced in America as long ago as 1898? Here is another splendid work out of Russia that holds the listener spellbound from the first note to the last. There is an opening movement of feudal ceremony and color, in which the composer is said to have in mind the ancient gatherings of Russian princes. The Slav troubadours, the bayans, sing their melodious lays through the adagio, and in the finale heroes banquet jubilantly "to the sound of the guzla and the bamboo flute in the midst of the rejoicing crowd." There is a scherzo, a Muscovite one-step, the listener can interpret as he will—perhaps again Mazeppa, if we stick to feudal times; if not, perhaps the Moscow-Petersburg flier, in the days before the latter city had Russianized her name.

In any case, the symphony is vastly worth rescuing from neglect. One of the everlasting four of Brahms, or even one of Beethoven's overworked nine, to say nothing of the entire Tchaikovsky chain gang, could take a needed rest while the whole public becomes acquainted with the beauties of Borodin's B minor.

"The Star-Spangled Banner" prefaced the concert and before the second part of the programme Mr. Rabaud led "God Save the King" in honor of the day. The English anthem received long and hearty applause.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
ress: New York City
e

FESTAL CONCERT BY PHILHARMONIC

Boston Orchestra, With Conductor Rabaud Conducting, Delights Matinee Audience.

ORGANIST BONNET'S RECITAL

A festival concert by the Philharmonic Society at Carnegie Hall last evening in celebration of the foundation of the Czecho-Slovak Republic, was featured by the playing of Dvorak's noble symphony, "The New World," followed by three numbers by Smetana, Firich's "Evening Idyll" and properly concluding an all-Czecho-Slovak program with Dvorak's two Slavic Dances. Conductor Stransky and his men showed to far better advantage than in their Friday adventure among strange gods, and the large audience manifested unqualified satisfaction.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted a record-breaking matinee audience to Carnegie Hall yesterday when conductor Rabaud again was the modest recipient of a pronounced demonstration of approval. Mozart's Symphony in C major, with the "Jupiter" fugue finale, showed the great instrument finally and completely under the gently vigorous command of the new conductor, and in the Borodin Symphony, which concluded the brief but most commendably chosen program, the Bostonians showed all the alertness, unanimity and instant response which were characteristic of the

WORLD
s: New York City
DEC 8 1918

HENRI RABAUD WINS NEW LAURELS HERE

New Conductor of Boston Orchestra Confirms First Favorable Impression.

It needed only one more appearance of Henri Rabaud in the role of orchestral conductor to confirm the belie of those who passed judgment on hin last Thursday in his splendid abili ties. M. Rabaud led the Boston Symphony musicians for the second tim here in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, and he touched and maintaine a high artistic mark.

The Weber "Euryanthe" overture which opened the programme, wa performed with the necessary plasti vitality; and the majestic C majo symphony of Mozart (the "Jupiter" with a clarity of musical enunciatio and a purity of classic style that re flected Rabaud's aristocratic leaning

He preserved, as on Thursday eve ning, the uninterrupted flow of th melodic line, and his dynamic con trasts were of the best and seldo too sharply drawn. Perhaps nowhe was this more perfectly displaye than in the descriptive piece, "Th Sorcerer's Apprentice," of Duka Nothing finer in tonal orchestr coloring has been heard here sin the season opened.

The Borodin B minor symphon concluded the concert.

The tone of the Boston musicia and their attack and finish of phra again commanded admiration. In improved musical state and unde its new conductor, the visiting o chestra will be welcome here.

CITIZEN
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

RABAUD'S OPERA PRESENTED HERE

Boston Orchestra's Leader Attends Performance

HEARS HIS WORK FOR FIRST TIME IN AMERICA

"Marouf" Splendidly Sung—Musical Version of "Arabian Nights' Tale" Delights All—Frances Alda, De Luca and Rothier in Cast.

At the Academy of Music last evening the Metropolitan Opera Company gave Henri Rabaud's fantastic opera, "Marouf." It was the first presentation of the opera in Brooklyn and what added considerable to the interest of the occasion was the fact that the composer, who is now conductor of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and appeared here Friday evening, remained in Brooklyn for last night's performance; it was the first time he had heard his opera in this country.

The audience, which was a large one, was enthusiastic in his praise and that of the opera itself. A splendid cast, styles—one with shirrings, pleated ruffles, ribbon and flower trimming—another with lace inset at sides in wheel design, and cunning Dutch tabs—colors are pink, blue, lavender and rose.....1.85

Crepe de Chine Boudoir Caps—pink, blue, lavender and rose, with garniture of buds, lace inserts, bows and narrow, finely pleated frills.....1.23
Crepe de Chine and Satin Boudoir Caps—hemstitched, beribboned, with flower touches.....74
Silk Boudoir Caps, in pink, blue and lavender, bordered with lace and finished with tiny buds.....54
Finer Boudoir Caps to.....4.67

NECKWEAR

Quite the newest thing in Georgette Collars are the round neck pleated styles, which come in two-tone combinations of lovely colors—lemon and black victory red and blue, and many other —also white and flesh.....1.47
Satin Monk Collars are considered very smart now—their becoming ingness also makes them acceptable as gifts—
.94 1.47 1.85 2.18

Brooklyn, N. Y.
ress
DEC 6 1918

HENRI RABAUD CONDUCTS

Permanent Conductor of Boston Symphony Proves Worth—In Brooklyn This Evening.

Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first Metropolitan appearance in that capacity in Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Rabaud is familiar primarily because he is the composer of "Marouf," the opera which will be given in Brooklyn Saturday evening. The program including the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony, Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes provided an adequate test for orchestra and conductor alike.

With the departure of the unlamented Dr. Muck and the band's purging of the German element, consisting of 22 players, considerable doubt existed on the part of the many admirers and supporters of the orchestra as to whether it could under new and novel conditions retain its place as the premier orchestra of the country. The first visit of the band last month to the Metropolitan district, when the concerts were conducted by Pierre Monteux, proved that its personnel was as good as ever, and in certain respects superior, notably in the more colorful and more highly emotional quality of the strings; but at the same time, it was realized that for it to continue to hold its proud position a conductor of achievement and magnetism was necessary. That factor seems to have been supplied in Henri Rabaud.

Tall, spare, angular, Mr. Rabaud looks more a genial New England preacher than a foreign conductor. In the direction of his men he varies his beat to suit the occasion, at times depending upon the slightest movement of the wrist, at others, when a climax would be achieved, using full, sweeping gestures of the entire arms. Though he conducts from a score, his knowledge of the music is such as to enable him to follow the second half of the old description that there are "two kinds of conductors, those that have the score in their heads, and those that have their heads in the score."

Mr. Rabaud is a master of euphony, of balance, of precision. Under his conducting last evening every attack was precise, the individual choirs spoke their musical messages with smoothness and unanimity of utterance, the range of dynamics was wide, and crescendi and diminuendi were built evenly and gradually. More intellectual than emotional, traditional rather than revolutionarily dramatic, reverential rather than individual—such were the readings vouchsafed us. The Beethoven Symphony was a model of clarity, and if lacking on the emotional and sentimental side, the lack was welcome. Last evening we heard Beethoven's epical work given in its original purity. Only three horns sounded the trio passages. While differences may exist as to the advisability of rescoring the Beethoven works because of the tonal and dynamic divergences of the modern orchestra from that for which the composer wrote, certainly Mr. Rabaud's dependence last evening upon the original scoring is not censurable. The result certainly justified the means.

The interpretation of the Saint-Saens was undoubtedly a labor of love to Mr. Rabaud. Probably, never in its American readings has the work received so able, so eloquent a proclamation. And the movements of the Russian's picture of Spain crackled with rhythmic precision. The Boston Symphony has passed the test; it remains as ever the premier orchestra. Its Brooklyn admirers will have their chance to delight in its mission of musical delight this evening, when Josef Hofmann will add his potent pianism as soloist.

ENQUIRER
s: Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Rabaud conductor, will give its d concert this season at the Acad- of Music on Monday evening, De- r 2, when the programme will be llows: Beethoven Symphony No. Major; Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sor- ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"); in Symphony No. 2 in B minor.

EAGLE
s Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 7 1918

Rabaud Conducts at Academy; Divides Honors with Hofmann

Henri Rabaud made his first Brooklyn appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last evening. When the orchestra gave its first concert of the present season in the same hall a month ago, it played under the direction of Pierre Monteux, conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, and loaned by that august institution to the band for the first few weeks of the season, pending the arrival in this country of the permanent conductor. Last evening Mr. Monteux sat in one of the stage boxes and listened to the conducting of his confrere and the playing of the orchestra for which he had done so much of the tedious work of initial rehearsing.

For his first Brooklyn program Mr. Rabaud selected the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the Saint-Saen's symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," played the previous evening in Carnegie Hall, and the E Minor Piano Concerto of Chopin. For soloist in the last named he had the services of no less a pianist than Josef Hofmann. It was a program of sufficient variety of kind and manner to afford full opportunity to form opinion of the orchestra and of the conductor.

The Beethoven Symphony in A major was termed by the ever-terminizing Richard Wagner as the "apotheosis of the dance," and since Wagner's time we have had innumerable conductors who, relying on the immortal Richard's dictum, have convinced their admirers that a rigid reading is thereby justified. To the glory and credit of Mr. Rabaud, Beethoven apparently means something more, and last evening we heard a human and humanizing publication of the symphony's movements that probably approached nearer to the Beethoven spirit than any we have heard of recent years. The symphony, in addition to affording this test of the conductor's predilections and taste, also afforded a measure of the orchestra's attainments.

During the few weeks that Mr. Rabaud has had the men under his control he has whipped them into an interpretative medium of high rank, one that takes position alongside the Boston Symphony of other years and other conditions, and in one respect at least—the quality of its tone—superior to the bands who annually have journeyed from the Hub to shed effulgence upon the local seasons. The contemplative measures of the Allegretto will linger long in the memory of all who heard them last evening, so lustrous was the tone and so compelling the details of execution.

But Mr. Rabaud is just as successful in movements that call for rapidity of tempo, and the band just as successful in realizing the conductor's call for virtuosity. Mr. Rabaud fears not a rapid tempo. Last evening he took the finale at an exhilarating pace, and under the deftness and pliancy of wrist that characterizes his conducting of an allegro passage the rhythms of this joyous music crackled and sparkled, now rising to a forte of power, now sinking into whisperings of tonal beauty.

The combination of Hofmann's exquisite playing and rare accompanying on the part of orchestra and leader provided a rarely beautiful reading of the concerto. Only once did the combination slip. It was not apparent to the man in the audience who was responsible, whether Hofmann in a mental lapse made the false entry or whether the conductor's beat was not precise enough; but the indecision of a few measures soon resolved itself into the necessary co-ordination. Hofmann's fingers sang last evening as eloquently as the human voice. The details of his playing provided such sensuous joy as Chopin dreamed, yet appreciation of the lovely moments only prepared for the fuller satisfaction of the contemplation of the entire structure. A noble work, nobly planned.

m EAGLE
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The whole country is to be congratulated that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is re-established in its old position of musical pre-eminence under a leader who gives abundant promise of maintaining its high standards. M. Henri Rabaud has conducted two concerts in this city, one in Carnegie Hall and one in the Brooklyn Academy, and there is general recognition of the persistence of those technical excellencies for which this band has long been renowned, and which were liable to be impaired because of the excision of a considerable body of enemy alien players following the internment of Dr. Muck, as well as of the suitability of M. Rabaud for the high post to which he has been called.

This is something far broader and more significant than the fate of the individual musicians involved in the reorganization. Since the days when Theodore Thomas dominated the musical life of America the Boston Symphony Orchestra has carried on the work which Thomas began, of teaching the American people to love the higher forms of music, to know and appreciate the best that has been written, and to insist that that best receive worthy interpretation.

In this city our own Philharmonic is an older body, but its influence has been confined to New York until recently. Its disbandment would be a local loss, but the failure of the Boston Symphony would be a nation-wide misfortune, removing our standard by which the work of local organization is judged. That such failure has not followed the weeding out of the German element in the band is matter for rejoicing. So also is the fact that the new conductor reveals broad and high standards and the indications that his interpretation of the musical classics is not to be marred by personal eccentricities or through any vain desire to make the conductor appear greater than the composer whom it is his duty to interpret. We have quite enough personal advertisement through the medium of music. It is highly desirable that the leader of our chief orchestra should not be affected by that itch and M. Rabaud's freedom from it is not the least of his merits.

om Washington, D. ldress
ate DEC 4 - 1918

Boston Symphony Concert.

With a program representing the French, the German and the Russian musical art, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Henri Rabaud, gave its second concert of the season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica" and this was followed by Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," and the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes." The audience manifested great enthusiasm and gave to the new conductor an ovation. "The Star Spangled Banner" was played at the opening.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 30 1919

Mr. Rabaud to Lead Boston Symphony.

At the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music, Friday evening, December sixth, the newly appointed Conductor, Henry Benjamin Rabaud, will make his first appearance in this borough. The occasion will be one of deep interest to the Brooklyn supporters of the Orchestra. Mr. Rabaud comes to this country's foremost orchestral organization from the Opéra at Paris, of which he was appointed Conductor in January, 1914. The honor in which he is held at home was publicly recognized in June of that year by the announcement that he had been made Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur. He is also a member of the Executive Committee of the French National Society of Music. Mr. Rabaud comes to us on leave granted by the Minister of Fine Arts, and is sure to receive a cordial welcome in this country. The program for December sixth includes three numbers—Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Chopin's Concerto in E minor, and Saint Saëns' "La Jeunesse d'Hercule." Josef Hofmann is the assisting artist for the Chopin number.

JOSEF HOFMANN,
Assisting artist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Academy of Music, December 6.

HERALD

Washington, D. C.

DEC 4 - 1919

RABAUD SCORES TRIUMPH HERE

Paris Artist in Capital Concert Holds Audience Enthralled.

Henri Rabaud, successor to Dr. Karl Muck, has made his bow to the National Capital.

At the second concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, the new French conductor, fresh from Paris, made his initial appearance as leader of the world-famed organization and was acclaimed a success far beyond expectations.

The occasion was epochal in the musical annals of Washington. It marked the transformation of an orchestra which for many years has stood for perfection even if attained at the cost of machine-like precision.

Program Is Worthy One.

The change was felt more than seen. The end of Teutonic domination, and the birth of Gallic influence was dominantly apparent. The new leader, tall, thin, scholarly, seemed a trifle too well poised, even a bit stiff, until he lifted the baton and then he doffed restraint, injecting a rare contrast of emotion into his interpretation, conveying the message of the music clearly, beautifully and perfectly.

And the program was worthy of the occasion. The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica." Then came Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule." Finally, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Through the well-balanced beauty of these numbers, Mr. Rabaud revealed what some may call the emancipation of the players of Boston, and what is at least the humanizing of their work. Seldom if ever has the "Eroica" symphony been more ably presented in Washington.

The tone poem of Saint-Saens, with its themes of virtue and pleasure, literally enthralled the audience that filled every seat and even stood in aisles to listen. And from this romantic tone-picture of Hercules' youth, the orchestra plunged into the color and fire of the Spanish Caprice, the composition which the great Tschaikowsky so favored that he called it "a colossal masterpiece of instrumentation" and its composer "the greatest master of the day."

This Rimsky-Korsakoff number seemed to reveal Rabaud at his best. When his baton and arms failed to reach the heights desired, he stood on tip-toe and used head and body to control the gorgeous, flame-like sweep of the music and so masterly was his direction that not once did he allow the fervor of interpretation to mar perfection of technique.

Caprice on Spanish Themes, for which Mr. Rabaud admits an especial fondness. Borodin is to provide the Russian number for the Saturday programme with his Second Symphony. For the rest, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas and Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe."

From Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date NOV 30 1919

Music Notes.

"Marouf" the Third Brooklyn Opera.

In view of the fact that Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is the composer of "Marouf," there ought to be especial interest in the performance of this opera at the Academy of Music next week Saturday evening. Wholly aside from this circumstance however, "Marouf" is the best opera which has come out of France in recent years. Although not a great work, it is a fine one and well deserves temporary, if not longer popularity. A musical setting of "The Cobbler of Cairo," from the "Arabian Nights," is particularly meritorious in that in its music, as well as on the comedy side, it is full of the real spirit of the wonderful book whence it had its inspiration. "Marouf" is, indeed, a jolly opera and Brooklyn subscribers will find it a very agreeable relief from the tragedy of "Madama Butterfly" and "La Traviata," for from beginning to end it is sheer fun. And it is charmingly presented by the Metropolitan company. De Luca, in the title rôle, and Alda, as the runaway Princess, virtually carry the action upon their shoulders, but there is some good chorus work and an extremely colorful oriental ballet. Pictorially the production is one of the finest in the history of the Metropolitan, and that is saying a great deal. There are bewilderingly beautiful pictures of oriental life, including an animated street scene, an illuminated open-air fête, a desert scene with a moving caravan and an interior of real distinction. Finally, it is an opera uncommonly well suited to Brooklyn's opera house. Do not miss it.

EVENING POST

New York City

NOV 19 1919

New Boston Symphony Conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next, this time with its new and permanently engaged conductor, Henri Rabaud. Mr. Rabaud's father, grandfather, and grand-aunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rome in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music, conducted at the Opéra, the Opéra-Comique, the Conservatoire, and the Lamoureux

New York Herald

From TELEGRAM

Address: New York City

Date DEC 6

Henri Rabaud the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scored a very big personal success at Carnegie Hall last evening, while the orchestra itself in Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony played as it has very rarely played, save in the palmy days of Nikisch. Mr. Rabaud is authoritative without being minatory. He is suggestive, composed, elegant almost, and he has his music at his fingers' tips. The orchestra under his guidance, played admirably throughout. The other numbers included Saint-Saens' rather dull and pretentious "Youth of Hercules" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's refulgent "Caprice Espagnole." There was a very large and enthusiastic audience.

Mr. Rabaud comes of a family of musicians. His father, grandfather and great aunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rome in his youth. organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music, conducted at the Opera, the Opera Comique, the Conservatoire and the Lamoureux concerts. He has many competitions to his credit, of which the best known in this country are his "Second Symphony," and the opera "Marouf," which has been sung at the Metropolitan.

At to-morrow afternoon's concert Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony," Borodin' "Second Symphony," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" will be played.

GIFT FOR MAJOR HIGGINSON ON EIGHTY-FOURTH BIRTHDAY

BOSTON, Mass., Monday.—A book containing the signatures of 4,000 persons who have been subscribers to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last thirty-seven years, was presented to Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, on his eighty-fourth birthday today.

The volume is of Japan vellum with hand tooled covers. It bears on the first page a letter written by Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard College, expressing the signers' feeling of personal gratitude and their sense of public benefits that resulted from Major Higginson's work for and with the orchestra.

SUN, BALTIMORE, DECEMBER 5.

Boston Symphony.

The audience at the Lyric last night waited breathlessly for the result of recent chnges in the conducting of the Boston Symphony, but it has not visibly affected the co-ordinate work of the musicians, and after the first clangerous chords, our musical community breathed easier.

The new conductor, Henri Rabaud, is the composer of the opera "Marouf," which is in its second season at the Metropolitan Opera House. Lovers of the Boston Symphony may rest content with the qualities of the new director. His renditions bear the masterly insight of the scholar and are full of eloquence and imagination. His conducting is typically French and adheres with indomitable fervor to the imagination alone, which was not found in the former conductor's work. Conservatism was outruled in the readings last night and stagnant accentuation was an unheard of thing. The massed orchestra tone was impressive and resilient. The attack was never ragged and a false entrance was never made.

"La Jeunesse d'Hercule," by Saint-Saens, was given in place of Beethoven's Symphony in A major. It is a symphonic poem which begins with a short andante sostenuto, the violin giving the impression of recitative phrases. The theme is developed and leads to an expressive subsidiary melody, advancing to the rhythmic variation which breaks into a wild Bacchanalian tune.

In the first part of allegro moderato of the "Unfinished Symphony in B minor," by Schubert, the impression was given for the fantastic and picturesque, developing from a lightness of tone to sweeping effects and continuing with poetic expressiveness. In the andante con moto the first violins played as one instrument.

This was followed by "L'Apprenti Sorcier" by Dukas. This charming French composer has pictured a sorcerer's apprentice. He spins an irre descendent web, and his dance rhythm are sonorous and melodic, ending wit his exotic scales. The orchestra showe its skill in this fanciful piece and playe with remarkable unison and delicacy o perception. This was the novelty of th program, and brought M. Rabaud th honor due him.

The Symphony in B minor by Borodi beginning with the allegro moderato, w the end of the evening. There is muc to be said of the architecteural plannin planning and transparency of this la group, which was lacking in standard zation and full of the inspiration t throughout the previous pieces. Visi was apparent and the orchestra play with accepted ease and dynamic range

SUN, BALTIMORE, DECEMBER 5.

LYRIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert took place at the Lyric last evening, the interest of the occasion centering in the appearance of Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the celebrated organization, who was afforded a warm and extremely enthusiastic reception.

Probably the most vivid impression made last evening by the readings of this distinguished Frenchman—for he has a good deal of distinction—was that he is inherently a lyric conductor. Because it became immediately apparent that it was in the interpretation of pure music. of the melodic episodes, of the more definitely expressed forms, that the orchestra under his baton played with the greatest amount of sympathy and charm and was most responsive and impressionable. In the more colored modern works it seemed occasionally to take the bit in its teeth.

Many Beautiful Things About Concert.

Many things about this concert were extremely beautiful, as, for instance, the Frenchman's interpretation of the more spiritual passages in the picturesque Saint-Saens tone-poem and his reading of the Andante from the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert. Very lovely, too. was the Allegro, for all that it was a little pale, a calm, finely controlled performance in which the tone of the big instrument seemed both mellow and satisfying. These numbers and the exquisite Andante of the Borodin B minor symphony, a peculiarly plaintive, mysterious and inherently Oriental work, replete with strange coloring of the greatest charm, and of which the players gave an introspective and highly imaginative performance, were the episodes of the concert that served to exploit the best characteristics of the newly organized orchestra.

But it was very evident at this second of the current season's concerts that the great band is in a transitional stage. For the time being it is not by any means the famous "perfect instrument" of other days. The precision of attack, the unified bowing, is no longer there. The violins no longer seem "one instrument." The orchestra's playing last evening was often very ragged, the tone quality muddy. For while it was generally rich in color it was as often (in the modern works at least) devoid of nuance, of dynamic variety. This was especially noticeable in the splendid Dukas work, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," a most brilliant example of modern orchestration, a score that is a real tour-de-force, into the reading of which M. Rabaud introduced not the slightest suggestion of humor and which, as played yesterday, became merely a noisy and bizarre study, from which all literary, interpretative suggestion was quite absent.

Borodin Number Lacking In Clarity.

The classic symphony was played with a certain amount of delicacy that gave it distinction and served to indicate the sympathy that the new conductor has for the old masters. But of the Borodin work, a truly magnificent piece of writing, curiously rugged and barbaric. the reading, while dynamically varied and not without power and a high vitality, was lacking in clarity. Except in the Andante referred to above, the performance of it was rather devoid of finesse.

We have so long banked upon this absolute finesse of the Boston Orchestra that it seems rather difficult to realize that with its large percentage of entirely new material it has suddenly become "a young instrument," the development and evolution of which, under a French conductor, we must now study with sympathy and interest.

J. O. L.

BALTIMORE NEWS Dec. 5

RABAUD MAKES BOW AS BOSTON DIRECTOR

Second Concert Of This Famous Organization Is Admirably Conducted By Him.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at the Lyric and was naturally an event replete with interest to music-loving Baltimore, introducing, as it did, Henri Rabaud, the newly appointed conductor of the organization.

The audience was comparatively small, considering the recognized social prestige of these concerts, but the new conductor was most enthusiastically greeted and the whole concert thoroughly appreciated, despite the fact that something of the wind had been taken out of the sails of M. Rabaud by the splendid musicianship of Pierre Montent, who conducted the first of this series of concerts last month. While it would be foolish to push the parallel too far, one feels that there exists something in the general character of the playing of the new Boston Orchestra as compared with that of the old that is in a way suggestive of the diversity of style between that of the Flonzaley and Kneisel Quartets. There is more abandon, elasticity and individuality in the new orchestra, but possibly a less conspicuous display of precision, finish and perfection in detail.

Many were appalled beforehand at the prospect of two symphonies on the program, but for Beethoven's Seventh was substituted Schubert's fortunately unfinished symphony—fortunately, we say, because it is inconceivable that the composer would have consistently maintained such an altitude as pervades the two completed movements.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN DECEMBER 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The new Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted for the first time in Baltimore under the leadership of Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, received an unusual ovation from the large audience at the Lyric last night. Quiet dignity and perfect assurance of control over the orchestra were noticeable in Rabaud's manner. Difficult it was to realize the presence of so many instruments in the waves of sound that rose and fell as if by one accord, in perect harmony and absolutely in time.

The program was exceptional, well selected and furnished enough variety to captivate the varying tastes of even a musical public. By request, in place of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, the following numbers were substituted: La Jeunesse d'Hercule (The Youth of Hercules), by Saint-Saens, and Shubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor. The remainder of the program, Dukas' L'Apprenti Sorcier and Borodin's Symphony in B minor, were given as planned.

The Youth of Hercules was presented with exceptional merit, treated in a broad manner, yet observing all the fine details that makes the symphonic poem so beautiful and inspiring. Rabaud, who is a musician by inheritance as well as taste, without diverging too much from the spirit of the number, introduced his own interpretations with great artistry and skill. Especially heroic was the theme of Virtue, given by the unmuted strings with their strong, almost stern, call to duty. The tender notes of the above also lent a charm to the truly poetic rendition.

Dukas' L'Apprenti Sorcier (The Sorcerer's Apprentice) received special attention. Borodin's Symphony in B minor also claimed a large part in the approval of the audience, with its vivid coloring and its oriental haunting melody.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD DECEMBER 3,

DEBUT OF RABAUD

French Conductor Directs Boston Symphony Concert Here.

As a pianist is judged by Chopin playing, an orchestral conductor rises or falls by his ability as a Beethoven interpreter. In selecting the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven for his first Philadelphia concert Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at once presented himself as a musician of exceptional power.

Rabaud comes to the Orchestra with the prestige of a distinguished foreign career. He has been identified with both the opera and concert life of Paris, but is first of all a composer of great individuality and charm. His symphonies have been presented here with success, while his Oriental opera, "Marouf," has won wide recognition.

There is little in the appearance of Rabaud to suggest the musician. Tall, thin and ascetic-looking, he might easily be selected as a scientist or doctor of philosophy or letters. His resemblance to Charles Evans Hughes, sometime candidate for the Presidency of the United States, is striking. Rabaud has the glowing temperament of a genuine musician, however, and he did not fail to win his audience last night. His Beethoven playing was of great interest. The hackneyed Seventh Symphony was transformed into something fresh and vital and endowed with a charm that arrested at every turn. The first movement was taken with a more deliberate tempo than we are accustomed to, but the finesse of the orchestral manipulation amply justified the departure. Every voice of the orchestra was heard and the ensemble was perfection itself. Rabaud draws a noble tone, not merely big, but strikingly vital and inspiring.

The allegretto, which we are inured to hearing at funeral pace, was done with a slightly accelerated motion and gained immensely in chorus. The third movement was a veritable ripple of light, sensuous tone. There were marked variations of tempi. Rabund does not hesitate to introduce strong contrasts, both in tone and tempo, but his effects are always surprisingly novel and decidedly unusual. In the finale he worked up a magnificent climax and the conclusion of the symphony found him established with a Philadelphia audience, at least, as a conductor of pronounced ability and one for whom it is safe to predict future popularity.

Unlike his motionless predecessor, Rabund, as a very energetic leader. His motions, however, are so apparently the result of genuine musical inspiration and are so lacking in pose that they are never obtrusive, but soon become part of the man's personal expression.

Last night's audience was small for a Boston Orchestra concert. Probably the two symphonies proved alarming to some unaccustomed to that foreign habit. The Brodin B minor was another form of triumph for Rabaud, the eastern style seeming as much his medium as the Beethoven. Doubtless he is a man of universal musical tastes and power to present any type of music well.

The "L'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, played between the symphonies, aroused great enthusiasm.

LIFE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 30 1919

Mr. Rabaud to Lead Boston Symphony.

At the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music, Friday evening, December sixth, the newly appointed Conductor, Henry Benjamin Rabaud, will make his first appearance in this borough. The occasion will be one of deep interest to the Brooklyn supporters of the Orchestra. Mr. Rabaud comes to this country's foremost orchestral organization from the Opéra at Paris, of which he was appointed Conductor in January, 1914. The honor in which he is held at home was publicly recognized in June of that year by the announcement that he had been made Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur. He is also a member of the Executive Committee of the French National Society of Music. Mr. Rabaud comes to us on leave granted by the Minister of Fine Arts, and is sure to receive a cordial welcome in this country. The program for December sixth includes three numbers—Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Chopin's Concerto in E minor, and Saint Saëns' "La Jeunesse d'Hercule." Josef Hofmann is the assisting artist for the Chopin number.

JOSEF HOFMANN,
Assisting artist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Academy of Music, December 6.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
DEC 4 1919

RABAUD SCORES TRIUMPH HERE

Paris Artist in Capital Concert Holds Audience Enthralled.

Henri Rabaud, successor to Dr. Karl Muck, has made his bow to the National Capital.

At the second concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, the new French conductor, fresh from Paris, made his initial appearance as leader of the world-famed organization and was acclaimed a success far beyond expectations.

The occasion was epochal in the musical annals of Washington. It marked the transformation of an orchestra which for many years has stood for perfection even if attained at the cost of machine-like precision.

Program Is Worthy One.

The change was felt more than seen. The end of Teutonic domination, and the birth of Gallic influence was dominantly apparent. The new leader, tall, thin, scholarly, seemed a trifle too well poised, even a bit stiff, until he lifted the baton and then he doffed restraint, injecting a rare contrast of emotion into his interpretation, conveying the message of the music clearly, beautifully and perfectly.

And the program was worthy of the occasion. The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica." Then came Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule." Finally, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Through the well-balanced beauty of these numbers, Mr. Rabaud revealed what some may call the emancipation of the players of Boston, and what is at least the humanizing of their work. Seldom if ever has the "Eroica" symphony been more ably presented in Washington.

The tone poem of Saint-Saens, with its themes of virtue and pleasure, literally enthralled the audience that filled every seat and even stood in aisles to listen. And from this romantic tone-picture of Hercules' youth, the orchestra plunged into the color and fire of the Spanish Caprice, the composition which the great Tschaikowsky so favored that he called it "a colossal masterpiece of instrumentation" and its composer "the greatest master of the day."

This Rimsky-Korsakoff number seemed to reveal Rabaud at his best. When his baton and arms failed to reach the heights desired, he stood on tip-toe and used head and body to control the gorgeous, flame-like sweep of the music and so masterly was his direction that not once did he allow the fervor of interpretation to mar perfection of technique.

price on Spanish Themes, for which Mr. Rabaud admits an especial fondness. Borodin is to provide the Russian number for the Saturday programme with his Second Symphony. For the rest, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas and Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe."

From TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date

Henri Rabaud the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scored a very big personal success at Carnegie Hall last evening, while the orchestra itself in Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony played as it has very rarely played, save in the palmy days of Nikisch. Mr. Rabaud is authoritative without being dominatory. He is suggestive, composed, elegant almost, and he has his music at his fingers' tips. The orchestra under his guidance, played admirably throughout. The other numbers included Saint-Saens' rather dull and pretentious "Youth of Hercules" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's refulgent "Caprice Espagnole." There was a very large and enthusiastic audience.

Mr. Rabaud comes of a family of musicians. His father, grandfather and great aunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rome in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music, conducted at the Opera, the Opera Comique, the Conservatoire and the Lamoureux concerts. He has many compositions to his credit, of which the best known in this country are his "Second Symphony," and the opera "Marouf," which has been sung at the Metropolitan.

At to-morrow afternoon's concert Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony," Borodin's "Second Symphony," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" will be played.

From Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date NOV 30 1919

Music Notes.

"Marouf" the Third Brooklyn Opera.

In view of the fact that Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is the composer of "Marouf," there ought to be especial interest in the performance of this opera at the Academy of Music next week Saturday evening. Wholly aside from this circumstance however, "Marouf" is the best opera which has come out of France in recent years. Although not a great work, it is a fine one and well deserves temporary, if not longer popularity. A musical setting of "The Cobbler of Cairo," from the "Arabian Nights," is particularly meritorious in that in its music, as well as on the comedy side, it is full of the real spirit of the wonderful book whence it had its inspiration. "Marouf" is, indeed, a jolly opera and Brooklyn subscribers will find it a very agreeable relief from the tragedy of "Madama Butterfly" and "La Traviata," for from beginning to end it is sheer fun. And it is charmingly presented by the Metropolitan company. De Luca, in the title rôle, and Alda, as the runaway Princess, virtually carry the action upon their shoulders, but there is some good chorus work and an extremely colorful oriental ballet. Pictorially the production is one of the finest in the history of the Metropolitan, and that is saying a great deal. There are bewilderingly beautiful pictures of oriental life, including an animated street scene, an illuminated open-air fête, a desert scene with a moving caravan and an interior of real distinction. Finally, it is an opera uncommonly well suited to Brooklyn's opera house. Do not miss it.

New York Herald

EVENING POST
s: New York City

New Boston Symphony Conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next, this time with its new and permanently engaged conductor, Henri Rabaud. Mr. Rabaud's father, grandfather, and grand-aunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rome in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to intfoduce contemporary French music, conducted at the Opéra, the Opéra-Comique, the Conservatoire, and the Lamoureux list all est nd if," the day on r." me nic and Ca-

GIFT FOR MAJOR HIGGINSON ON EIGHTY-FOURTH BIRTHDAY

BOSTON, Mass., Monday.—A book containing the signatures of 4,000 persons who have been subscribers to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last thirty-seven years, was presented to Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, on his eighty-fourth birthday today.

The volume is of Japan vellum with hand tooled covers. It bears on the first page a letter written by Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard College, expressing the signers' feeling of personal gratitude and their sense of public benefits that resulted from Major Higginson's work for and with the orchestra.

SUN, BALTIMORE,
DECEMBER 5,
Boston Symphony.

The audience at the Lyric last night waited breathlessly for the result of recent chnges in the conducting of the Boston Symphony, but it has not visibly affected the co-ordinate work of the musicians, and after the first clangerous chords, our musical community breathed easier.

The new conductor, Henri Rabaud, is the composer of the opera "Marouf," which is in its second season at the Metropolitan Opera House. Lovers of the Boston Symphony may rest content with the qualities of the new director. His renditions bear the masterly insight of the scholar and are full of eloquence and imagination. His conducting is typically French and adheres with indomitable fervor to the imagination alone, which was not found in the former conductor's work. Conservatism was outruled in the readings last night and stagnant accentuation was an unheard of thing. The massed orchestra tone was impressive and resilient. The attack was never ragged and a false entrance was never made.

"La Jeunesse d'Hercule," by Saint Saens, was given in place of Beethoven's Symphony in A major. It is a symphonic poem which begins with a short andante sostenuto, the violin giving the impression of recitative phrases. The theme is developed and leads to an expressive subsidiary melody, advancing to the rhythmic variation which breaks into a wild Bacchanalian tune.

In the first part of allegro moderato of the "Unfinished Symphony in B minor," by Schubert, the impression was given for the fantastic and picturesque, developing from a lightness of tone to sweeping effects and continuing with poetic expressiveness. In the andante con moto the first violins played as one instrument.

This was followed by "L'Apprenti Sorcier" by Dukas. This charming French composer has pictured a sorcerer's apprentice. He spins an irre descendent web, and his dance rhythm are sonorous and melodic, ending wit his exotic scales. The orchestra showe its skill in this fanciful piece and playe with remarkable unison and delicacy o perception. This was the novelty of th program, and brought M. Rabaud th honor due him.

The Symphony in B minor by Borodi beginning with the allegro moderato, w the end of the evening. There is muc to be said of the architecteural plannir planning and transparency of this la group, which was lacking in standard zation and full of the inspiration te throughout the previous pieces. Visi was apparent and the orchestra play with accepted ease and dynamic range.

SUN, BALTIMORE
DECEMBER 5,

LYRIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert took place at the Lyric last evening, the interest of the occasion centering in the appearance of Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the celebrated organization, who was afforded a warm and extremely enthusiastic reception.

Probably the most vivid impression made last evening by the readings of this distinguished Frenchman—for he has a good deal of distinction—was that he is inherently a lyric conductor. Because it became immediately apparent that it was in the interpretation of pure music, of the melodic episodes, of the more definitely expressed forms, that the orchestra under his baton played with the greatest amount of sympathy and charm and was most responsive and impressionable. In the more colored modern works it seemed occasionally to take the bit in its teeth.

Many Beautiful Things About Concert.

Many things about this concert were extremely beautiful, as, for instance, the Frenchman's interpretation of the more spiritual passages in the picturesque Saint-Saens tone-poem and his reading of the Andante from the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert. Very lovely, too, was the Allegro, for all that it was a little pale, a calm, finely controlled performance in which the tone of the big instrument seemed both mellow and satisfying. These numbers and the exquisite Andante of the Borodin B minor symphony, a peculiarly plaintive, mysterious and inherently Oriental work, replete with strange coloring of the greatest charm, and of which the players gave an introspective and highly imaginative performance, were the episodes of the concert that served to exploit the best characteristics of the newly organized orchestra.

But it was very evident at this second of the current season's concerts that the great band is in a transitional stage. For the time being it is not by any means the famous "perfect instrument" of other days. The precision of attack, the unified bowing, is no longer there. The violins no longer seem "one instrument." The orchestra's playing last evening was often very ragged, the tone quality muddy. For while it was generally rich in color it was as often (in the modern works at least) devoid of nuance, of dynamic variety. This was especially noticeable in the splendid Dukas work, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," a most brilliant example of modern orchestration, a score that is a real tour-de-force, into the reading of which M. Rabaud introduced not the slightest suggestion of humor and which, as played yesterday, became merely a noisy and bizarre study, from which all literary, interpretative suggestion was quite absent.

Borodin Number Lacking In Clarity.

The classic symphony was played with a certain amount of delicacy that gave it distinction and served to indicate the sympathy that the new conductor has for the old masters. But of the Borodin work, a truly magnificent piece of writing, curiously rugged and barbaric, the reading, while dynamically varied and not without power and a high vitality, was lacking in clarity. Except in the Andante referred to above, the performance of it was rather devoid of finesse.

We have so long banked upon this absolute finesse of the Boston Orchestra that it seems rather difficult to realize that with its large percentage of entirely new material it has suddenly become "a young instrument," the development and evolution of which, under a French conductor, we must now study with sympathy and interest.

J. O. L.

BALTIMORE NEWS Dec. 5

RABAUD MAKES BOW AS BOSTON DIRECTOR

Second Concert Of This Famous Organization Is Admirably Conducted By Him.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at the Lyric and was naturally an event replete with interest to music-loving Baltimore, introducing, as it did, Henri Rabaud, the newly appointed conductor of the organization.

The audience was comparatively small, considering the recognized social prestige of these concerts, but the new conductor was most enthusiastically greeted and the whole concert thoroughly appreciated, despite the fact that something of the wind had been taken out of the sails of M. Rabaud by the splendid musicianship of Pierre Montent, who conducted the first of this series of concerts last month. While it would be foolish to push the parallel too far, one feels that there exists something in the general character of the playing of the new Boston Orchestra as compared with that of the old that is in a way suggestive of the diversity of style between that of the Flonzaley and Kneisel Quartets. There is more abandon, elasticity and individuality in the new orchestra, but possibly a less conspicuous display of precision, finish and perfection in detail.

Many were appalled beforehand at the prospect of two symphonies on the program, but for Beethoven's Seventh was substituted Schubert's fortunately unfinished symphony—fortunately, we say, because it is inconceivable that the composer would have consistently maintained such an altitude as pervades the two completed movements.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN
DECEMBER 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The new Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted for the first time in Baltimore under the leadership of Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, received an unusual ovation from the large audience at the Lyric last night. Quiet dignity and perfect assurance of control over the orchestra were noticeable in Rabaud's manner. Difficult it was to realize the presence of so many instruments in the waves of sound that rose and fell as if by one accord, in perect harmony and absolutely in time.

The program was exceptional, well selected and furnished enough variety to captivate the varying tastes of even a musical public. By request, in place of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, the following numbers were substituted: La Jeunesse d'Hercule (The Youth of Hercules), by Saint-Saens, and Shubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor. The remainder of the program, Dukas' L'Apprenti Sorcier and Borodin's Symphony in B minor, were given as planned.

The Youth of Hercules was presented with exceptional merit, treated in a broad manner, yet observing all the fine details that makes the symphonic poem so beautiful and inspiring. Rabaud, who is a musician by inheritance as well as taste, without diverging too much from the spirit of the number, introduced his own interpretations with great artistry and skill. Especially heroic was the theme of Virtue, given by the unmuted strings with their strong, almost stern, call to duty. The tender notes of the above also lent a charm to the truly poetic rendition.

Dukas' L'Apprenti Sorcier (The Sorcerer's Apprentice) received special attention. Borodin's Symphony in B minor also claimed a large part in the approval of the audience, with its vivid coloring and its oriental haunting melody.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD
DECEMBER 3,

DEBUT OF RABAUD

French Conductor Directs Boston Symphony Concert Here.

As a pianist is judged by Chopin playing, an orchestral conductor rises or falls by his ability as a Beethoven interpreter. In selecting the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven for his first Philadelphia concert Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at once presented himself as a musician of exceptional power.

Rabaud comes to the Orchestra with the prestige of a distinguished foreign career. He has been identified with both the opera and concert life of Paris, but is first of all a composer of great individuality and charm. His symphonies have been presented here with success, while his Oriental opera, "Marouf," has won wide recognition.

There is little in the appearance of Rabaud to suggest the musician. Tall, thin and ascetic-looking, he might easily be selected as a scientist or doctor of philosophy or letters. His resemblance to Charles Evans Hughes, sometime candidate for the Presidency of the United States, is striking. Rabaud has the glowing temperament of a genuine musician, however, and he did not fail to win his audience last night. His Beethoven playing was of great interest. The hackneyed Seventh Symphony was transformed into something fresh and vital and endowed with a charm that arrested at every turn. The first movement was taken with a more deliberate tempo than we are accustomed to, but the finesse of the orchestral manipulation amply justified the departure. Every voice of the orchestra was heard and the ensemble was perfection itself. Rabaud draws a noble tone, not merely big, but strikingly vital and inspiring.

The allegretto, which we are inured to hearing at funeral pace, was done with a slightly accelerated motion and gained immensely in chorus. The third movement was a veritable ripple of light, sensuous tone. There were marked variations of templ. Rabund does not hesitate to introduce strong contrasts, both in tone and tempo, but his effects are always surprisingly novel and decidedly unusual. In the finale he worked up a magnificent climax and the conclusion of the symphony found him established with a Philadelphia audience, at least, as a conductor of pronounced ability and one for whom it is safe to predict future popularity.

Unlike his motionless predecessor, Rabund, as a very energetic leader. His motions, however, are so apparently the result of genuine musical inspiration and are so lacking in pose that they are never obtrusive, but soon become part of the man's personal expression.

Last night's audience was small for a Boston Orchestra concert. Probably the two symphonies proved alarming to some unaccustomed to that foreign habit. The Brodin B minor was another form of triumph for Rabaud, the eastern style seeming as much his medium as the Beethoven. Doubtless he is a man of universal musical tastes and power to present any type of music well.

The "L'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, played between the symphonies, aroused great enthusiasm.

LIFE

Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 30 1919

Mr. Rabaud to Lead Boston Symphony.

At the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music, Friday evening, December sixth, the newly appointed Conductor, Henry Benjamin Rabaud, will make his first appearance in this borough. The occasion will be one of deep interest to the Brooklyn supporters of the Orchestra. Mr. Rabaud comes to this country's foremost orchestral organization from the Opéra at Paris, of which he was appointed Conductor in January, 1914. The honor in which he is held at home was publicly recognized in June of that year by the announcement that he had been made Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur. He is also a member of the Executive Committee of the French National Society of Music. Mr. Rabaud comes to us on leave granted by the Minister of Fine Arts, and is sure to receive a cordial welcome in this country. The program for December sixth includes three numbers—Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Chopin's Concerto in E minor, and Saint Saëns' "La Jeunesse d'Hercule." Josef Hofmann is the assisting artist for the Chopin number.

JOSEF HOFMANN,
Assisting artist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Academy of Music, December 6.

HERALD

Washington, D. C.

DEC 4 1919

orrow—
est tem-
vest, 29.
Weather

TH

CLUB TO BUY

Henri Rabaud, successor to Dr. Karl Muck, has made his bow to the National Capital.

At the second concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, the new French conductor, fresh from Paris, made his initial appearance as leader of the world-famed organization and was acclaimed a success far beyond expectations.

The occasion was epochal in the musical annals of Washington. It marked the transformation of an orchestra which for many years has stood for perfection even if attained at the cost of machine-like precision.

Program Is Worthy One.

The change was felt more than seen. The end of Teutonic domination, and the birth of Gallic influence was dominantly apparent. The new leader, tall, thin, scholarly, seemed a trifle too well poised, even a bit stiff, until he lifted the baton and then he doffed restraint, injecting a rare contrast of emotion into his interpretation, conveying the message of the music clearly, beautifully and perfectly.

And the program was worthy of the occasion. The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica." Then came Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule." Finally, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Through the well-balanced beauty of these numbers, Mr. Rabaud revealed what some may call the emancipation of the players of Boston, and what is at least the humanizing of their work. Seldom if ever has the "Eroica" symphony been more ably presented in Washington.

The tone poem of Saint-Saens, with its themes of virtue and pleasure, literally enthralled the audience that filled every seat and even stood in aisles to listen. And from this romantic tone-picture of Hercules' youth, the orchestra plunged into the

rom Brooklyn, N. Y.

ddress

ate NOV 30 1919

Music Notes.

"Marouf" the Third Brooklyn Opera.

In view of the fact that Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is the composer of "Marouf," there ought to be especial interest in the performance of this opera at the Academy of Music next week Saturday evening. Wholly aside from this circumstance however, "Marouf" is the best opera which has come out of France in recent years. Although not a great work, it is a fine one and well deserves temporary, if not longer popularity. A musical setting of "The Cobbler of Cairo," from the "Arabian Nights," is particularly meritorious in that in its music, as well as on the comedy side, it is full of the real spirit of the wonderful book whence it had its inspiration. "Marouf" is, indeed, a jolly opera and Brooklyn subscribers will find it a very agreeable relief from the tragedy of "Madama Butterfly" and "La Traviata," for from beginning to end it is sheer fun. And it is charmingly presented by the Metropolitan company. De Luca, in the title rôle, and Alda, as the runaway Princess, virtually carry the action upon their shoulders, but there is some good chorus work and an extremely colorful oriental ballet. Pictorially the production is one of the finest in the history of the Metropolitan, and that is saying a great deal. There are bewilderingly beautiful pictures of oriental life, including an animated street scene, an illuminated open-air fête, a desert scene with a moving caravan and an interior of real distinction. Finally, it is an opera uncommonly well suited to Brooklyn's opera house. Do not miss it.

New York Herald

EVENING POST

s: New York City

New Boston Symphony Conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next, this time with its new and permanently engaged conductor, Henri Rabaud. Mr. Rabaud's father, grandfather, and grand-aunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rome in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music, conducted at the Opéra, the Opéra-Comique, the Conservatoire, and the Lamoureux concerts. He has a considerable list of compositions to his credit in small and large forms, of which the best known in this country are his Second Symphony and the opera "Marouf," produced at the Metropolitan.

A classical symphony stands at the head of each concert—for Thursday evening Beethoven's "Eroica," and on Saturday afternoon Mozart's "Jupiter." The rest of the Thursday programme is filled by Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem "The Youth of Hercules" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's multi-colored "Caprice on Spanish Themes," for which Mr. Rabaud admits an especial fondness. Borodin is to provide the Russian number for the Saturday programme with his Second Symphony. For the rest, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas and Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe."

From TELEGRAM

Address: New York City.

Date

Henri Rabaud the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scored a very big personal success at Carnegie Hall last evening, while the orchestra itself in Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony played as it has very rarely played, save in the palmy days of Nikisch. Mr. Rabaud is authoritative without being minatory. He is suggestive, composed, elegant almost, and he has his music at his fingers' tips. The orchestra under his guidance, played admirably throughout. The other numbers included Saint-Saens' rather dull and pretentious "Youth of Hercules" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's refulgent "Caprice Espagnole." There was a very large and enthusiastic audience.

Mr. Rabaud comes of a family of musicians. His father, grandfather and great aunt were noted musicians. He won the Prix de Rome in his youth, organized concerts in Rome and Vienna to introduce contemporary French music, conducted at the Opera, the Opera Comique, the Conservatoire and the Lamoureux concerts. He has many compositions to his credit, of which the best known in this country are his "Second Symphony," and the opera "Marouf," which has been sung at the Metropolitan.

At to-morrow afternoon's concert Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony," Borodin' "Second Symphony," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" will be played.

GIFT FOR MAJOR HIGGINSON ON EIGHTY-FOURTH BIRTHDAY

BOSTON, Mass., Monday.—A book containing the signatures of 4,000 persons who have been subscribers to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last thirty-seven years, was presented to Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, on his eighty-fourth birthday today.

The volume is of Japan vellum with hand tooled covers. It bears on the first page a letter written by Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard College, expressing the signers' feeling of personal gratitude and their sense of public benefits that resulted from Major Higginson's work for and with the orchestra.

SUN, BALTIMORE,
DECEMBER 5,

Boston Symphony.

The audience at the Lyric last night waited breathlessly for the result of recent chnges in the conducting of the Boston Symphony, but it has not visibly affected the co-ordinate work of the musicians, and after the first clangerous chords, our musical community breathed easier.

The new conductor, Henri Rabaud, is the composer of the opera "Marouf," which is in its second season at the Metropolitan Opera House. Lovers of the Boston Symphony may rest content with the qualities of the new director. His renditions bear the masterly insight of the scholar and are full of eloquence and imagination. His conducting is typically French and adheres with indomitable fervor to the imagination alone, which was not found in the former conductor's work. Conservatism was outruled in the readings last night and stagnant accentuation was an unheard of thing. The massed orchestra tone was impressive and resilient. The attack was never ragged and a false entrance was never made.

"La Jeunesse d'Hercule," by Saint Saens, was given in place of Beethoven's Symphony in A major. It is a symphonic poem which begins with a short andante sostenuto, the violin giving the impression of recitative phrases. The theme is developed and leads to an expressive subsidiary melody, advancing to the rhythmic variation which breaks into a wild Bacchanalian tune.

In the first part of allegro moderato of the "Unfinished Symphony in B minor," by Schubert, the impression was given for the fantastic and picturesque, developing from a lightness of tone to sweeping effects and continuing with poetic expressiveness. In the andante con moto the first violins played as one instrument.

This was followed by "L'Apprenti Sorcier" by Dukas. This charming French composer has pictured a sorcerer's apprentice. He spins an irrevocable descendent web, and his dance rhythms are sonorous and melodic, ending with his exotic scales. The orchestra showed its skill in this fanciful piece and played with remarkable unison and delicacy of perception. This was the novelty of the program, and brought M. Rabaud the honor due him.

The Symphony in B minor by Borodin, beginning with the allegro moderato, was the end of the evening. There is much to be said of the architecteural planning, planning and transparency of this large group, which was lacking in standardization and full of the inspiration throughout the previous pieces. Visible was apparent and the orchestra played with accepted ease and dynamic range.

SUN, BALTIMORE
DECEMBER 5,

LYRIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert took place at the Lyric last evening, the interest of the occasion centering in the appearance of Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the celebrated organization, who was afforded a warm and extremely enthusiastic reception.

Probably the most vivid impression made last evening by the readings of this distinguished Frenchman—for he has a good deal of distinction—was that he is inherently a lyric conductor. Because it became immediately apparent that it was in the interpretation of pure music, of the melodic episodes, of the more definitely expressed forms, that the orchestra under his baton played with the greatest amount of sympathy and charm and was most responsive and impressionable. In the more colored modern works it seemed occasionally to take the bit in its teeth.

Many Beautiful Things About Concert.

Many things about this concert were extremely beautiful, as, for instance, the Frenchman's interpretation of the more spiritual passages in the picturesque Saint-Saens tone-poem and his reading of the Andante from the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert. Very lovely, too, was the Allegro, for all that it was a little pale, a calm, finely controlled performance in which the tone of the big instrument seemed both mellow and satisfying. These numbers and the exquisite Andante of the Borodin B minor symphony, a peculiarly plaintive, mysterious and inherently Oriental work, replete with strange coloring of the greatest charm, and of which the players gave an introspective and highly imaginative performance, were the episodes of the concert that served to exploit the best characteristics of the newly organized orchestra.

But it was very evident at this second of the current season's concerts that the great band is in a transitional stage. For the time being it is not by any means the famous "perfect instrument" of other days. The precision of attack, the unified bowing, is no longer there. The violins no longer seem "one instrument." The orchestra's playing last evening was often very ragged, the tone quality muddy. For while it was generally rich in color it was as often (in the modern works at least) devoid of nuance, of dynamic variety. This was especially noticeable in the splendid Dukas work, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," a most brilliant example of modern orchestration, a score that is a real tour-de-force, into the reading of which M. Rabaud introduced not the slightest suggestion of humor and which, as played yesterday, became merely a noisy and bizarre study, from which all literary, interpretative suggestion was quite absent.

Borodin Number Lacking In Clarity.

The classic symphony was played with a certain amount of delicacy that gave it distinction and served to indicate the sympathy that the new conductor has for the old masters. But of the Borodin work, a truly magnificent piece of writing, curiously rugged and barbaric, the reading, while dynamically varied and not without power and a high vitality, was lacking in clarity. Except in the Andante referred to above, the performance of it was rather devoid of finesse.

We have so long banked upon this absolute finesse of the Boston Orchestra that it seems rather difficult to realize that with its large percentage of entirely new material it has suddenly become "a young instrument," the development and evolution of which, under a French conductor, we must now study with sympathy and interest.

J. O. L.

BALTIMORE NEWS Dec. 5

RABAUD MAKES BOW AS BOSTON DIRECTOR

Second Concert Of This Famous Organization Is Admirably Conducted By Him.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at the Lyric and was naturally an event replete with interest to music-loving Baltimore, introducing, as it did, Henri Rabaud, the newly appointed conductor of the organization.

The audience was comparatively small, considering the recognized social prestige of these concerts, but the new conductor was most enthusiastically greeted and the whole concert thoroughly appreciated, despite the fact that something of the wind had been taken out of the sails of M. Rabaud by the splendid musicianship of Pierre Montent, who conducted the first of this series of concerts last month. While it would be foolish to push the parallel too far, one feels that there exists something in the general character of the playing of the new Boston Orchestra as compared with that of the old that is in a way suggestive of the diversity of style between that of the Flonzaley and Kneisel Quartets. There is more abandon, elasticity and individuality in the new orchestra, but possibly a less conspicuous display of precision, finish and perfection in detail.

Many were appalled beforehand at the prospect of two symphonies on the program, but for Beethoven's Seventh was substituted Schubert's fortunately unfinished symphony—fortunately, we say, because it is inconceivable that the composer would have consistently maintained such an altitude as pervades the two completed movements.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN
DECEMBER 5

66

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The new Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted for the first time in Baltimore under the leadership of Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, received an unusual ovation from the large audience at the Lyric last night. Quiet dignity and perfect assurance of control over the orchestra were noticeable in Rabaud's manner. Difficult it was to realize the presence of so many instruments in the waves of sound that rose and fell as if by one accord, in perect harmony and absolutely in time.

The program was exceptional, well selected and furnished enough variety to captivate the varying tastes of even a musical public. By request, in place of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, the following numbers were substituted: La Jeunesse d'Hercule (The Youth of Hercules), by Saint-Saens, and Shubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor. The remainder of the program, Dukas' L'Apprenti Sorcier and Borodin's Symphony in B minor, were given as planned.

The Youth of Hercules was presented with exceptional merit, treated in a broad manner, yet observing all the fine details that makes the symphonic poem so beautiful and inspiring. Rabaud, who is a musician by inheritance as well as taste, without diverging too much from the spirit of the number, introduced his own interpretations with great artistry and skill. Especially heroic was the theme of Virtue, given by the unmuted strings with their strong, almost stern, call to duty. The tender notes of the above also lent a charm to the truly poetic rendition.

Dukas' L'Apprenti Sorcier (The Sorcerer's Apprentice) received special attention. Borodin's Symphony in B minor also claimed a large part in the approval of the audience, with its vivid coloring and its oriental haunting melody.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD
DECEMBER 3,

DEBUT OF RABAUD

French Conductor Directs Boston Symphony Concert Here.

As a pianist is judged by Chopin playing, an orchestral conductor rises or falls by his ability as a Beethoven interpreter. In selecting the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven for his first Philadelphia concert Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at once presented himself as a musician of exceptional power.

Rabaud comes to the Orchestra with the prestige of a distinguished foreign career. He has been identified with both the opera and concert life of Paris, but is first of all a composer of great individuality and charm. His symphonies have been presented here with success, while his Oriental opera, "Marouf," has won wide recognition.

There is little in the appearance of Rabaud to suggest the musician. Tall, thin and ascetic-looking, he might easily be selected as a scientist or doctor of philosophy or letters. His resemblance to Charles Evans Hughes, sometime candidate for the Presidency of the United States, is striking. Rabaud has the glowing temperament of a genuine musician, however, and he did not fail to win his audience last night. His Beethoven playing was of great interest. The hackneyed Seventh Symphony was transformed into something fresh and vital and endowed with a charm that arrested at every turn. The first movement was taken with a more deliberate tempo than we are accustomed to, but the finesse of the orchestral manipulation amply justified the departure. Every voice of the orchestra was heard and the ensemble was perfection itself. Rabaud draws a noble tone, not merely big, but strikingly vital and inspiring.

The allegretto, which we are inured to hearing at funeral pace, was done with a slightly accelerated motion and gained immensely in chorus. The third movement was a veritable ripple of light, sensuous tone. There were marked variations of tempi. Rabund does not hesitate to introduce strong contrasts, both in tone and tempo, but his effects are always surprisingly novel and decidedly unusual. In the finale he worked up a magnificent climax and the conclusion of the symphony found him established with a Philadelphia audience, at least, as a conductor of pronounced ability and one for whom it is safe to predict future popularity.

Unlike his motionless predecessor, Rabund, as a very energetic leader. His motions, however, are so apparently the result of genuine musical inspiration and are so lacking in pose that they are never obtrusive, but soon become part of the man's personal expression.

Last night's audience was small for a Boston Orchestra concert. Probably the two symphonies proved alarming to some unaccustomed to that foreign habit. The Brodin B minor was another form of triumph for Rabaud, the eastern style seeming as much his medium as the Beethoven. Doubtless he is a man of universal musical tastes and power to present any type of music well.

The "L'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, played between the symphonies, aroused great enthusiasm.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS, DECEMBER 3,

HENRI RABAUD WINS WITH REMADE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Conducts Beethoven's Seventh Symphony with Masterly Understanding and Sympathetic Feeling—Dukas and Borodine Form Fitting Framework for Great Master's Work.

BY ODELL HAUSER.

Philadelphia is going to like Henri Rabaud. The French composer and conductor made his debut here last night in the second concert of the Boston Symphony series and displayed qualities of leadership and personality that make him a welcome addition to the circle of conductors of the season's round.

Further acquaintance will no doubt cause modifications of the first impressions and reveal new attributes in this or that direction; but last night's work justified certain fairly definite opinions as to his make-up and methods. The Beethoven number revealed him as an accomplished stylist, the Dukas' scherzo as a true exponent of Gallic grace and deftness, and the Borodine symphony as a man of force and driving power.

The opening movement of the Beethoven symphony was played at slower tempo and with less vehemence than customary. But it became evident this was a definite part of the architecture of his reading of the first movement and was done by way of heightening the contrast with the lighter movement which followed. He more or less justified it.

Throughout the Beethoven, he exhibited the Frenchman's deference to just expression of formal design. It was a strictly classic conception in its attention to style and uniformity. But there was vitality aplenty about it. I the last movement he whipped up his orchestra to more valiant battling with swift tempos than most other conductors are accustomed to urge. Those of us who believe that Isadora Duncan should suffer for some terpsichorean misdeeds she has committed along with her great good, could have wished no justice more poetic than that when she danced to this symphony some one with Rabaud's ideas

PROGRAM.

Symphony in A, No. 7.....Beethoven
"L'Apprenti Sorcier" .....Dukas
Symphony in B Minor.....Borodine
Henri Rabaud .....Conductor of the last movement, should he have been the conductor.

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice" was played with all the dash, all the attention to its sinister coloring, and all the rhythmic insistence which this diabolic tarantelle demands. During this number the orchestra began to remind one of the technical brilliance for which its name stands. It had not always done so in the symphony, especially among the wind instruments in the last movement. The orchestral scheme of Beethoven, which nowadays begins to sound a little thin, is a real test of the fundamental powers of a body of players.

The playing of Borodine's Symphony made you wonder why it is not heard more often. In it, the composer is a real Russian, more so than in the often insipid strains of his only opera known here, "Prince Igor." It is strong, with all the strength of Russian music. Its first movement is highly organic, having, in fact, almost the effect of statement and development of only one theme. It sings and sparkles and pulsates through its other movements. An enjoyable and significant work. Mr. Rabaud's reading was all that could have been desired, and in its assimilation of the Russian idiom, showed the variety of his sympathies, for he had played Beethoven as a German might have, and his Dukas was, of course, authentic French.

All in all, an accomplished musician, an authoritative leader and a modest and sincere exponent of the music he interprets, is the new conductor. Over it all, there is a kind of geniality and mellowness that is grateful. His next appearance will be awaited with keen interest.

LEDGER—PHILADELPHIA DECEMBER 3,

HENRI RABAUD LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

New Director Cordially Received at Second Concert in the Academy

PROGRAM

Beethoven.....The Seventh Symphony
Dukas.....Scherzo, "Sorcerer's Apprentice"
Borordin.....Symphony in B minor, No. 2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in its second concert of the season at the Academy last evening. Interest centered largely in the debut of the new permanent director, Henri Rabaud. At the beginning of 1914 Mr. Rabaud was made first conductor of the Paris Opera, and his other distinctions as conductor and composer are many.

Mr. Rabaud takes his art, his audience and himself in the last place seriously and makes his distinctive personality felt at once. His hearers—who were not so numerous as the interest of the occasion warranted—gave a cordial welcome when he first entered to a figure obviously intellectual, aristocratic, distinguished. He is tall, bearded and dignified of aspect, with the demeanor of the contemplative scholar.

The reading of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony was preëminently French. He brought out the more delicate nuances with a scrupulous, painstaking precision. He did not seek to release the full resources of sound latent in his instruments. He dealt in none of those noisy climaxes which are dear to the heart of some leaders. His beat is definite though graceful, his vigilance unceasing. Though evidently a disciplinarian firm of hand, he is not a frigid martinet. At the close of the symphony there was long-continued applause of unmistakable spontaneity. It brought the conductor back from the wings several times, until the men stood with him, and even after that it was not quick to die away.

The familiar "Sorcerer's Apprentice" scherzo, with its humorous relief in which the bassoon is chief comedian, had been skillfully interposed between the two symphonies of which the program was unusually constructed. But for this well-placed humor the concert would have been of a character distinctly somber, for Borodin's muse, speaking in minor accents in his second symphony, does not attempt a suave, mellifluous, ear-tickling strain.

Instead, the first movement deals huge, bold strokes like hammer-blows upon a forge. The material is heroic and epic. Mr. Rabaud gave himself with sympathy to these grandiose moods. In the second movement ("molto vivo") the curious pattering mono- one of the stopped horns in the background was deftly introduced. Again in the Andante there was a lyric voice of great beauty from the horns. The first and the third movements seemed to please the audience better than the second and the fourth. The national feeling, as in the case of Borodin's "Prince Igor," is strong throughout work.

F. L. W.

GLOBE DECEMBER 14.

ANOTHER BRILLIANT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr Bonnet Plays Superbly in Guilmant Symphony

In "The Mystic Trumpeter" of Mr Frederick S. Converse of this city, Mr Rabaud conducted a score yesterday afternoon with which he probably was less familiar, if at all, than other modern works on his programs thus far, such as Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

There was the greater admiration for his brilliant performance, admiration, for it was euphonious, plastic, emotional and at momenis highly dramatic orchestral playing irrespective of a program. It was also a performance throwing into new relief admirable qualities in workmanship and expression in Mr Converse's treatment of Walt Whitman's poem, which for his purpose he divided into five parts, "elemental phases—mystery and peace, love, war or struggle, humiliation and finally joy."

The inspiriting vision — the human, wholesome, heartening optimism of the poet—is reflected in many of these pages, and Mr Rabaud, consciously or unconsciously, was partner to it. There was idealism in the love music, a noble sympathy in the slow movement which did not become lachrymose, and in the last pages an exultation—yesterday even a fine frenzy—which did not become bombast. A score with qualities which may be called characteristically "American," one curiously appropriate in thought and illuminating in expression for this time. The composer twice acknowledged the enthusiastic reception by the audience. No remembered performance of it was to be compared to this.

Joseph Bonnet, the distinguished French organist, appeared as soloist for the first time at these concerts, playing Guilmant's first symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra. By his appearances here in recital on this same organ, the beauty of which is too rarely heard, and on the fine instrument at the New Old South Church, Mr Bonnet revealed the true distinction of his art. Yesterday he again played as a master in his consummate skill with pedals and manuals, in his judicious and illuminating registration, in the breath and repose of his style, his vertuosity in bravura, his taste and characteristic sense of proportion, and no less than these, in the invention and admirable development found in his own cadenza and the brilliance with which he played it.

Many gladly would have heard Mr Bonnet, whose repertory is extensive, add solo numbers more representative of his modern school. Mr Rabaud aided in a splendid performance.

An excellent performance of Beethoven's "little" symphony, the 8th, began the concert.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER, DECEMBER 3,

HENRI RABAUD'S DEBUT WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Proves Conductor of Exceptional Merit in Season's Second Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the present season at the Academy of Music last evening when Mr. Henri Rabaud made his local debut as its conductor, and a programme was presented which comprised Beethoven's Seventh symphony in A major, the second symphony of Borodin in B minor, and the sparkling scherzo by Dukas entitled, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." It cannot be said that this arrangement is one that augers well for Mr. Rabaud's abilities as a programme maker. He was presumably not responsible for the circumstance that the Beethoven number was played here by the Symphony Society of New York no longer ago than last week. That was presumably one of those curious coincidences which occur from time to time with such mysterious frequency and which one wishes that there were some way of avoiding. But although there is good authority for placing two symphonies on a single programme to do so is not judicious and a selection of another character would have been preferable.

Mr. Rabaud's coming to this city with the Boston organization as a successor to the unlamented Muck had been awaited with a good deal of interest, and it is not supposable that any of the expectations with which it had been regarded were disappointed in the result. There is nothing sensational about Mr. Rabaud's methods. He is a gentleman of a retiring disposition who took his place on the conductor's stand with a self effacing modesty, and whose reading of the Beethoven score was not remarkable for any disturbing originality of view or precedent breaking innovations. Its distinctive features were rather grace and charm and a beautiful refinement than breadth or vigor, and it was more in the lovely allegretto, which was played with an extraordinary refinement of tone and eloquence of sentiment, than in the movements requiring more fire and force and fervor, that it was most artistically effective and satisfying. Yet in its entirety the performance was lucid d vital and intelligently sympathetic. d the enjoyment which it afforded s great.

It is as yet too early to form a definite judgment, for a single hearing does not furnish a sufficiently broad criterion to justify an unreserved opinion, but so far as could be determined from last evening's demonstration, Mr. Rabaud is a conductor of exceptional merit and ability. That he has a strong feeling for rhythm was shown by the flexible and sinuous motion which he imparted to the dancing measures of the Beethoven music, while his keen sense of proportion appeared in an analysis and accentuation of the score before him which invested each detail with its due importance and constantly preserved the perspective of the whole. His gradations of light and shade were also very skillfully and artistically managed and altogether the impression which he produced was distinctly favorable. He was most cordially received and the audience went out of its way to express its appreciation of his work. When he shall have as good material to handle as had his predecessor and when he shall have trained his forces to the same degree of efficiency and homogeneity he may be expected to do better still.

Although of less interest and smaller consequence than the other, the Borodin symphony is yet a work which contains so much of melodic beauty and harmonic impressiveness as to be very well worth hearing, and it is not imaginable that any of its value or significance was lost in Mr. Rabaud's careful and appreciative interpretation of it. Midway on the programme came the Dukas Scherzo which afforded the orchestra an opportunity for the exhibition of its technique, of which it made the most, and its delivery of this sparkling and fascinating music was not the least notable feature of the evening's entertainment. The next of these concerts will occur on Monday evening, January 6.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 20,

Mr. Rabaud as Composer—Mr. Hofmann Again in a Concert of His Own—Wagner Heard Without Protest in New York—Audiences and Anthems

AT the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Rabaud at last relaxing a too rigid modesty, will present himself to well disposed audiences as composer no less than as conductor, leading in his own tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne." The German poem of Lenau, picturing a phantasmal midnight rout, suggested the piece, which Mr. Rabaud has written rather in the Wagnerian manner, being then in his young days as composer.

Apropos Wagner and the present tacit exclusion of his music from opera houses and many concert-halls in America, Mr. Stransky and the Philharmonic Society had the good sense and the good courage, in New York last Saturday, to play the ballet-music from "Tannhaüser." Not a protesting voice arose in Carnegie Hall or has since risen outside it. Instead audience aid reviewers alike applauded "the return to Wagner" to the top of their bent. It is openly said, moreover, that next autumn the Metropolitan Opera House will resume a part of its Wagnerian repertory, using [illegible] English text instead of

NORTH AMERICAN, PHILADELPHIA DECEMBER 3,

RABAUD MAKES DEBUT WITH BOSTON PLAYERS

New Conductor Charms by His Spirited Reading and Utter Lack of Pose

Henri Rabaud made his Philadelphia debut as the new permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night. It was a debut calculated to demonstrate at the very outset his temperament and versatility on the conductor's stand, for his program combined early German romanticism, modern French and colorful Russian in generous proportions of each, beginning with the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, continuing with the "Sorceror's Apprentice" of Dukas, and ending with Borodin's Second Symphony in B minor.

Preliminary interest naturally centered in the personality of Mr. Rabaud. The audience found him to be a bearded Frenchman of unusual height and slenderness, rather elderly in appearance, and when he first stepped out on the stage, as shy, apparently, as a diffident school girl. Indeed, his excessively quiet demeanor seemed to foreshadow rigid pedantry of conducting, but this early impression proved false as soon as he got well into the Beethoven symphony. There is an utter lack of ostentation about his manner that is extremely winning, and his reading is at all times spirited and frequently quite dramatic.

The conductor possesses the faculty of imparting his magnetic, earnest personality to his men in a large degree. The orchestra has improved generally since it was heard here a month ago. There is greater unity of attack in the strings, even tho they have by no means recaptured the lyrical and opulent singing quality of other days. Weakest of all is the wood wind choir, but the brasses are deserving of very high praise, indeed. Perfect wind control results in them in a mellow richness of tone, combined with the most delicate flexibility.

Mr. Rabaud's reading of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony was more romantic than any other interpretation we have heard for many months. He achieved admirable rhythm in the allegretto, while the snap and fire of the finale were most infectious.

The "Sorceror's Apprentice" has been played so frequently that it is no longer regarded as a "freak" composition. Its robust humor was exemplified quite fully last night.

The Second Symphony of Borodin is thoroly oriental in thematic material and treatment, glowing with the richest, most voluptuous orchestral coloring, and keenly alive with rhythmic life. It abounds in strong contrasts and is opulent with the bold effects characteristic of "Prince Igor."

The audience might have been larger, but some late arrivals and others seemed determined to make up in noise of conversation and shuffling what the house lacked in size.

Henri Rabaud the following evening made his début with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audience was delighted with him, and gave him one of the warmest welcomes of which a Philadelphia audience is capable. It was a real and a calorific enthusiasm. When Carl Pohlig led the Philadelphia Orchestra he once said to me, "Will you ask them, please, to put a note in the program saying, 'Will the ladies please take off their gloves so they can clap?'" The applause for Rabaud sounded like the gloveless variety. He deserved it all and he deserved also that deeper, truer verdict that is perpended in the profoundest silences of the still places of the mind. For he is patently a true leader not alone of musicians, but of men. Wholly the gentleman and scholar, with an air of philosophic reserve and detachment persuasively pausing this side of frigidity, he gave us a reading of the seventh Beethoven symphony that was thoroughly French according to the world's new understanding of the French character. It was a delicate, perceptive revelation—yet it never frivoled or gamboled with its momentous subject matter. It was followed by the comedy relief of Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice"; then came, originally enough, a second symphony in the B minor, No. 2, of Borodin. The hand of "Prince Igor" is on the Cossack anvil here till it sounds at times like Vulcan's smithy: but Rabaud and his symphonists did not go the extreme of the clangors possible; they were vital and vocal enough, but they were not stentorian. The first and the third movements seemed more to the liking of the hearers than the second and the fourth. The symphony is not one of those works that aim at a symmetrical architecture and a soothing smoothness of content: Borodin is a bard who neglects the form at moments for the mighty sense.

HERALD DECEMBER 14.

SIXTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Opens with Beethoven Work—Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter" Given

ORGANIST BONNET'S FIRST APPEARANCE

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony, No. 8; Converse, "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasy (after the poem of Walt Whitman); Guilmant, Symphony, No. 1, for organ and orchestra. Joseph Bonnet, organist, played for the first time at these concerts.

By this time no one in Boston believes that only a German can interpret the music of Beethoven. Messrs. Rabaud Monteux and Messager have proved that the old idea, long entertained by some in this city, was absurdly false. Beethoven did not write his music for a parish or a country; he wrote it for the world. Nowhere has Beethoven's purely orchestral music been performed with greater reverence and with more brilliant and emotional results than in the city of Paris. Nowhere has it been more appreciated and with finer discrimination than in Paris. The performances by the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire under Habeneck moved Richard Wagner to enthusiasm. Habeneck's successors maintained the reputation of the preceding performances. At the Chatelet and at the Lamoureux concerts the symphonies of Beethoven have been often and superbly performed, nor has the public appreciation of these works, awakened by Habeneck, waned with the years.

Too often in Boston a symphony by Beethoven has been treated by conductor, orchestra and audience as an old and highly respectable relative whose annual visits were to be treated with perfunctory courtesy. Four or five symphonies were expected in the season; the sooner they were over, the better. Tribute to a great man had been paid.

Yesterday Beethoven's Eighth, which has not been the most "popular" of the last seven, assumed an importance that made some wonder why its peculiar eminence had not been sooner recognized. Mr. Rabaud did not bring about this result by any extravagance in tempo, in phrasing, or by the discovery of "inner and concealed" melodic phrases. He brought it about by legitimate and musical means. His choice of tempi was happy; the cantille phrases were sung expressively, but without too great freedom; there was elasticity, not licentiousness. How effectively he prepared the climaxes, with inevitable quickening of the pace that carried with it the expectation of the hearer! The climax, then, was as convincing as any natural phenomenon. There was no attempt to give passing measures, more or less conventional grave significance. There was clear and logical thought; there was truly musical rhetoric. In this symphony there are pages that reveal as in no other one of the Nine, characteristics of Beethoven: whimsicality, even freakishness; humor that is akin to practical joking, a certain coarseness that is to be found in the work of nearly every genius, the coarseness, not vulgarity, not commonness, of a virile, mighty nature. These characteristics are plainly shown in the last movement; and in this movement, near the end, is an unexpected, almost irrelevant episode, that sets the hearer a-dreaming, measures that only Beethoven could have written; an irresistible effect gained by a surprising economy of means.

Mr. Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," first performed in Philadelphia nearly 13 years ago, was suggested, as is well known, by a poem of Walt Whitman. The fantasia follows with one exception the sections of the poem: the visions of a rapt bard excited by the notes of a wild trumpeter, "some strange musician, hovering unseen in air"; of "the cool, refreshing night, the walks of Paradise"; of love, with Whitman's apostrophe that might be compared with the opening of Swinburne's Prelude to his "Tristram and Iseult"; of shipwreck, murder, war; of all humiliated, offended, dejected; of mankind at last a reborn race, joyous, exultant. This poem, surely, enwrapped the composer, for without being literal in translation, without the attempt at realism that is too often impotent, he has rhapsodically turned the poet's free verse into glowing, and dramatic, musical expression.

It has been said that the foreign conductors of this orchestra have not rehearse faithfully the pieces of American composers. The statement, unjust and peevish, came as a rule from composers whose music made no marked impression on the audience. We do not believe that any conductor deliberately slighted in rehearsal any American composer. Whether his interpretation was intelligent is another matter. That depended on the nature and ability of the conductor. Mr. Rabaud, who has shown since his arrival, genuine interest in orchestral works of Americans, gave a most eloquent reading of Mr. Converse's Fantasia. The music itself and the performance of the orchestra awakened the enthusiasm of the audience. The applause, which Mr. Converse acknowledged modestly, was much more than a genial compliment to him; it was the public expression of delight at hearing an engrossing and imaginative work by an American sympathetically interpreted by a Frenchman.

Mr. Bonnet is not a stranger in Boston. A virtuoso of the first rank and an accomplished musician, he has awakened interest in the organ and in its ancient and modern literature. He chose yesterday the symphony of Guilmant, familiar to all organists in the form of a solo sonata. The Pastorale is charming in every way. The other movements are effective for concert use, although the thematic material in itself and in its development is not of conspicuous quality. Guilmant afterwards wrote compositions that redound more to his credit than the first and third movements of this symphony. Mr. Bonnet, who introduced a cadenza of his own, played in a masterly manner.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: D'Indy, "Wallenstein," trilogy after Schiller's poem; Chopin, concerto in E minor (Josef Hofmann, pianist); Berlioz, overture to "King Lear."

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 13.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

AS ANOTHER CONCERT DISCLOSES MR. RABAUD

His Conducting at Cambridge with Franck's Symphony and a Concerto by Liszt—More Choral Plans—Beethoven's Mass to Be Sung—Puccini's Impending Operas — Mme. Galli-Curci in a New Part—Miss Farrar's Fortunes—Items and Incidents

THOSE that said in their haste, in corridors of Symphony Hall, that that the days of Mr. Rabaud with the orchestra recalled the days of Mr. Fiedler or Mr. Paur spoke out of exceedingly blurred memories and as dull an impression of the present conductor's abilities. Mr. Rabaud lays no such heavy hand upon music and performance as did Mr. Fiedler, has no such thick mind or common imagination. Mr. Fiedler was aften impervious to fine taste; Mr. Rabaud cultivates it. The Parisian may not run to the lengths of communicating ardor that sometimes swept Mr. Paur and the audience with him through music that enkindling him enkindled likewise his forces and his hearers; but he possesses a sense of characterizing style, a finesse with piece and performance that were strange to Mr. Paur's coarser and lesser tutored mettle. Rather, the nearest analogue, among his predecessors, to Mr. Rabaud was Mr. Gericke.

By instinct, habit, faith, the French conductor is clear-minded, precise. So far as he may go, he apprehends exactly the form, contents, individual and stylistic quality of a piece in hand, would enjoin it as clearly and completely upon his orchestra, would disclose it in like degree to his hearers. In pace, rhythm, phrasing, modulation, in the whole range of shading, color, climax, Mr. Rabaud is never obscure, uncertain. He perceives clearly, he accomplishes exactly; his very beat speaks these traits to orchestra and audience. Mr Gericke had them, carried them, like Mr. Rabaud into the details of concert-giving—the beginning and the ending at the appointed hour, the arrangement of the programme. Again like his Viennese predecessor, Mr. Rabaud seeks refinement of performance, gives off in the concert-hall and elsewhere more light than heat. Pursuing this end, he hears his orchestra sensitively, would school it in the graces, the distinctions of performance. Yet more than once, in his concerts in Boston and Cambridge in the last month, Mr. Rabaud has summoned a larger eloquence, a more vivid transmitting power than Mr Gericke could muster except upon rare occasion in his final years in Boston. To the end, he remained primarily an objective conductor with both music and orchestra. Mr. Rabaud is like-minded, like-tempered, but his objectivity penetrates deeper, runs warmer.

These qualities in Mr. Rabaud stood clear in the second of his concerts in Cambridge last evening, when the quick applause of an intent audience must have stimulated him at every turn. He and the orchestra repeated Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" from their concerts in Boston a few weeks ago, and the performance gained not a little in sensuous mantle of tone, in the euphonies of instrumental voice with voice, especially among the wood-winds and the horns, in the supple shaping of phrase, in pliancy of transition. It remained an objective performance; it missed in the slow movement a little of the sentiment that there, as in many another's music is ingrained in Schubert; but throughout the symphony the mood was warmer, the songful quality better released than it had been in Symphony Hall. Mr. Rabaud characterized the music as well as pictured it; the fine detail was better caught into the moving web.

In turn, in Franck's symphony, at the other end of the programme, in the climacteric return and proclamation of the dominant motives, that hitherto he has set free only in Saint-Saëns's much tamer symphony. The music glowed under his hand, swept orchestra and audience into itself, gained power, the ampler, the finer, because it was nowhere blatant. In the lighter measures of the pseudo-scherzo, Mr. Rabaud was at once adroit and spontaneous. The music flowed yet in delicate variation of course and beat upon the ear. Nor did the conductor weigh too heavily with melancholy the measures in which the English horn leads. Franck cultivated no Faust-like brooding. His voice in this Allegetto is no more than tender longing, suffusing the musing with sensuous beapty, pause yet progress in the advance out of darkness into the splendors of the radiant end. It is easy to read too much into the music of Franck, intrinsically a simple music, to make him and it sound obstruse. Mr. Rabaud avoids this pitfall. His ascent with the music is ascent into the faith, the joy that it bears. Here was new quality in the conductor and yet again in Lisct's concerto in E-flat in which Miss Renard played the piano part. For half the way, it seemed no more than intelligent, faithful, clear-cut performance; then of a sudden with the transition into the long finale, pianist and conductor began to strike a fire that was not merely of the composer's measures. Before they had gone far with it, and onward to the end, it appeared that Mr. Rabaud and incidentally Miss Renard can touch the conventional, yet still stirring brillance of the concert-room.

Chorus for this concert, but he will later prepare it for performances of Saint-Saëns's piece, "The Lyre and the Harp," and of Beethoven's mighty mass, the "Missa Solemnis," unheard in Boston since the distant days in which The Cecilia attempted it. For it the chorus will number three or four hundred voices, and it will be sung toward the end of the season at a choral concert, outside the regular Symphony series. "The Lyre and the Harp" is a much simpler thing, a dialogue in tones, in which chorus, orchestra and solo voices share.

For once in a way Mr. Elman, the violinist, will not play in Boston, as in recent years, at one of the Sunday Concerts. Instead he announces a concert of his own, and in the evening, for Friday, Jan. 3, in Symphony Hall.

Here in Boston

When the Symphony Orchestra was reorganized last summer, one of the men dismissed was Karl Stumpf, for some years the player upon the bass-clarinet. Even in days of war, there was no offence in him except that he happened to be a German subject and public opinion demanded the exclusion of such from the band. Stumpf had the temperament that took such dismissal hard, that saw the future stretching dark and blank before him. The work for which he had come to America, in which he had gained professional reputation, in which he might have risen still higher, had been taken from him, in Boston and elsewhere, without possibility of present recovery. He fell into an acute melancholia, so distressing to his family and friends that they finally sent him to a sanitarium. From it he returned not long ago to the household of kinsfolk in New York. There, yesterday, he took his own life. On both sides, these minor tragedies might fill a new and piteous casualty list.

The choral concerts by the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus on Dec. 30 and 31, briefly announced in this place a week ago, have suddenly swelled into a "celebration of the close of the year of victory." Accordingly, they are to begin with the national anthems of the United States, Belgium, Britain, Italy and France, and proceed with orchestral or choral pieces, or both, by composers from these countries—Verdi's seldom heard Te Deum for double chorus and orchestra; Franck's setting of the one hundred and fiftieth Psalm ("Praise ye, the Lord. Praise God in his sanctuary; praise him in the firmament of his power"); Mr. Chadwick's hymn, "Land of Our Hearts," first heard at the Norfolk Festival last summer; Bizet's familiar overture, "Patrie," and an old English suite by composers of the sixteenth century, arranged by Mr. Rabaud for Monsieur Gemier's revival of "The Merchant of Venice," two seasons ago, at the Théatre Antoine in Paris. For subscribers to the Symphony Concerts, these concerts will replace the pair of the afternoon of Oct. 11 and the evening of Oct. 12, omitted when the epidemic of influenza closed theatres and halls. For the general public seats not so taken are available.

Not only is Mr. Stephen Townsend reassembling and training the Symphony

MONITOR DECEMBER 14.

Boston Music Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, sixth concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, Boston, afternoon of Dec. 13, 1918, Joseph Bonnet, soloist. The program: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major, Op. 93; Converse, "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasy, Op. 19 (after the poem of Walt Whitman); Guilmant, Symphony No. 1, D minor, for organ and orchestra, Op. 42.

BOSTON, Massachusetts—It is perhaps an illuminating commentary on the present stage of our musical development that a piece composed 14 years ago should not yet sound old-fashioned. Mr. F. S. Converse's cleverly wrought fantasy called "The Mystic Trumpeter," after the poem by Walt Whitman, played on the sixth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sounded as fresh, alluring, and, to some probably, as cacophonous as it did when it had its first public hearing, in Philadelphia, on March 3, 1905. Such faith have we, however, in the value of the music of the present day that we should like to hazard a guess that the number who found it discordant on Dec. 13, 1918, was far less than on Jan. 26, 1907, when it had its first Boston hearing. We have been freed from many supposedly inflexible conditions attending the writing of music since the beginning of this century, which is only another way of saying that we have allowed vast new fields of color to be opened up for us to enjoy. There is far more turbulence in the note of joy with which Mr. Converse's piece ends than in the more placid gladness at the ending of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, but who shall say that the joyousness of Mr. Converse's joy is any degree less than Beethoven's?

Joseph Bonnet took the solo part in the Guilmant Symphony for organ and orchestra, playing a cadenza of his own. This is noble music, and Mr. Bonnet's playing of this great work by his teacher added brilliance to a scintillant score. The smoothness and perfect rhythm of the organist's pedaling called forth a gasp of astonished admiration from the organists in the audience.

The Eighth Beethoven Symphony received what seemed to be a somewhat perfunctory reading, in which the desired clarity and crispness was lacking.

POST, DECEMBER 14.

BONNET SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Organ Virtuoso Plays Guilmant's First Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Joseph Bonnet, organist and composer, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr Bonnet played the symphony for organ and orchestra, No. 1, op. 42, of his master, Alexandre Guilmant.

The other compositions performed were F. S. Converse's tone-poem after Walt Whitman, "The Mystic Trumpeter," and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

BONNET THE PAST MASTER

It is rarely indeed that an organist not a regular member of an orchestra but a traveling virtuoso and composer is invited to officiate at a symphony concert. The organ is seldom thought of as a solo instrument. Perhaps the unusual sight of the organist laboring manfully at his instrument, hands head and feet moving with vigor if not precision, is prejudicial to his chance with the managers. Where should the organist be seated? Yesterday Mr. Bonnet set in full view of the audience and for those who are appreciative organ technic his mastery of pedals as well as manuals was evident to the eye as to the ear.

Mr. Bonnet is indeed a past master of his instrument and in every respect a great musician. It would be superfluous to refer to the extraordinary finish and brilliancy of his technic, his infallibly precise attack and release, the cleanness of his rapid passages and the perfect legato which he maintains when he desires it in passages of the most complicated voice-leading. This is the machinery of his art, long since perfected. It served to conceal the difficulty of his enormous physical accomplishment and to make certain the force and breadth of his style, the authority with which he now supported and now led on the orchestra; his skill in color obtained through the most artistic registration; and the astonishing vitality and precision of his rhythm. The concerto itself is conspicuous for its solid workmanship, the mastery of form and the very effective and harmonious instrumentation. But with a less effective opportunity to display his mastery, Mr. Bonnet would have made lasting impression on his audience.

Converse's Tone Poem

Mr. Converse's tone-poem wears well with the years. It was composed in 1904 and was first heard in Boston in 1907. The mood is lofty, the preluding and the opening solo of the mystic trumpeter establish a noble and poetic mood. The principal phases of Whitman's verses are freely followed. The harmonic scheme of the love-music is well conceived as a contrast to that of the opening. The music of war is stirring, nor is the quotation of a few measures from "Marching Through Georgia" incongruous. The conclusion is highly effective, and a worthy capstone of the work which we personally consider Mr. Converse's finest accomplishment for orchestra. This work should be heard much oftener. The performance of Mr. Rabaud was a very brilliant one, and the composer bowed his acknowledgements from an obscure corner of the hall.

Rabaud the Classicist

Mr. Rabaud strengthens one's impressions of his exceptional gift as a classicist. His readings of symphonic music of the classic school revitalize these works, not in an impudent or unduly modernist spirit, but in a manner which impresses anew on the hearer the vigor and human meaning of the music, and the incalculable significance of great musical form.

As for the symphony—is it not one of the most unique accomplishments of genius? The traditions of the symphony and the orchestra were maintained in this performance, one of uncommon eloquence.

At its third concert in Cambridge on the evening of Thursday, Dec. 12, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Rabaud, played the César Franck D Minor Symphony in a manner that stirred the house into spontaneous and prolonged applause. Miss Rosita Renard was the soloist, playing the Liszt E flat major concerto. A third number on the program was Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony.

POST DECEMBER 17.

SYMPHONY AT HARVARD

Rosita Renard Soloist in Liszt's Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

Distinctive features of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, were Mr. Rabaud's interpretation of Cesar Franck's symphony and Rosita Renard's performance of Liszt's E flat concerto. There were two symphonies—the one by Schubert in B minor ("Unfinished") and the symphony of Franck's, which brought a profoundly impressive conclusion of the programme.

Miss Renard is more familiar as a recitalist than as a performer with orchestra. She chose for her Cambridge appearance the concerto which, played with the electrical spirit and the swashbuckling bravado that the music demands, still makes its mark and still taxes to the utmost the technical apparatus of the performer. In the final pages, Miss Renard's performance was exciting indeed. What she did with the rest of the composition was to emphasize, for an exception, the finer qualities of the music, and refine, to a considerable extent, those which are purely "virtuotistic." Fleetness, good taste, and an absence of the sentimentality which often is given the middle section, were commendable characteristics of her interpretation. She was enthusiastically received.

Mr. Rabaud's reading of the Franck symphony should be heard at the Boston concerts of this orchestra. It was conspicuous for its grand outlines, the continuity of the musical thought, and the noble passion which informed, particularly, the finale. It was another symphony than the one we have known of late seasons—more plastic and lofty in conception than Dr. Muck's performance, simpler in outline and less meticulous in detail than that of Mr. Monteux, but above all—Franck's symphony, a master-work for all time.

TRIBUNE PROVIDENCE, DECEMBER 8,

COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Harold Bauer, courteous to the French element in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play with this in Providence on Dec. 17, the Concerto in C-minor by Saint-Saens, a close friend of Henri Rabaud, the conductor.

HAROLD BAUER.
Celebrated Pianist Who is to be Soloist at the Next Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday Evening, Dec. 17.

recently enticed from Paris. Mr. Bauer has a proverbial light-fingered way with this sparkling piece. For the rest, two symphonies upon a program sound forbidding in the announcement, but they are both light and brief—Beethoven's "Eighth," with the scherzo which parodies the metronome, and Schubert's melodious and evergreen, "Unfinished."

Harold Bauer's indefatigable touring has led him to strange parts. He are some of his experiences: Challenged to a duel in Barcelona by a Spaniard, who talked during the concert and was reproved. Arrested near Moscow for playing a Hungarian dance instead of dancing it. The police were there to see that the program was carried out, and they naturally thought that a number announced as a dance should be danced. Attacked by mosquitoes in Argentina and had to give up playing. Conducted through an underground passage in Spain to escape from the mob, who had been too excited by his playing. Severely bruised while being shouldered by a crowd of American enthusiasts. Played Beethoven to a thousand Red Indians in Arizona.

EVENING TELEGRAM
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 8

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discriminating Philadelphia

PHILADELPHIA music-lovers have had an unusual opportunity thus early in the season of hearing and comparing three of the leading French conductors in purely orchestral concerts. These are Andre Messager, conductor of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra; Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony, the two latter conducting this orchestra at successive concerts.

M. Messager was [illegible] somewhat of a disadvantage in holding the concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, an auditorium entirely too large for an orchestral concert. Many of the more delicate effects are lost in the vast reaches of this hall and (to Americans at least) the very unusual way of seating the orchestra doubtless caused a different tonal effect than if the men had been seated in the manner usually adopted by American orchestras.

M. Monteux also labored under difficulties in having to take a strange orchestra fresh from the summer vacation and work them into shape to give a symphony concert in a period of about four weeks. M. Rabaud, on the other hand, had the advantage of M. Monteux's work with the men and of the very much greater psychological fact that he was to be the permanent leader.

WITH this in mind, the purpose here is not to compare the artistic results of the concerts per se, but to note the different styles of conducting and the principal results which each of these fine musicians sought to obtain.

The concert of the Conservatoire Orchestra came first. In it M. Messager clearly showed that his chief effort was toward refinement, both of interpretation and of tone. He had a splendid orchestra, which was at all times under the perfect control of his baton and responsive to every signal he gave. In his readings, however, delicacy seemed to be a paramount consideration and there were those who thought that his interpretation lacked something of the ruggedness to which we are accustomed in the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. As might be expected, he was at his best in Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," where the characteristics of composer and conductor seemed to be more in harmony than in any other number on this program.

MONTEUX revealed far less of this natural French inclination toward super-refinement. He is very exacting as to detail, both of orchestration and of composition but especially the latter. This was shown in the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck, and particularly in the last movement. In this movement appears virtually all the thematic material of the previous movements, which are frequently combined in the most complex counterpoint, in addition to the new thematic material of the finale itself.

All these details were brought out in the clearest maner, the quantity of tone in each instrument taking the various melodies being graduated in such a way as to be perfectly audible and yet without overpowering a perhaps weaker instrument having another melody equally important. This result must have represented an enormous amount of rehearsal and may have been achieved at the expense of tone quality which, on this occasion, was by no means up to the Boston former standard. He also had a keen eye for dramatic points as is natural in an operatic conductor.

RABAUD came between his two compatriots. He did not show the delicacy either of reading or of tone of M. Messager, nor was the complexity of symphonic design brought out in the manner that M. Monteaux showed, though it must be admitted that neither the Beethoven Seventh nor the Borodin Second Symphony are constructed in anything such intricate way as is the Cesar Franck work.

On the other hand, he showed far more vigor than M. Messager and a far better tone quality than M. Monteux. The Beethoven Symphony was given with all the strength that could be desired, especially in the Scherzo and the Finale, and yet the tone was even and of fine quality throughout. Strangely enough for a French conductor, he was at his worst in the Allegretto, the movement requiring the most finesse.

While he was careful of the details, especially those of orchestration, he seemed to be most intent upon a consistent interpretation of the symphonies as a whole and strove to this end, to the exclusion of all minutiae. The work of the three great French conductors has excited considerable comment among Philadelphia musicians, the opportunity to judge them being unique.

ARE violinists nowadays less proficient than they were 100 years ago? It is a well-known fact that Clement, for whom the violin concerto of Beethoven was composed, played the [illegible] at sight on the night it was first produced, Beethoven not having completed the last movement in time for the [illegible] to get even a look at it before the beginning of the performance. Have any violinists now who would care to attempt any modern concerto (as the Beethoven was at that time) at sight?

Soloist and composer are said to have had a tumultuous half hour at the close of the concert, when, if we can believe the stories of credible witnesses, a large amount of vitriolic language was exchanged. When the difficulties of the concerto, both of execution and of interpretation are considered, one

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 13.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

AS ANOTHER CONCERT DISCLOSES MR. RABAUD

His Conducting at Cambridge with Franck's Symphony and a Concerto by Liszt—More Choral Plans—Beethoven's Mass to Be Sung—Puccini's Impending Operas — Mme. Galli-Curci in a New Part—Miss Farrar's Fortunes—Items and Incidents

THOSE that said in their haste, in corridors of Symphony Hall, that that the days of Mr. Rabaud with the orchestra recalled the days of Mr. Fiedler or Mr. Paur spoke out of exceedingly blurred memories and as dull an impression of the present conductor's abilities. Mr. Rabaud lays no such heavy hand upon music and performance as did Mr. Fiedler, has no such thick mind or common imagination. Mr. Fiedler was aften impervious to fine taste; Mr. Rabaud cultivates it. The Parisian may not run to the lengths of communicating ardor that sometimes swept Mr. Paur and the audience with him through music that enkindling him enkindled likewise his forces and his hearers; but he possesses a sense of characterizing style, a finesse with piece and performance that were strange to Mr. Paur's coarser and lesser tutored mettle. Rather, the nearest analogue, among his predecessors, to Mr. Rabaud was Mr. Gericke.

By instinct, habit, faith, the French conductor is clear-minded, precise. So far as he may go, he apprehends exactly the form, contents, individual and stylistic quality of a piece in hand, would enjoin it as clearly and completely upon his orchestra, would disclose it in like degree to his hearers. In pace, rhythm, phrasing, modulation, in the whole range of shading, color, climax, Mr. Rabaud is never obscure, uncertain. He perceives clearly, he accomplishes exactly; his very beat speaks these traits to orchestra and audience. Mr Gericke had them, carried them, like Mr. Rabaud into the details of concert-giving—the beginning and the ending at the appointed hour, the arrangement of the programme. Again like his Viennese predecessor, Mr. Rabaud seeks refinement of performance, gives off in the concert-hall and elsewhere more light than heat. Pursuing this end, he hears his orchestra sensitively, would school it in the graces, the distinctions of performance. Yet more than once, in his concerts in Boston and Cambridge in the last month, Mr. Rabaud has summoned a larger eloquence, a more vivid transmitting power than Mr Gericke could muster except upon rare occasion in his final years in Boston. To the end, he remained primarily an objective conductor with both music and orchestra. Mr. Rabaud is like-minded, like-tempered, but his objectivity penetrates deeper, runs warmer.

These qualities in Mr. Rabaud stood clear in the second of his concerts in Cambridge last evening, when the quick applause of an intent audience must have stimulated him at every turn. He and the orchestra repeated Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" from their concerts in Boston a few weeks ago, and the performance gained not a little in sensuous mantle of tone, in the euphonies of instrumental voice with voice, especially among the wood-winds and the horns, in the supple shaping of phrase, in pliancy of transition. It remained an objective performance; it missed in the slow movement a little of the sentiment that there, as in many another's music is ingrained in Schubert; but throughout the symphony the mood was warmer, the songful quality better released than it had been in Symphony Hall. Mr. Rabaud characterized the music as well as pictured it; the fine detail was better caught into the moving web.

In turn, in Franck's symphony, at the other end of the programme, in the climacteric return and proclamation of the dominant motives, that hitherto he has set free only in Saint-Saëns's much tamer symphony. The music glowed under his hand, swept orchestra and audience into itself, gained power, the ampler, the finer, because it was nowhere blatant. In the lighter measures of the pseudo-scherzo, Mr. Rabaud was at once adroit and spontaneous. The music flowed yet in delicate variation of course and beat upon the ear. Nor did the conductor weigh too heavily with melancholy the measures in which the English horn leads. Franck cultivated no Faust-like brooding. His voice in this Allegetto is no more than tender longing, suffusing the musing with sensuous beauty, pause yet progress in the advance out of darkness into the splendors of the radiant end. It is easy to read too much into the music of Franck, intrinsically a simple music, to make him and it sound obstruse. Mr. Rabaud avoids this pitfall. His ascent with the music is ascent into the faith, the joy that it bears. Here was new quality in the conductor and yet again in Lisct's concerto in E-flat in which Miss Renard played the piano part. For half the way, it seemed no more than intelligent, faithful, clear-cut performance; then of a sudden with the transition into the long finale, pianist and conductor began to strike a fire that was not merely of the composer's measures. Before they had gone far with it, and onward to the end, it appeared that Mr. Rabaud and incidentally Miss Renard can touch the conventional, yet still stirring brillance of the concert-room.

Chorus for this concert, but he will later prepare it for performances of Saint-Saëns's piece. "The Lyre and the Harp," and of Beethoven's mighty mass, the "Missa Solemnis," unheard in Boston since the distant days in which The Cecilia attempted it. For it the chorus will number three or four hundred voices, and it will be sung toward the end of the season at a choral concert, outside the regular Symphony series. "The Lyre and the Harp" is a much simpler thing, a dialogue in tones, in which chorus, orchestra and solo voices share.

For once in a way Mr. Elman, the violinist, will not play in Boston, as in recent years, at one of the Sunday Concerts. Instead he announces a concert of his own, and in the evening, for Friday, Jan. 3, in Symphony Hall.

Here in Boston

When the Symphony Orchestra was reorganized last summer, one of the men dismissed was Karl Stumpf, for some years the player upon the bass-clarinet. Even in days of war, there was no offence in him except that he happened to be a German subject and public opinion demanded the exclusion of such from the band. Stumpf had the temperament that took such dismissal hard, that saw the future stretching dark and blank before him. The work for which he had come to America, in which he had gained professional reputation, in which he might have risen still higher, had been taken from him, in Boston and elsewhere, without possibility of present recovery. He fell into an acute melancholia, so distressing to his family and friends that they finally sent him to a sanitarium. From it he returned not long ago to the household of kinsfolk in New York. There, yesterday, he took his own life. On both sides, these minor tragedies might fill a new and piteous casualty list.

The choral concerts by the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus on Dec. 30 and 31, briefly announced in this place a week ago, have suddenly swelled into a "celebration of the close of the year of victory." Accordingly, they are to begin with the national anthems of the United States, Belgium, Britain, Italy and France, and proceed with orchestral or choral pieces, or both, by composers from these countries—Verdi's seldom heard Te Deum for double chorus and orchestra; Franck's setting of the one hundred and fiftieth Psalm ("Praise ye, the Lord. Praise God in his sanctuary; praise him in the firmament of his power"); Mr. Chadwick's hymn, "Land of Our Hearts," first heard at the Norfolk Festival last summer; Bizet's familiar overture, "Patrie," and an old English suite by composers of the sixteenth century, arranged by Mr. Rabaud for Monsieur Gemier's revival of "The Merchant of Venice," two seasons ago, at the Théatre Antoine in Paris. For subscribers to the Symphony Concerts, these concerts will replace the pair of the afternoon of Oct. 11 and the evening of Oct. 12, omitted when the epidemic of influenza closed theatres and halls. For the general public seats not so taken are available.

Not only is Mr. Stephen Townsend reassembling and training the Symphony

MONITOR DECEMBER 14.

Boston Music Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, sixth concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, Boston, afternoon of Dec. 13, 1918, Joseph Bonnet, soloist. The program: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major, Op. 93; Converse, "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasy, Op. 19 (after the poem of Walt Whitman); Guilmant, Symphony No. 1, D minor, for organ and orchestra, Op. 42.

BOSTON, Massachusetts—It is perhaps an illuminating commentary on the present stage of our musical development that a piece composed 14 years ago should not yet sound old-fashioned. Mr. F. S. Converse's cleverly wrought fantasy called "The Mystic Trumpeter," after the poem by Walt Whitman, played on the sixth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sounded as fresh, alluring, and, to some probably, as cacophonous as it did when it had its first public hearing, in Philadelphia, on March 3, 1905. Such faith have we, however, in the value of the music of the present day that we should like to hazard a guess that the number who found it discordant on Dec. 13, 1918, was far less than on Jan. 26, 1907, when it had its first Boston hearing. We have been freed from many supposedly inflexible conditions attending the writing of music since the beginning of this century, which is only another way of saying that we have allowed vast new fields of color to be opened up for us to enjoy. There is far more turbulence in the note of joy with which Mr. Converse's piece ends than in the more placid gladness at the ending of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, but who shall say that the joyousness of Mr. Converse's joy is any degree less than Beethoven's?

Joseph Bonnet took the solo part in the Guilmant Symphony for organ and orchestra, playing a cadenza of his own. This is noble music, and Mr. Bonnet's playing of this great work by his teacher added brilliance to a scintillant score. The smoothness and perfect rhythm of the organist's pedaling called forth a gasp of astonished admiration from the organists in the audience.

The Eighth Beethoven Symphony received what seemed to be a somewhat perfunctory reading, in which the desired clarity and crispness was lacking.

POST, DECEMBER 14.

BONNET SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Organ Virtuoso Plays Guilmant's First Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Joseph Bonnet, organist and composer, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr Bonnet played the symphony for organ and orchestra, No. 1, op. 42, of his master, Alexandre Guilmant.

The other compositions performed were F. S. Converse's tone-poem after Walt Whitman, "The Mystic Trumpeter," and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

BONNET THE PAST MASTER

It is rarely indeed that an organist not a regular member of an orchestra but a traveling virtuoso and composer is invited to officiate at a symphony concert. The organ is seldom thought of as a solo instrument. Perhaps the unusual sight of the organist laboring manfully at his instrument, hands head and feet moving with vigor if not precision, is prejudicial to his chances with the managers. Where should the organist be seated? Yesterday Mr. Bonnet set in full view of the audience and for those who are appreciative organ technic his mastery of pedals as well as manuals was evident to the eye as to the ear.

Mr. Bonnet is indeed a past master of his instrument and in every respect a great musician. It would be superfluous to refer to the extraordinary finish and brilliancy of his technic, his infallibly precise attack and release, the cleanness of his rapid passages and the perfect legato which he maintains when he desires it in passages of the most complicated voice-leading. This is the machinery of his art, long since perfected. It served to conceal the difficulty of his enormous physical accomplishment and to make certain the force and breadth of his style, the authority with which he now supported and now led on the orchestra; his skill in color obtained through the most artistic registration; and the astonishing vitality and precision of his rhythm. The concerto itself is conspicuous for its solid workmanship, the mastery of form and the very effective and harmonious instrumentation. But with a less effective opportunity to display his mastery, Mr. Bonnet would have made lasting impression on his audience.

Converse's Tone Poem

Mr. Converse's tone-poem wears well with the years. It was composed in 1904 and was first heard in Boston in 1907. The mood is lofty, the preluding and the opening solo of the mystic trumpeter establish a noble and poetic mood. The principal phases of Whitman's verses are freely followed. The harmonic scheme of the love-music is well conceived as a contrast to that of the opening. The music of war is stirring, nor is the quotation of a few measures from "Marching Through Georgia" incongruous. The conclusion is highly effective, and a worthy capstone of the work which we personally consider Mr. Converse's finest accomplishment for orchestra. This work should be heard much oftener. The performance of Mr. Rabaud was a very brilliant one, and the composer bowed his acknowledgements from an obscure corner of the hall.

Rabaud the Classicist

Mr. Rabaud strengthens one's impressions of his exceptional gift as a classicist. His readings of symphonic music of the classic school revitalize these works, not in an impudent or unduly modernist spirit, but in a manner which impresses anew on the hearer the vigor and human meaning of the music, and the incalculable significance of great musical form.

As for the symphony—is it not one of the most unique accomplishments of genius? The traditions of the symphony and the orchestra were maintained in this performance, one of uncommon eloquence.

At its third concert in Cambridge on the evening of Thursday, Dec. 12, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Rabaud, played the César Franck D Minor Symphony in a manner that stirred the house into spontaneous and prolonged applause. Miss Rosita Renard was the soloist, playing the Liszt E flat major concerto. A third number on the program was Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony.

POST DECEMBER 14.

SYMPHONY AT HARVARD

Rosita Renard Soloist in Liszt's Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

Distinctive features of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, were Mr. Rabaud's interpretation of Cesar Franck's symphony and Rosita Renard's performance of Liszt's E flat concerto. There were two symphonies—the one by Schubert in B minor ("Unfinished") and the symphony of Franck's, which brought a profoundly impressive conclusion of the programme.

Miss Renard is more familiar as a recitalist than as a performer with orchestra. She chose for her Cambridge appearance the concerto which, played with the electrical spirit and the swashbuckling bravado that the music demands, still makes its mark and still taxes to the utmost the technical apparatus of the performer. In the final pages, Miss Renard's performance was exciting indeed. What she did with the rest of the composition was to emphasize, for an exception, the finer qualities of the music, and refine, to a considerable extent, those which are purely "virtuotistic." Fleetness, good taste, and an absence of the sentimentality which often is given the middle section, were commendable characteristics of her interpretation. She was enthusiastically received.

Mr. Rabaud's reading of the Franck symphony should be heard at the Boston concerts of this orchestra. It was conspicuous for its grand outlines, the continuity of the musical thought, and the noble passion which informed, particularly, the finale. It was another symphony than the one we have known of late seasons—more plastic and lofty in conception than Dr. Muck's performance, simpler in outline and less meticulous in detail than that of Mr. Monteux, but above all—Franck's symphony, a master-work for all time.

TRIBUNE PROVIDENCE, DECEMBER 8,

COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Harold Bauer, courteous to the French element in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play with them in Providence on Dec. 17, the Concerto in C-minor by Saint-Saens, a close friend of Henri Rabaud, the conductor.

HAROLD BAUER.
Celebrated Pianist Who is to be Soloist at the Next Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday Evening, Dec. 17.

recently enticed from Paris. Mr. Bauer has a proverbial light-fingered way with this sparkling piece. For the rest, two symphonies upon a program sound forbidding in the announcement, but they are both lightly and brief—Beethoven's "Eighth," with the scherzo which parodies the metronome, and Schubert's melodious and evergreen, "Unfinished."

Harold Bauer's indefatigable touring has led him to strange parts. Here are some of his experiences: Challenged to a duel in Barcelona by a Spaniard, who talked during the concert and was reproved. Arrested near Moscow for playing a Hungarian dance instead of dancing it. The police were there to see that the program was carried out, and they naturally thought that a number announced as a dance should be danced. Attacked by mosquitoes in Argentina and had to give up playing. Conducted through an underground passage in Spain to escape from the mob, who had been too excited by his playing. Severely bruised while being shouldered by a crowd of American enthusiasts. Played Beethoven to a thousand Red Indians in Arizona.

EVENING TELEGRAM
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 6 19

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discriminating Philadelphia

PHILADELPHIA music-lovers have had an unusual opportunity thus early in the season of hearing and comparing three of the leading French conductors in purely orchestral concerts. These are Andre Messager, conductor of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra; Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony, the two latter conducting this orchestra at successive concerts.

M. Messager was at somewhat of a disadvantage in holding the concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, an auditorium entirely too large for an orchestral concert. Many of the more delicate effects are lost in the vast reaches of this hall and (to Americans at least) the very unusual way of seating the orchestra doubtless caused a different tonal effect than if the men had been seated in the manner usually adopted by American orchestras.

M. Monteux also labored under difficulties in having to take a strange orchestra fresh from the summer vacation and work them into shape to give a symphony concert in a period of about four weeks. M. Rabaud, on the other hand, had the advantage of M. Monteux's work with the men and of the very much greater psychological fact that he was to be the permanent leader.

WITH this in mind, the purpose here is not to compare the artistic results of the concerts per se, but to note the different styles of conducting and the principal results which each of these fine musicians sought to obtain.

The concert of the Conservatoire Orchestra came first. In it M. Messager clearly showed that his chief effort was toward refinement, both of interpretation and of tone. He had a splendid orchestra, which was at all times under the perfect control of his baton and responsive to every signal he gave. In his readings, however, delicacy seemed to be a paramount consideration and there were those who thought that his interpretation lacked something of the ruggedness to which we are accustomed in the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. As might be expected, he was at his best in Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," where the characteristics of composer and conductor seemed to be more in harmony than in any other number on his program.

MONTEUX revealed far less of this natural French inclination toward super-refinement. He is very exacting as to detail, both of orchestration and of composition but especially the latter. This was shown in the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck, and particularly in the last movement. In this movement appears virtually all the thematic material of the previous movements, which are frequently combined in the most complex counterpoint, in addition to the new thematic material of the finale itself.

All these details were brought out in the clearest maner, the quantity of tone in each instrument taking the various melodies being graduated in such a way as to be perfectly audible and yet without overpowering a perhaps weaker instrument having another melody equally important. This result must have represented an enormous amount of rehearsal and may have been achieved at the expense of tone quality which, on this occasion, was by no means up to the Boston former standard. He also had a keen eye for dramatic points as is natural in an operatic conductor.

RABAUD came between his two compatriots. He did not show the delicacy either of reading or of tone of M. Messager, nor was the complexity of symphonic design brought out in the manner that M. Monteaux showed, though it must be admitted that neither the Beethoven Seventh nor the Borodin Second Symphony are constructed in anything such intricate way as is the Cesar Franck work.

On the other hand, he showed far more vigor than M. Messager and a far better tone quality than M. Monteux. The Beethoven Symphony was given with all the strength that could be desired, especially in the Scherzo and the Finale, and yet the tone was even and of fine quality throughout. Strangely enough for a French conductor, he was at his worst in the Allegretto, the movement requiring the most finesse.

While he was careful of the details especially those of orchestration, he seemed to be most intent upon a consistent interpretation of the symphonies as a whole and strove to this end, to the exclusion of all minutiae. The work of the three great French conductors has excited considerable comment among Philadelphia musicians, the opportunity to judge them being unique.

ARE violinists nowadays less proficient than they were 100 years ago? It is a well-known fact that Clement, for whom the violin concerto of Beethoven was composed, played the piece at sight on the night it was first produced, Beethoven not having completed the last movement in time for the soloist to get even a look at it before the beginning of the performance. Have we any violinists now who would care to attempt any modern concerto (as did Beethoven was at that time) at sight?

Soloist and composer are said to have had a tumultuous half hour at the close of the concert, when, if we can believe the stories of credible witnesses, a large amount of vitriolic language was exchanged. When the difficulties of the concerto, both of execution and of interpretation are considered, one

PHILADELPHIA PRESS
DECEMBER 14

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BEETHOVEN, MR. CONVERSE AND AN ORGANIST

Mr. Bonnet as "Assisting Artist" in a Piece That Well Displays Him as Virtuoso and Musician — "The Mystic Trumpeter" Deservedly Heard Again—Mr. Rabaud Freshens Another Classic

SUPER-SENSITIVE persons, unable to divorce the impressions of the eye from the impressions of the ear, have sometimes suggested that for the full enjoyment of symphonic music, the playing orchestra should be invisible. [illegible] the listener hear with mind and heart, understanding, imagination, emotion, a seeming music of the air to produce which no visible violinists laid bows to strings, no horn-players perceptibly puffed their cheeks; no drum-sticks rose and fell flail-like; while the conductor was a spiritual rather than a bodily presence. Finical desires no doubt, born often of amiable, amusing affectation, perilously touching the institutional habits of the concert-hall, yet desires that an incident of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon seemed in measure to justify. For the first time within the longest memory, a visiting organist was the "assisting artist" of the day, no other, indeed, than Joseph Bonnet, most noted in Europe and in America of all his Parisian generation. To display the better, perhaps, one side of his technical skill, the organ was set close to the front of the stage with keyboard, stops and pedals in full view. Upon the bench, back to the audience, in sight of every eye that chose to seek him, sat Mr. Bonnet, pulling stops at need, plying feet or hands or both as the measures of the music demanded, occasionally swinging his body, as it were, into his playing, doing whatever the manifold and exacting technique of the organ requires. He was as unobtrusive as he might be in these spirited exercises; he gave them, even, pictorial quality; unquestionably they much interested the spectators which most hearers became; presumably to not a few they were clearest proof of Mr. Bonnet's high resource as a virtuoso. Yet would the impression have been diminished had Mr. Bonnet's "footwork," for example, been discreetly concealed behind his instrument, had Guilmant's symphony for organ and orchestra seemed less to the eye energetic and fluent manufacture on the part of the organist? After all the profit that students drew from such observation of "the master" is only a detail of the Symphony Concerts, designed as they are rather to be heard than seen.

The obvious retort is, of course, that Guilmant's symphony is a displayful piece, existing by and for the abilities and distinctions of the organist whom it joins to the orchestra; that when that organist is as illustrious as Mr. Bonnet his hearers are nothing loth to see him also at his task. The symphony has indeed little intrinsic quality except as a "vehicle." The motives whence it springs, the course that they follow, the meagre transformations and enrichments that they undergo interest only as they serve the range of the organ. In the course of the piece it is heard in sonorous proclamation and peroration, in rapid and ornate passages, in songful measures, in intricate unions of diverse voices, in deep or delicate play of color. It joins itself to the orchestra; it makes contrast to it; it exchanges measures with the other choirs; it seeks now and then artful euphonies. But it remains essentially an instrument to be displayed while the music is the means to that display. Thus the symphony, plus the organist's own cadenza, disclosed almost to the full his mastery of nearly every process that summons diversifies or controls the voice of the organ. Mr. Bonnet's resource therewith was inexhaustible, his surety unshakable; his ease the mantle that hid his pains. Furthermore, this organ part of Guilmant's studious fashioning revealed him as the musician alert to rhythm, sensitive to color, at once precise and plastic, designing, accomplishing not for himself but for his instrument and for a symphony that at moments seemed hardly to deserve such pains. For steadily Mr. Bonnet took thought of the orchestra as partner with him. Glorifying his instrument, glorifying his piece he shone the more for himself.

For one of the two numbers that fell to Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra the conductor made significantly wise choice. The Symphony Concerts have long been hospitable to the music of American composers; one after another, five and six in a given season. Their pieces have been played to be well or ill received, to show enduring or only passing deserts. Yet, whatever the intrinsic merit, the temper of the audience or the judgment of the conductor, they have forthwith in many an instance been laid aside and speedily forgotten. Their fate in this respect has been in no wise different from that which has befallen other novel pieces from European pens. Once the "novelty" has vanished the choosing conductors have lost interest. Yet manifestly not a little of this music deserves to be established in the active repertory of the orchestra, would yield quite as much pleasure as many a reiterated number that it now contains. In 1907, for example, Dr. Muck produced Mr. Converse's fantasia upon Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter." It was meritorious music, interesting to all concerned, illusory and impressive to many, bearing witness, above almost any other of his work, to the composer's abilities. Yet until Mr. Rabaud revived it yesterday, through eleven years it had been heard not at all, or only once at most, in the course of nearly three hundred Symphony Concerts. To all intents and purposes Mr. Rabaud was producing a new piece; once more it proved worth; once more music and composer were warmly applauded; yet again presumably into the archives it will go—perhaps for another term of years. Now the way to foster American music is not merely to play it as novelty, but to keep so much of it as deserves such place in the active repertory of symphony concerts.

Again, yesterday, there was no questioning the fair deserts of Mr. Converse's fantasia. Whitman's poem invites translation into tones. In it, he hears his "Mystic trumpeter" sounding as in the music of the air, amorous longing, the zests and the struggle of men as in warfare, the pains of defeat, humiliation, self-abasement, the joy of full and ardent life. Whitman could summon these sensations only in the illusion and the emotion of words. Mr. Converse invokes them in the music in which the poet feigned to hear them. The design of his fantasia lies ready to his hand—the prelude that calls the trumpeter into tonal being as in a rapture of listening; the divisions in which, in Whitman's word, the trumpet "blows" of love, of struggle, of humiliation, of exultation; the linking measures in which the trumpet changes voice for new song. Such a fantasia cannot miss unity, progress, contrast. In the fulfilling of this design, Mr. Converse writes with an invention and imagination, a fullness and freedom not always at his command. As music, the fantasia interests the ear in matter and movement, in skilful and fertile treatment. As expression of the mood, emotion, illusion of the poem, it is graphic, eloquent. Seldom has Mr. Converse so well sustained a tonal flight, seldom has he written music to which his hearers make so ready answer with understanding and mood. It is quite true that fantasia bears no mark of genius; it is not necessary that it should. It is true as well that Mr. Converse's music does not teem with an innate or a willed originality. On the other hand it is music that by able means and an honest eloquence altogether achieves its end. Now much of the music heard at symphony concerts anywhere is no more than such.

The other of Mr. Rabaud's purely orchestral numbers was a repertory piece reanimated—Beethoven's eighth symphony—the symphony of the composer in the highest of playful spirits—ticking Allegretto, sportive rather than stately Minuet, gayly bristling Finale and all the familiar rest. At moments it is music of a careless energy as when toward the end Beethoven piles chord upon chord in sheer caprice of hearty reiteration; again, it is light running fancy as when the Allegretto ticks out its tune; again as in the first movement, it sounds as music written from sheer exuberant impulse; while of a sudden, as in the Finale, it becomes for a space the music of Beethoven, dreamer of dreams—and for no reason at all except his own impulse. Beyond any other of his symphonies, it is music flung off as the mood prompted, in a kind of happy release, falling on the instant into the form that will most readily contain it, into the progress that will best give it life. Objective as always, but discerningly, communicatingly objective, Mr. Rabaud caught in pace and accent, transition, climax, contrast, this animation, fitfulness, exuberance. Nor had the orchestra lost skill in the feats of fleetness that the music bids it do. Mr. Rabaud's hand was brisk and keen; at every stroke his band answered to it.

H. T. P.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York City
DEC 1 1918

SYMPHONY PLAYER HANGS HIMSELF

Carl Stumps Found in Room by Mother-in-Law—Used Bathrobe Cord.

Carl Stumps, 34, former first flutist and saxophone player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, committed suicide yesterday at the home of his mother-in-law, Mrs. H. Schreyer of St. Nicholas avenue. He hanged himself to the bedpost in his room by arranging a noose from the cord of his bathrobe.

Stumps, according to the police, suffered a breakdown several weeks ago, and for a while was in a sanitarium. Patrolman Edward Heffron of West 152d street station, who investigated the case, learned that the dead man has a wife and child living in West 158th street. Owing to the threats, the police say, he made against his wife and child in his unbalanced state of mind, his mother-in-law thought it advisable, after his release from the sanitarium, to take him into her home. She is caretaker of the New York Conservatory of Music building. Stumps was born in Germany.

When she went to the room of her son-in-law to arouse him yesterday, she found him hanging by the cord from the bedpost. She called Julian Ruddy, a musical instructor in the building, who summoned Dr. Abraham Needles of St. Lukes Hospital. He pronounced him

---

CONCERT CALENDAR

Music by d'Indy and Mr. Hofmann as Pianist at the Symphony Concerts of Next Week — Rakhmaninov's Return—Choral Pieces at Symphony Hall—Mme. Leginska and Mr. Rosen

TWO names unknown for several years to the programmes of the Symphony Concerts reappear on that arranged for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Mr. d'Indy's and Mr. Hofmann's. Warmly disposed as Dr. Muck was to French composers, he took umbrage at an article in an American weekly newspaper in which Mr. d'Indy affirmed in bitter words that German conductors in the United States excluded French pieces from their concerts. In general the assertion was not true; in particular it was unjust to the conductors for years past of the Boston Orchestra; it so provoked Dr. Muck that while hitherto he had not overlooked d'Indy's music, he denied it further place on his programmes—manifestly perverse reasoning since the quality and the interest of the composer's pieces had nothing to do with his errors of statement as essayist and propagandist. Next week Mr. Rabaud will restore d'Indy to just place in the scheme of the Symphony Concerts, but with one of his early pieces in which he was much under Wagnerian influence, viz.: The symphonic trilogy suggested by Schiller's three plays of Wallenstein. The first of the pieces pictures the colorful tumults of the camp of Wallenstein's army; the second sings the loves of Max and Thekla as Schiller has embroidered them upon "Die Piccolomini"; the third recounts in tones the death of Wallenstein.

The other returning name is that of Mr. Hofmann unheard as pianist for five years with the Symphony Orchestra because of differences with conductor and management which it is not necessary to recall. The more will a public that has long missed him welcome to the place as "assisting artist" that he richly deserves. He will play the piano part in Chopin's concerto in E minor, a piece that he cherishes, upon which he has spent tireless pains and which he has now brought to nearly perfect performance. The third and final item of Mr. Rabaud's list is Berlioz's youthful overture to Shakspeare's tragedy, "King Lear." For the first time, thus, in Boston the conductor has drawn a programme without a symphony.

AMERICAN DECEMBER

BONNET SKILFUL AT IMPRESSIVE SYMPHONY

French Organist Makes Debut With Boston Organization; Rabaud Artistic

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Joseph Bonnet, since the death of Guilmant, the acknowledged leader of French organists, made his debut with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon, when he played the organ part of Guilmant's majestic symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra.

This big work hasn't been performed in Boston for some fifteen years, and at its performance then under Gericke, Wallace Goodrich officiated at the organ.

Bonnet has given several recitals in this city within a year, and only confirmed yesterday the high opinion of his skill at his chosen instrument. The symphony itself is big in scope, impressive—sometimes ponderous. It was played with keen sympathy by Monsieur Rabaud and his men.

Rabaud was unfamiliar with American composers when he arrived in Boston to conduct our orchestra. He has made the acquaintance of Frederick S. Converse and played his "Mystic Trumpeter" yesterday. This is one of the lasting contributions to orchestral music made by American composers. It has been appearing regularly upon symphony programs during the past dozen years and each time makes a more profound impression. Rabaud apparently found it to his liking for he gave it a spirited performance. The program opened with the graceful and dainty and ever-refreshing eighth symphony of Beethoven.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 8 1918

Henri Rabaud, New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Creates Impression That He Is a Leader of Unusual Gifts. Writer Says He Will Fill Long Vacant Niche in Gallery of Baton Wielders.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra has apparently landed right side up after the always perilous leap of selecting a new conductor, judging by the impression Henri Rabaud made here at his debut last Monday evening. His success was emphatic, even if it was not of the sensational variety. His audience, a smaller band than the good things of the occasion warranted, seemed to like his work immensely. And the reviewers with almost perfect unanimity saw in him a leader of unusual gifts.

It is the present writer's opinion that Rabaud is destined to become one of the most popular conductors we have over here. With a few days to think matters over, he wonders mildly why there was not more of the element of excitement about the successful first appearance last Monday night. However, a little reflection makes the reason evident. You need time to appreciate Rabaud's personality. He is essentially modest and self-effacing. There is nothing about him that approximates even remotely the sensational. He seems to approach the conductor's desk almost with diffidence, and it strikes you that perhaps nothing could have got him out before an audience except love and veneration for the music he is to interpret and the feeling that to put its message before the people is the justification for his presence in a conspicuous role.

That type of man does not perhaps win the tumultous applause of the dazzling moment, but it is a type eminently calculated to grow upon us and at last to be accepted with a sort of admiring affection, which the more spectacular hero can never hope to duplicate. With this sort of talent there is little danger that we shall applaud in haste and repent at leisure. Once we have assessed it, we abide with perfect confidence in the valuation arrived at.

* * *

THE personality of the new conductor is what will most interest us in him. He will fill a long-vacant niche in the gallery of baton wielders whose statues and statuettes we are accustomed to scan. It will be somewhere near that where stands the effigy of Walter Damrosch, whom he most resembles among our own conductors. By that I mean that both men represent the result of long-ripened experience in their art and a kind of mellowed geniality that the years bring to steep art in. In this regard, Henri Rabaud will step into a place by himself among the conductors we hear from month to month in the regular course of events. This is not to say that he is better than any other conductor we know, but merely different. And variety is the life of art.

Some commentators remarked that Rabaud had the appearance of the scholar. This is true if we regard the term "scholar" as meaning one who strives for complete understanding. But with the word we often connote an aloofness from the affairs of everyday life and an emphasis on thinking rather than doing. This connotation will not at all fit the present case. For instance, in the prime affair of everyday life for the conductor, orchestral discipline, the new head of the Boston Symphony gave evidence that he is notably efficient. It is common testimony that the orchestra has very much improved its ensemble since it was heard here a few weeks ago. On this point the present scribe can have no opinion, since about the time of the first concert this season, the theory and practice of epidemic influenza was occupying most of his attention. But there was ample testimony offered last Monday night that Rabaud is an effective disciplinarian. The firm and often insistent beat, the whole-hearted attention of the players to their task, and, most important, the actual results achieved in shading and execution, proved that the conductor had established his authority over the orchestra and had secured the ungrudging co-operation of his men. One can foresee that the ensuing weeks will show a steady development of the orchestra's technique, and it is not too much to expect that he will bring it back to the former glories temporarily dimmed by the impact of culture upon kultur.

* * *

IN appearance, Mr. Rabaud does not suggest at all what is popularly regarded here as the type of Frenchman. In the first place, he is tall. Now, to our eyes, if a Frenchman is so exceptional as to allow himself to be tall, he should be ample in physique, like, for instance, the late Edouard Colonne. But Rabaud is spare in figure. Then, he wears a beard. That is quite allowable on general principles, but again the new conductor departs from our stock picture, for the beard is rather close-cropped. Nor is he vivacious in movement or gesture. He is deliberate, like a man very sure of what he wants to do and determined to accomplish it with the least possible fuss.

Perhaps so much has been said about his scholarly attributes, his maturity and his deliberateness, as to give the impression of a man in whom intellect holds more than its necessary sway of the artistic balance at the expense of the qualities of the heart and of elemental force. Nothing could be further from the truth. Of the purely emotional side of music he is a forceful exponent. Just as his intellectual side was demonstrated in the carefully articulated reading of, for instance, the first movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, so the sense of rhythm and the other instinctive attributes of musicianly feeling the things that lie at the bottom, are inexpressible in words, and really the most important—were exemplified in the graceful beauty of the allegretto, the rippling humor of the third movement, and, most of all, in the stirring close of the finale, where he found the material for more heroic outgivings than most conductors have realized.

* * *

IT SEEMS to me, however, that when Rabaud's eminence as a musician becomes generally recognized, as it must be, what will really turn the tide of public favor in his direction will be the qualities of his personality aside from his music. His predecessor offers the best illustration of what is meant on the principle of exceptions proving the rule. Dr. Muck commanded respect and admiration in the highest degree as a conductor, but he was never generally loved aside from these riches for himself alone.

There are always artists we admire but never feel we are getting close to, and others who send out across the footlights with their music a sense of their own humanity, which we seize upon and hold until we acquire an affection for the artist as well as for his music. In some cases, indeed, a pleasing personality will make up in our minds for shortcomings on the musical side.

The whole thing is summed up in a witty remark once made by a colleague who did not like quartet playing and heard a famous quartet being discussed. "It is to be praised loudly and shored at softly," he remarked. However much we feel inclined to praise the musicianship of an artist, he will leave us drowsy unless beyond and above his music there is something to be seized and cherished on the human side.

In the case of the Boston Symphony conductor there is such a "something," as there is in the case of the other conductors we hear and admire. And to make it valuable, it must be, as it is, a different "something" from what we find in every other case. As I have tried to indicate above, distilled essence of Rabaud would be a product warm and sparkling in color, firm and uniform in texture, and mellowed like old wine.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
DEC 1 1918

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given next Tuesday afternoon, December 3, is exciting unwonted interest and curiosity. At this concert the symphony patrons will hear the orchestra for the first time under its new permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud. The first concert of the season showed that the orchestra is the same instrument of wondrous beauty that it has been in past years.

In Washington, as in Boston and Cambridge, Mr. Rabaud opens his program with the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven, thus paying tribute at the very beginning to what he calls the "beauty of the classics." This symphony was composed in 1803-04, and it is said that the title page of the manuscript bore the word "Buonaparte." There seems to be no doubt that Napoleon, young conqueror, consul and enemy of kings, worked a spell over Beethoven.

In the second part of the program will be found two numbers. The first of these is the unfamiliar symphonic poem of Saint-Saens, entitled "The Youth of Hercules," and the second is Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant Caprice on Spanish themes.

STAR
Washington, D. C.
DEC 1 1918

CONCERTS, LECTURES, ETC.

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given Tuesday afternoon. At this concert the Symphony Orchestra will play for the first time under its new permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud.

Mr. Rabaud wil lopen his program with the "Eroica Symphony" of Beethoven, thus paying tribute to what he calls the "beauty of the classics." In the second part of the program will be found the unfamiliar symphonic poem of Saint-Saens entitled, "The Youth of Hercules," and the Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on Spanish Themes.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS
TRANSCRIPT DECEMBER 14

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

BEETHOVEN, MR. CONVERSE AND AN ORGANIST

Mr. Bonnet as "Assisting Artist" in a Piece That Well Displays Him as Virtuoso and Musician — "The Mystic Trumpeter" Deservedly Heard Again—Mr. Rabaud Freshens Another Classic

SUPER-SENSITIVE persons, unable to divorce the impressions of the eye from the impressions of the ear, have sometimes suggested that for the full enjoyment of symphonic music, the playing orchestra should be invisible. Then would the listener hear with mind and heart, understanding, imagination, emotion, a seeming music of the air to produce which no visible violinists laid bows to strings, no horn-players perceptibly puffed their cheeks; no drum-sticks rose and fell flail-like; while the conductor was a spiritual rather than a bodily presence. Finical desires no doubt, born often of amiable, amusing affectation, perilously touching the institutional habits of the concert-hall, yet desires that an incident of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon seemed in measure to justify. For the first time within the longest memory, a visiting organist was the "assisting artist" of the day, no other, indeed, than Joseph Bonnet, most noted in Europe and in America of all his Parisian generation. To display the better, perhaps, one side of his technical skill, the organ was set close to the front of the stage with keyboard, stops and pedals in full view. Upon the bench, back to the audience, in sight of every eye that chose to seek him, sat Mr. Bonnet, pulling stops at need, plying feet or hands or both as the measures of the music demanded, occasionally swinging his body, as it were, into his playing, doing whatever the manifold and exacting technique of the organ requires. He was as unobtrusive as he might be in these spirited exercises; he gave them, even, pictorial quality; unquestionably they much interested the spectators which most hearers became; presumably to not a few they were clearest proof of Mr. Bonnet's high resource as a virtuoso. Yet would the impression have been diminished had Mr. Bonnet's "footwork," for example, been discreetly concealed behind his instrument, had Guilmant's symphony for organ and orchestra seemed less to the eye energetic and fluent manufacture on the part of the organist? After all the profit that students drew from such observation of "the master" is only a detail of the Symphony Concerts, designed as they are rather to be heard than seen.

The obvious retort is, of course, that Guilmant's symphony is a displayful piece, existing by and for the abilities and distinctions of the organist whom it joins to the orchestra; that when that organist is as illustrious as Mr. Bonnet his hearers are nothing loth to see him also at his task. The symphony has indeed little intrinsic quality except as a "vehicle." The motives whence it springs, the course that they follow, the meagre transformations and enrichments that they undergo interest only as they serve the range of the organ. In the course of the piece it is heard in sonorous proclamation and peroration, in rapid and ornate passages, in songful measures, in intricate unions of diverse voices, in deep or delicate play of color. It joins itself to the orchestra; it makes contrast to it; it exchanges measures with the other choirs; it seeks now and then artful euphonies. But it remains essentially an instrument to be displayed while the music is the means to that display. Thus the symphony, plus the organist's own cadenza, disclosed almost to the full his mastery of nearly every process that summons diversifies or controls the voice of the organ. Mr. Bonnet's resource therewith was inexhaustible, his surety unshakable; his ease the mantle that hid his pains. Furthermore, this organ part of Guilmant's studious fashioning revealed him as the musician alert to rhythm, sensitive to color, at once precise and plastic, designing, accomplishing not for himself but for his instrument and for a symphony that at moments seemed hardly to deserve such pains. For steadily Mr. Bonnet took thought of the orchestra as partner with him. Glorifying his instrument, glorifying his piece he shone the more for himself.

For one of the two numbers that fell to Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra the conductor made significantly wise choice. The Symphony Concerts have long been hospitable to the music of American composers; one after another, five and six in a given season. Their pieces have been played to be well or ill received, to show enduring or only passing deserts. Yet, whatever the intrinsic merit, the temper of the audience or the judgment of the conductor, they have forthwith in many an instance been laid aside and speedily forgotten. Their fate in this respect has been in no wise different from that which has befallen other novel pieces from European pens. Once the "novelty" has vanished the choosing conductors have lost interest. Yet manifestly not a little of this music deserves to be established in the active repertory of the orchestra, would yield quite as much pleasure as many a reiterated number that it now contains. In 1907, for example, Dr. Muck produced Mr. Converse's fantasia upon Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter." It was meritorious music, interesting to all concerned, illusory and impressive to many, bearing witness, above almost any other of his work, to the composer's abilities. Yet until Mr. Rabaud revived it yesterday, through eleven years it had been heard not at all, or only once at most, in the course of nearly three hundred Symphony Concerts. To all intents and purposes Mr. Rabaud was producing a new piece; once more it proved worth; once more music and composer were warmly applauded; yet again presumably into the archives it will go—perhaps for another term of years. Now the way to foster American music is not merely to play it as novelty, but to keep so much of it as deserves such place in the active repertory of symphony concerts.

Again, yesterday, there was no questioning the fair deserts of Mr. Converse's fantasia. Whitman's poem invites translation into tones. In it, he hears his "Mystic trumpeter" sounding as in the music of the air, amorous longing, the zests and the struggle of men as in warfare, the pains of defeat, humiliation, self-abasement, the joy of full and ardent life. Whitman could summon these sensations only in the illusion and the emotion of words. Mr. Converse invokes them in the music in which the poet feigned to hear them. The design of his fantasia lies ready to his hand—the prelude that calls the trumpeter into tonal being as in a rapture of listening; the divisions in which, in Whitman's word, the trumpet "blows" of love, of struggle, of humiliation, of exultation; the linking measures in which the trumpet changes voice for new song. Such a fantasia cannot miss unity, progress, contrast. In the fulfilling of this design, Mr. Converse writes with an invention and imagination, a fullness and freedom not always at his command. As music, the fantasia interests the ear in matter and movement, in skilful and fertile treatment. As expression of the mood, emotion, illusion of the poem, it is graphic, eloquent. Seldom has Mr. Converse so well sustained a tonal flight, seldom has he written music to which his hearers make so ready answer with understanding and mood. It is quite true that fantasia bears no mark of genius; it is not necessary that it should. It is true as well that Mr. Converse's music does not teem with an innate or a willed originality. On the other hand it is music that by able means and an honest eloquence altogether achieves its end. Now much of the music heard at symphony concerts anywhere is no more than such.

The other of Mr. Rabaud's purely orchestral numbers was a repertory piece reanimated—Beethoven's eighth symphony—the symphony of the composer in the highest of playful spirits—ticking Allegretto, sportive rather than stately Minuet, gayly bristling Finale and all the familiar rest. At moments it is music of a careless energy as when toward the end Beethoven piles chord upon chord in sheer caprice of hearty reiteration; again, it is light running fancy as when the Allegretto ticks out its tune; again as in the first movement, it sounds as music written from sheer exuberant impulse; while of a sudden, as in the Finale, it becomes for a space the music of Beethoven, dreamer of dreams—and for no reason at all except his own impulse. Beyond any other of his symphonies, it is music flung off as the mood prompted, in a kind of happy release, falling on the instant into the form that will most readily contain it, into the progress that will best give it life. Objective as always, but discerningly, communicatingly objective, Mr. Rabaud caught in pace and accent, transition, climax, contrast, this animation, fitfulness, exuberance. Nor had the orchestra lost skill in the feats of fleetness that the music bids it do. Mr. Rabaud's hand was brisk and keen; at every stroke his band answered to it.

H. T. P.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York City

SYMPHONY PLAYER HANGS HIMSELF

Carl Stumps Found in Room by Mother-in-Law—Used Bathrobe Cord.

Carl Stumps, 34, former first flutist and saxophone player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, committed suicide yesterday at the home of his mother-in-law, Mrs. H. Schreyer of St. Nicholas avenue. He hanged himself to the bedpost in his room by arranging a noose from the cord of his bathrobe.

Stumps, according to the police, suffered a breakdown several weeks ago, and for a while was in a sanitarium. Patrolman Edward Heffron of West 152d street station, who investigated the case, learned that the dead man has a wife and child living in West 158th street. Owing to the threats, the police say, he made against his wife and child in his unbalanced state of mind, his mother-in-law thought it advisable, after his release from the sanitarium, to take him into her home. She is caretaker of the New York Conservatory of Music building. Stumps was born in Germany.

When she went to the room of her son-in-law to arouse him yesterday, she found him hanging by the cord from the bedposts. She called Julian Ruddy, a music instructor in the building, who summoned Dr. Abraham Needles of St. Lawrence Hospital. He pronounced him

CONCERT CALENDAR

Music by d'Indy and Mr. Hofmann as Pianist at the Symphony Concerts of Next Week — Rakhmaninov's Return—Choral Pieces at Symphony Hall—Mme. Leginska and Mr. Rosen

TWO names unknown for several years to the programmes of the Symphony Concerts reappear on that arranged for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Mr. d'Indy's and Mr. Hofmann's. Warmly disposed as Dr. Muck was to French composers, he took umbrage at an article in an American weekly newspaper in which Mr. d'Indy affirmed in bitter words that German conductors in the United States excluded French pieces from their concerts. In general the assertion was not true; in particular it was unjust to the conductors for years past of the Boston Orchestra; it so provoked Dr. Muck that while hitherto he had not overlooked d'Indy's music, he denied it further place on his programmes—manifestly perverse reasoning since the quality and the interest of the composer's pieces had nothing to do with his errors of statement as essayist and propagandist. Next week Mr. Rabaud will restore d'Indy to just place in the scheme of the Symphony Concerts, but with one of his early pieces in which he was much under Wagnerian influence, viz.: The symphonic trilogy suggested by Schiller's three plays of Wallenstein. The first of the pieces pictures the colorful tumults of the camp of Wallenstein's army; the second sings the loves of Max and Thekla as Schiller has embroidered them upon "Die Piccolomini"; the third recounts in tones the death of Wallenstein.

The other returning name is that of Mr. Hofmann unheard as pianist for five years with the Symphony Orchestra because of differences with conductor and management which it is not necessary to recall. The more will a public that has long missed him welcome to the place as "assisting artist" that he richly deserves. He will play the piano part in Chopin's concerto in E minor, a piece that he cherishes, upon which he has spent tireless pains and which he has now brought to nearly perfect performance. The third and final item of Mr. Rabaud's list is Berlioz's youthful overture to Shakspeare's tragedy, "King Lear." For the first time, thus, in Boston the conductor has drawn a programme without a symphony.

AMERICAN DECEMBER

BONNET SKILFUL AT IMPRESSIVE SYMPHONY

French Organist Makes Debut With Boston Organization; Rabaud Artistic

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Joseph Bonnet, since the death of Guilmant, the acknowledged leader of French organists, made his debut with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon, when he played the organ part of Guilmant's majestic symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra.

This big work hasn't been performed in Boston for some fifteen years, and at its performance then under Gericke, Wallace Goodrich officiated at the organ.

Bonnet has given several recitals in this city within a year, and only confirmed yesterday the high opinion of his skill at his chosen instrument. The symphony itself is big in scope, impressive—sometimes ponderous. It was played with keen sympathy by Monsieur Rabaud and his men.

Rabaud was unfamiliar with American composers when he arrived in Boston to conduct our orchestra. He has made the acquaintance of Frederick S. Converse and played his "Mystic Trumpeter" yesterday. This is one of the lasting contributions to orchestral music made by American composers. It has been appearing regularly upon symphony programs during the past dozen years and each time makes a more profound impression. Rabaud apparently found it to his liking for he gave it a spirited performance. The program opened with the graceful and dainty and ever-refreshing eighth symphony of Beethoven.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 8 1918

Henri Rabaud, New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Creates Impression That He Is a Leader of Unusual Gifts. Writer Says He Will Fill Long Vacant Niche in Gallery of Baton Wielders.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra has apparently landed right side up after the always perilous leap of selecting a new conductor, judging by the impression Henri Rabaud made here at his debut last Monday evening. His success was emphatic, even if it was not of the sensational variety. His audience, a smaller band than the good things of the occasion warranted, seemed to like his work immensely. And the reviewers with almost perfect unanimity saw in him a leader of unusual gifts.

It is the present writer's opinion that Rabaud is destined to become one of the most popular conductors we have over here. With a few days to think matters over, he wonders mildly why there was not more of the element of excitement about the successful first appearance last Monday night. However, a little reflection makes the reason evident. You need time to appreciate Rabaud's personality. He is essentially modest and self-effacing. There is nothing about him that approximates even remotely the sensational. He seems to approach the conductor's desk almost with diffidence, and it strikes you that perhaps nothing could have got him out before an audience except love and veneration for the music he is to interpret and the feeling that to put its message before the people is the justification for his presence in a conspicuous role.

That type of man does not perhaps win the tumultous applause of the dazzling moment, but it is a type eminently calculated to grow upon us and at last to be accepted with a sort of admiring affection, which the more spectacular hero can never hope to duplicate. With this sort of talent there is little danger that we shall applaud in haste and repent at leisure. Once we have assessed it, we abide with perfect confidence in the valuation arrived at.

* * *

THE personality of the new conductor is what will most interest us in him. He will fill a long-vacant niche in the gallery of baton wielders whose statues and statuettes we are accustomed to scan. It will be somewhere near that where stands the effigy of Walter Damrosch, whom he most resembles among our own conductors. By that I mean that both men represent the result of long-ripened experience in their art and a kind of mellowed geniality that the years bring to steep art in. In this regard, Henri Rabaud will step into a place by himself among the conductors we hear from month to month in the regular course of events. This is not to say that he is better than any other conductor we know, but merely different. And variety is the life of art.

Some commentators remarked that Rabaud had the appearance of the scholar. This is true if we regard the term "scholar" as meaning one who strives for complete understanding. But with the word we often connote an aloofness from the affairs of everyday life and an emphasis on thinking rather than doing. This connotation will not at all fit the present case. For instance, in the prime affair of everyday life for the conductor, orchestral discipline, the new head of the Boston Symphony gave evidence that he is notably efficient. It is common testimony that the orchestra has very much improved its ensemble since it was heard here a few weeks ago. On this point the present scribe can have no opinion, since about the time of the first concert this season, the theory and practice of epidemic influenza was occupying most of his attention. But there was ample testimony offered last Monday night that Rabaud is an effective disciplinarian. The firm and often insistent beat, the whole-hearted attention of the players to their task, and, most important, the actual results achieved in shading and execution, proved that the conductor had established his authority over the orchestra and had secured the ungrudging co-operation of his men. One can foresee that the ensuing weeks will show a steady development of the orchestra's technique, and it is not too much to expect that he will bring it back to the former glories temporarily dimmed by the impact of culture upon kultur.

* * *

IN appearance, Mr. Rabaud does not suggest at all what is popularly regarded here as the type of Frenchman. In the first place, he is tall. Now, to our eyes, if a Frenchman is so exceptional as to allow himself to be tall, he should be ample in physique, like, for instance, the late Edouard Colonne. But Rabaud is spare in figure. Then, he wears a beard. That is quite allowable on general principles, but again the new conductor departs from our stock picture, for the beard is rather close-cropped. Nor is he vivacious in movement. He is deliberate, like a man very sure of what he wants to do and determined to accomplish it with the least possible fuss.

Perhaps so much has been said about his scholarly attributes, his maturity and his deliberateness, as to give the impression of a man in whom intellect holds more than its necessary sway of the artistic balance at the expense of the qualities of the heart and of elemental force. Nothing could be further from the truth. Of the purely emotional side of music he is a forceful exponent. Just as his intellectual side was demonstrated in the carefully articulated reading of, for instance, the first movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, so the sense of rhythm and the other instinctive attributes of musicianly feeling the things that lie at the bottom, are inexpressible in words, and really the most important—were exemplified in the graceful beauty of the allegretto, the rippling humor of the third movement, and, most of all, in the stirring close of the finale, where he found the material for more heroic outgivings than most conductors have realized.

* * *

IT SEEMS to me, however, that when Rabaud's eminence as a musician becomes generally recognized, as it must be, what will really turn the tide of public favor in his direction will be the qualities of his personality aside from his music. His predecessor offers the best illustration of what is meant on the principle of exceptions proving the rule. Dr. Muck commanded respect and admiration in the highest degree as a conductor, but he was never generally loved aside from these riches for himself alone.

There are always artists we admire but never feel we are getting close to, and others who send out across the footlights with their music a sense of their own humanity, which we seize upon and hold until we acquire an affection for the artist as well as for his music. In some cases, indeed, a pleasing personality will make up in our minds for shortcomings on the musical side.

The whole thing is summed up in a witty remark once made by a colleague who did not like quartet playing and heard a famous quartet being discussed. "It is to be praised loudly and snored at softly," he remarked. However much we feel inclined to praise the musicianship of an artist, he will leave us drowsy unless beyond and above his music there is something to be seized and cherished on the human side.

In the case of the Boston Symphony conductor there is such a "something," as there is in the case of the other conductors we hear and admire. And to make it valuable, it must be, as it is, a different "something" from what we find in every other case. As I have tried to indicate above, distilled essence of Rabaud would be a product warm and sparkling in color, firm and uniform in texture, and mellowed like old wine.

HERALD
ress Washington, D. C.
e

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given next Tuesday afternoon, December 3, is exciting unwonted interest and curiosity. At this concert the symphony patrons will hear the orchestra for the first time under its new permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud. The first concert of the season showed that the orchestra is the same instrument of wondrous beauty that it has been in past years.

In Washington, as in Boston and Cambridge, Mr. Rabaud opens his program with the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven, thus paying tribute at the very beginning to what he calls the "beauty of the classics." This symphony was composed in 1803-04, and it is said that the title page of the manuscript bore the word "Buonaparte." There seems to be no doubt that Napoleon, young conqueror, consul and enemy of kings, worked a spell over Beethoven.

In the second part of the program will be found two numbers. The first of these is the unfamiliar symphonic poem of Saint-Saens, entitled "The Youth of Hercules," and the second is Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant Caprice on Spanish themes.

STAR
Washington, D. C. om
dress
ate 8

CONCERTS, LECTURES, ETC.

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given Tuesday afternoon. At this concert the Symphony Orchestra will play for the first time under its new permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud.

Mr. Rabaud wil lopen his program with the "Eroica Symphony" of Beethoven, thus paying tribute to what he calls the "beauty of the classics." In the second part of the program will be found the unfamiliar symphonic poem of Saint-Saens entitled, "The Youth of Hercules," and the Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on Spanish Themes.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, DECEMBER 15

MUSIC NOTES

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening will bring to the city as soloist, Harold Bauer, the pianist, who already has made himself popular with audiences here. He was first introduced as a soloist in this country when he toured with the same orchestra on his first visit to this country in 1900, and his last appearance here was under the same auspices a few years ago. In deference to the now dominant French element in the orchestra he has chosen to play the concerto of Saint Saens in C-minor, which is considered one of the French composer's most brilliant scores, not only difficult but requiring the lightning dexterity in which the pianist excels.

Before then there will be an event of interest to Providence musicians. This is the meeting in Froebel Hall to-morrow afternoon at 4 o'clock of the Rhode Island branch of the American Friends of Music in France.

As a part of the Advent campaign in the Episcopal churches for the deepening of the spiritual life, there will be a half-hour of music this afternoon after the service at 4:30 o'clock at St. Martin's Church on Orchard avenue. The programme will be chiefly French. Miss Blanche Natalie Davis, organist of the church, will play and Master William J. Smith, soprano soloist of the Church of the Epiphany, will sing Caesar Franck's "Panis Angelicus."

Miss Helen Hogan will continue her series of organ recitals this afternoon at the Central Congregational Church,

Harold Bauer
Pianist Who Will Play at the Boston Symphony Concert Dec. 17.

and during the week there will be some preliminary Christmas music. Of this nature will be the annual Christmas musicale which Miss Evangeline Larry will give for her pupils on Friday evening at 8 o'clock at her studio, 11 and 12 Andrews building, when Miss Edith Gyllenberg will assist at the piano.

* * *

The programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening will provide what the Boston Transcript calls a favorite formula of the conductor, Henri Rabaud, two symphonies with a middle piece between. This time it will consist of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Saint-Saens concerto in C-minor. The Beethoven Symphony has been described as the spontaneous expression of a happy mood of the composer. It was written the same year as the seventh, which was played by the orchestra at the last concert. The Schubert Symphony consists of two movements, allegro moderato and andante con moto, with nine bars of a scherzo. No more of it has ever been found, and to this day musicians wonder why Schubert abandoned it, so beautiful is it in ideas and so perfect in form. Schubert died in 1828, and the first page of the score is dated 1822. It remained unknown for 45 years, and was neither published nor performed until 1867. Since that time it has constantly increased in favor with music lovers, and has been received with enthusiasm whenever it has been played here.

Mr. Rabaud has won favorable mention not only in the East and South, but in New York, which has a way of considering itself the last word in criticism

RECORD, DECEMBER 20

NOTED ARTISTS ARE COMING FOR CONCERTS HERE

By J. V. CLARK

The oldest concert goers can with difficulty remember a season when there was less activity in the musical world than this season. There have been the regular Symphony concerts and the Sunday afternoon concerts, but after that, practically nothing. There has been no opera, and perhaps there will be no opera. There have practically been no week day concerts or musical events of any kind by secondary artists. The war tax has had much to do with the inactivity.

Now after a period marked by few offerings there will be renewed interest in the musical world. Although concerts will presumably not be more numerous for the next three months than for the last, they will be given by more interesting artists. Possibly quality will take the place of quantity.

Tomorrow Josef Hoffmann, the pianist, will appear as the Symphony soloist. He will play Chopin's concerto in E minor. D'Indy's "Wallenstein" and Berlioz's "King Lear" overture make up the program.

"Messiah" for Christmas

On Sunday at Symphony Hall the Handel and Haydn Society will sing "The Messiah." This annual Christmas performance will follow familiar lines. Mr. Mollenhauer will conduct the performance, which will require the services of a chorus of 400, an orchestra of Symphony men and these soloists, Mabel Garrison, soprano, Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Arthur Middleton, bass.

For the Symphony concerts of next week Mischa Levitzki, the young pianist, will be the soloist. He has rapidly come to the front. Easily one of the most interesting of the younger pianist his performance is anticipated. He will play the sparkling G minor concerto of Saint-Saens. On the program will also stand "La Procession Nocturne" by Rabaud, the present Symphony composer, and Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor.

On Monday afternoon, Dec. 20, and Tuesday evening, Dec. 31, there will be a special victory performance of the Symphony. For this performance the tickets for the first concert of the season—the first pair of concerts cancelled by the influenza epidemic, will be used.

MONITOR DECEMBER 2

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, eighth concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, Boston, afternoon of Dec. 27, 1918; Mischa Levitzki, soloist. The program: Schumann, symphony No. 4 in D minor, op. 120; Rabaud, "La Procession Nocturne," symphonic poem, after Lenau (first time at these concerts); Saint-Saëns, concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Boston has the opportunity during the incumbency of Mr. Rabaud to study the gentle art of program making under a master. Never too long to tire the hearers, with contrast in plenty, with enough new things to keep interest eager, with a fresh viewpoint postulated on the old things, they offer musical entertainment ideally luxurious. Such a program was the eighth of the present season and in addition to its individual merit as a program it added interest both in that for the first time the conductor appeared as composer and the soloist stirred his hearers into gratified and noisy acknowledgment of his success. If ever an audience sat back and seemed to say: "All right. Now show us what you can do," when a soloist appeared before it, it was the one of Friday afternoon. If ever a soloist coolly accepted a challenge and thoroughly succeeded in "showing" his audience, it was Mr. Levitzki. Of course, he had the help first of a most gracious piece of writing in the Saint-Saëns second concerto, second of a facile and accommodating conductor, and third of an interested and wholly sympathetic band of players. Even so, the major part of the task was for Mr. Levitzki's fingers to accomplish. Nimble and obedient, they performed their task in satisfying fashion. True, the eagerness of the player caused their nimbleness at times to endanger the rhythm, and his intentness on the task in hand obscured the glance he should more often have lifted to the conductor. With experience, however, will come the poise, and meanwhile the beauty of tone is beyond cavil.

Mr. Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" is probably as compact, unified, and scholarly a bit of writing in the modern idiom as has ever been heard at these concerts. It takes but a few bars to establish the mood and the desired atmosphere envelopes even the plodding little ecclesiastical procession, coloring the quasi-Gregorian strains of the chant, and after this dies away lingering unobtrusively so that one involuntarily listens to catch an echo of the procession's measured tread.

The third "Leonora" overture, ordinarily crammed with snap and go, seemed listless and even ragged. It likewise illustrated Mr. Rabaud's over-

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 21

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. HOFMANN AFTER FIVE YEARS OF EXILE

A Warm Reception for the Pianist, and a Wellnigh Perfect Performance of Chopin's Concerto in F Minor—D'Indy, Likewise, Welcomed Back in His Graphic, Eloquent Music of "Wallenstein" — The Berlioz of "Lear" for Postlude

YESTERDAY afternoon, for the first time in five years, almost to a day, Mr. Hofmann, the pianist, sat beside the Symphony Orchestra in its own concert-room. Twice before this season he had played with it—once at Cambridge, once in Brooklyn; yet this coming to Symphony Hall may stand as the visible sign of the healing of the long breach between them. Into the causes of the estrangement, into the rights and the wrongs of the high contending parties, it were unprofitable to inquire, since such inquisitive expeditions are usually less illuminating than amusing. Neutral at first, because of evidence to its own ears, the public of the Symphony Concerts has gradually inclined to the pianist, because with the mounting years of absence and his no less ascendant fame as pianist, it missed him more and more. Seemingly the audience of Friday sought to indicate this feeling by the heartiness of the applause it began to bestow upon the pianist as soon as he came into view and that, through two or three minutes, kept him standing by the piano. At each pause in his concerto, it renewed these plaudits, while at the end, it warmly and more than once recalled him. Mr. Hofmann, usually open in his moods toward an audience, did not hide his pleasure in this reception and these rewards. In fact, as though to release it by proxy, he shook heartily the hand of Mr. Rabaud who, if the truth must be told, had returned him no more than a faithful, accurate but inflexible accompaniment. In all these proceedings, except the hand-shaking, the orchestra joined, as it has heretofore when singer or virtuoso has assisted it—a detail of etiquette in the concert-hall about which there are two opinions, either debatable.

Mr. Hofmann's concerto was Chopin's in F minor, music of which he has long been fond, upon which he has spent endless study and pains, and which he now brings to as perfect performance as is, probably possible to human hand, brain, and imagination. Like its fellow in E minor, this concerto is purely a pianistic music, which is to say that Chopin uses the orchestra merely as the complement of a design in which he worked none too easily, none too fruitfully. Perhaps, for that reason, neither concerto rises so high in poetizing imagination, passion of mood, eloquence of expression, as many of his solo pieces. From beginning to end—and the lengths are considerable unless a masterly and sympathetic pianist glamour them—this concerto in F minor primarily displays the beauties, the subtleties, under many an election, of the voice of the piano and similarly reveals the musician and the virtuoso sitting before it. To say these things is not to diminish a whit the bright charm, the light rhythms, the sparkling pace, the dance-like returns of the Rondo- Finale; or to lessen the sentimental grace of the songful Larghetto, the gradual intensifying of tender mood that deepens it; or to detract from the large plan, the warm speech, the zest of fanciful ornament in the long Maestoso of the first movement. The classical rather than the romantic Chopin fashioned the two concertos, fashioned them less—it is easy to suspect by the records—from imperative impulse to such expression than from utility to him as tools of trade, especially in a day when a pianist could play a single movement of such a piece unquestioned and applauded. In it or in the whole concerto, the audience expected a display of the pianist's skill not merely in the range and fluency of his technical means, as such things went ninety years ago, but of his graces of tone, his elegance in ornament, his play of sentiment and taste. It asked also from his hand like revelation of the finer attributes of the piano itself.

The more, then, does this concerto in F minor minister to many of Mr. Hofmann's distinctive abilities. With much of the music that he plays, it is altogether reasonable to debate his interpretive powers; to assert that he is cerebral rather than impassioned, to deny him ardor of imagination, to question his choice of pace, his distribution of light and shade; to hold or not to hold with his musical designing. On the other hand, there is no debating Mr. Hofmann's command of the voice of the piano. With it, seemingly, in this, his golden noon, he has gone as far, fully and finely as mortal musician and virtuoso may go. There is none to excel him in limpidity, in smoothness, in roundness of tone, in the graduation, in the coloring of it. Endless and endlessly divided, sub-divided, blended, parted, measured are the tints of his palette of the piano, as endless and apt is the range of touch that measures volume, orders force. It is hard to imagine a tone more luminous, transparent, iridescent, disembodied than his—a veritable ærial music though the pianist sit earthbound in a concert room. No pianist, likewise, excels him in felicity of ornament. His runs purl along their course like vaporous drops in sunshine, or are strung as evenly as matched pearls; his staccati glint without a trace of hardness; his chords are beautifully sonorous and rounded, his arpeggii woo the ear, and so forth through the whole range of the purely pianistic graces. Master is he, also, of the discerning mind, the delicate finger, the imaginative touch, that winds these ornaments in garlands about the main stem of the music or sets them spreading like fine tendrils from it. His taste in touch, tone, song, arabesque, is unerring unless it be when some seated idiosyncracy or passing impulse bids him accent a phrase, a detail beyond the seeming implication of the music itself. As flawless is his elegance of handling, as just his sentiment, as sensitive his style as he pursues his way through the music. How an eighteenth-century of Burneys and like listening connoisseurs would applaud him in this concerto of Chopin!

In due place and with flowing ease all these signal and distinctive qualities shone with gentle radiance out of Mr. Hofmann's performance yesterday. Grace of line and point of rhythm went hand in hand through the mazurka-like Rondo. How spirited the progress of the music, yet with what adroit modulations of pace and emphasis, what exquisite moulding and fusing of the phrases! The lightness of it was like a tonal champagne when soft glows also traverse it. Before had come the Larghetto—all delicate loveliness of line, jewelled with ornament, flecked by fancy, touched with chaste sentiment, the distilled essence of music as beauty of sound animated, enriched by beauty of feeling. The sheer lustre of the pianist's tone was sensuous delight. There are passages in the long first movement in which Chopin seems a little pedantic, somewhat too expository, audibly inclined to music-making for his own particular satisfactions rather than for the general pleasure of the audience. The variety of Mr. Hofmann's touch, the glamours of his tone, the purity and fineness of his articulation cloaked them. Again, in this Maestoso, there are measures in which Chopin would be sonorous, expansive, even grandiose in the fashion of his day and of Hummel's. In the year 1918 of musical grace when the thunders of Liszt are but distant rumblings beside, say, the earthquakes of Prokofiev, these passages may easily sound them, out-moded, futile. They must be saved by such adroit proportioning of tonal volume, of progressive emphasis as that with which Mr. Hofmann and adjusted them to the music out of which they rise, into which they descend. A finer stylistic perception, a more acute stylistic discretion, it would be hard to imagine. For the rest, the exacting "passage-work" fell like spun-silk from the pianist's fingers; while his and Chopin's song was as spell of fancy upon the ear, the magical music with which a dreaming Shakspeare filled Prospero's isle. An Ariel-Hofmann, negation of sprites as the pianist is in the flesh, sounded it.

Romantical music from French composers, as far removed in time and quality as d'Indy and Berlioz, filled the rest of Mr. Rabaud's programme. Long, indeed, has it been, unjustly and mistakenly long, since d'Indy's voice has been heard at a Symphony Concert; yet as the ironies of things would have it, the piece out of which it sounded had been brought to them by the very conductor who willed the war-time exclusion. Irony, too, was the fact that bitter in these days beyond other French composers, as d'Indy has been toward the Germans, he was in the seventies and eighties making this music of "Wallenstein" out of Schiller's play and in the process remembering sundry measures written by one, Richard Wagner. The "triology," however, is none the worse for these imitative passages and if we may not have "The Niebelung's Ring," it is at least pleasant to glimpse it momentarily recalled. Moreover, this pictorial music of Wallenstein's camp, this shadowed and passioned music of the love of Max and Thekla in "Die Piccolomini" this grave, stern, yet glorifying music of Wallenstein's death is quite able to stand upon its own interest, illusion, worth.

The tumult of the camp, the licentious waltz, the monk's sermon mocked and travestied, the sudden interposition of the mighty tonal presence of Wallenstein rise graphically from d'Indy's pages, rose vividly from the strenuous performance of Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra. In those young days d'Indy had a zest for such music that subsequent austerities of mind, heart, creative theory and practice have dulled; yet even in these young years he is characteristically scrupulous, throughout the "trilogy," to write a close-knit music, and romantic no less, with appropriate means. There is more hint in the tonal passion of Max and Thekla of the grave and sombre beauty of mood, means, expression, of which the mature d'Indy has long been master. It is as though the lovers stood embraced in their motives for the blows of that other motive of fate to smite them—a fate that the motive of Wallenstein seems also to propel. Again, a d'Indy already imaginative with dramatic tonal design. In turn, the d'Indy of large, stately, noble utterance, upswelling from quelled tumult, speaks out of the music of Wallenstein's death, especially in the final measures that are as apotheosis to Schiller's chieftain. A young hand, but a ripening mind and a quickening imagination wrote this "trilogy" and wrote also a music easier of comprehension by an audience, more stirring to it, than at least one symphony and a tone-poem or two of d'Indy's later days. Corresponding was the response, the reward of yesterday.

Berlioz of the overture to Shakspeare's play, "King Lear," ended the concert and again, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra laid on and spared not in a fashion that might alarm for its future sundry connoisseurs of delicate, anxious ears. Yet is there any other way to play this romantically rampageous, this highly intensified music of a Berlioz excited by Shakspeare, by creative impulse, by his premonitions of effect upon his audience? D'Indy's "trilogy" is full voiced, warmly colored, imaginatively ardent; yet how exact in the degree to which music may attain exactness, is his picturing of the camp; how clear-spoken, and therefore the more poignant, the loves and fate of Max and Thekla; how graphically tragic the death and the glory of Wallenstein! In comparison—or rather in contrast—Berlioz is but "wrought up" in general over the tragedy of Lear, over Shakspearean eloquence, over the translation of both into tones. He writes a stormy music for a stormy tragedy, a music of vivid contrasts, of sharp transitions, as indeed goes Shakspeare's play. He embodies in tones a large impression, a generalized reaction, but the hearer listens almost in vain, unless he has uncommonly susceptible imagination, for the tread of Lear, for Cordelia's voice soft and low, for the ravings of the heath, for the pain and pity of blinded Gloster. Romantic sound and fury, passionate, if the hearer will, wreaking itself through period after period, relieving itself by occasional contrast, fills this overture of Berlioz, as they fill many a poem, picture, novel of his wild day in the arts. Yet if he had entitled his piece, "Overture to Hugo's 'Hernani'" or "Prelude to Byron's 'Giaour'," is there ought in the implication of the music to deny such designation? First, last and all the time it is no more than romantical excitement bursting into tones.

H. T. P.

CONCERT CALENDAR

Mr. Rabaud's Next Programme with Music of His Own and Mr. Levitzki for Assisting Pianist—"The Messiah" in New Circumstance—The Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus Together—Rahkmaninov, Rosen, Seidel, Elman, McCormack and Mme. Lginska All in Prospect

IN the programme of the Symphony Concerts for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Rabaud has at last persuaded himself to include one of his own pieces—the tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne," suggested by the German verses of Lenau, profiting by Wagnerian example and characteristic of the composer-conductor in his earlier rather than his latter days. Two German classics likewise stand on the list—Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor, long unheard at Symphony Hall, since Dr. Muck seldom chose beyond the first and the second; and the third of Beethoven's "Leonore" overtures. The fourth item, though it falls in the middle of the programme, is Saint-Saëns's concerto for piano in G minor, in which Mr. Levitzki, the pianist, will play the solo part. Twice and thrice in recitals in Boston he has given proof of his admirable quality as young and expert pianist, young, intelligent and susceptible musician. It is a pleasure to find him called thus early to the Symphony Concerts. His deserts well warrant the invitation.

In its next "southern trip," the second week of January, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play:

In the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, on Monday evening, Jan. 6, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," Berlioz's overture to "King Lear," and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E Minor, with Mr. Fredric Fradkin, the new concertmaster, as soloist.

In the New National Theater, Washington, on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 7, D'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," and Mendelssohn's Concerto with Mr. Fradkin.

In the Lyric Theater, Baltimore, on Wednesday evening, Jan. 8, Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Mendelssohn's Concerto with Mr. Fradkin, a suite of English Sixteenth Century music arranged by Mr. Rabaud, and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole."

In Carnegie Hall, New York, on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, D'Indy's "Wallenstein," Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," the old English suite, and Berlioz's "King Lear."

In the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday evening, Jan. 10, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphony "Antar," Mendelssohn's Concerto with Mr. Fradkin, and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole."

In Carnegie Hall, New York, Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne," Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," [illegible]n's "Leonore" overture

Sunday afternoon, Jan. 5, in Symphony Hall, a concert by Mr. McCormack, the tenor, heard gladly by all sorts and conditions of listeners and deservedly so. According to his present practice, an air from opera or oratorio; classic songs to English texts; Irish folk-pieces and patriotic or sentimental balladry will fill his programme.

Monday afternoon, Dec. 30, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus, to replace that of Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, omitted by reason of the epidemic of influenza. The present concert will "celebrate the close of the year of victory," with the national anthems of the United States, Belgium, Britain, Italy and France; Bizet's overture, "Patrie"; a suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from English music of the days of Elizabeth; and for choral pieces a Te Deum by Verdi; Franck's setting of Psalm CL; and Mr. Chadwick's hymn to America, "Land of Our Hearts." Seemingly all three of these pieces are new in performance to Boston.

Tuesday evening, Dec. 31, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus, to replace that of Saturday evening, Oct. 12, omitted by reason of the epidemic of influenza. The programme is that above specified.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, DECEMBER 15

MUSIC NOTES

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening will bring to the city as soloist, Harold Bauer, the pianist, who already has made himself popular with audiences here. He was first introduced as a soloist in this country when he toured with the same orchestra on his first visit to this country in 1900, and his last appearance here was under the same auspices a few years ago. In deference to the now dominant French element in the orchestra he has chosen to play the concerto of Saint Saens in C-minor, which is considered one of the French composer's most brilliant scores, not only difficult but requiring the lightning dexterity in which the pianist excels.

Before then there will be an event of interest to Providence musicians. This is the meeting in Froebel Hall to-morrow afternoon at 4 o'clock of the Rhode Island branch of the American Friends of Music in France.

As a part of the Advent campaign in the Episcopal churches for the deepening of the spiritual life, there will be a half-hour of music this afternoon after the service at 4:30 o'clock at St. Martin's Church on Orchard avenue. The programme will be chiefly French. Miss Blanche Natalie Davis, organist of the church, will play and Master William J. Smith, soprano soloist of the Church of the Epiphany, will sing Caesar Franck's "Panis Angelicus."

Miss Helen Hogan will continue her series of organ recitals this afternoon at the Central Congregational Church,

Harold Bauer
Pianist Who Will Play at the Boston Symphony Concert Dec. 17.

and during the week there will be some preliminary Christmas music. Of this nature will be the annual Christmas musicale which Miss Evangeline Larry will give for her pupils on Friday evening at 8 o'clock at her studio, 11 and 12 Andrews building, when Miss Edith Gyllenberg will assist at the piano.

* * *

The programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening will provide what the Boston Transcript calls a favorite formula of the conductor, Henri Rabaud, two symphonies with a middle piece between. This time it will consist of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Saint-Saens concerto in C-minor. The Beethoven Symphony has been described as the spontaneous expression of a happy mood of the composer. It was written the same year as the seventh, which was played by the orchestra at the last concert. The Schubert Symphony consists of two movements, allegro moderato and andante con moto, with nine bars of a scherzo. No more of it has ever been found, and to this day musicians wonder why Schubert abandoned it, so beautiful is it in ideas and so perfect in form. Schubert died in 1828, and the first page of the score is dated 1822. It remained unknown for 45 years, and was neither published nor performed until 1867. Since that time it has constantly increased in favor with music lovers, and has been received with enthusiasm whenever it has been played here.

Mr. Rabaud has won favorable mention not only in the East and South, but in New York, which has a way of considering itself the last word in criticism.

RECORD, DECEMBER 20

NOTED ARTISTS ARE COMING FOR CONCERTS HERE

By J. V. CLARK

The oldest concert goers can with difficulty remember a season when there was less activity in the musical world than this season. There have been the regular Symphony concerts and the Sunday afternoon concerts, but after that, practically nothing. There has been no opera, and perhaps there will be no opera. There have practically been no week day concerts or musical events of any kind by second ary artists. The war tax has had much to do with the inactivity.

Now after a period marked by few offerings there will be renewed interest in the musical world. Although concerts will presumably not be more numerous for the next three months than for the last, they will be given by most interesting artists. Possibly quality will take the place of quantity.

Tomorrow Josef Hoffmann, the pianist, will appear as the Symphony soloist. He will play Chopin's concerto in E minor. D'Indy's "Wallenstein" and Berlioz's "King Lear" overture make up the program.

"Messiah" for Christmas

On Sunday at Symphony Hall the Handel and Haydn Society will sing "The Messiah." This annual Christmas performance will follow familiar lines. Mr. Mollenhauer will conduct the performance, which will require the services of a chorus of 400, an orchestra of Symphony men and these soloists. Mabel Garrison, soprano, Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Arthur Middleton, bass.

For the Symphony concerts of next week Mischa Levitzki, the young pianist, will be the soloist. He has rapidly come to the front. Easily one of the most interesting of the younger pianist his performance is anticipated. He will play the sparkling G minor concerto of Saint-Saens. On the program will also stand "La Procession Nocturne" by Rabaud, the present Symphony composer, and Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor.

On Monday afternoon, Dec. 20, and Tuesday evening, Dec. 31, there will be a special victory performance of the Symphony. For this performance the tickets for the first concert of the season—the first pair of concerts cancelled by the influenza epidemic, will be used.

MONITOR DECEMBER 2

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, eighth concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, Boston, afternoon of Dec. 27, 1918; Mischa Levitzki, soloist. The program: Schumann, symphony No. 4 in D minor, op. 120; Rabaud, "La Procession Nocturne," symphonic poem, after Lenau (first time at these concerts); Saint-Saëns, concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Boston has the opportunity during the incumbency of Mr. Rabaud to study the gentle art of program making under a master. Never too long to tire the hearers, with contrast in plenty, with enough new things to keep interest eager, with a fresh viewpoint postulated on the old things, they offer musical entertainment ideally luxurious. Such a program was the eighth of the present season and in addition to its individual merit as a program it added interest both in that for the first time the conductor appeared as composer and the soloist stirred his hearers into gratified and noisy acknowledgment of his success. If ever an audience sat back and seemed to say: "All right. Now show us what you can do," when a soloist appeared before it, it was the one of Friday afternoon. If ever a soloist coolly accepted a challenge and thoroughly succeeded in "showing" his audience, it was Mr. Levitzki. Of course, he had the help first of a most gracious piece of writing in the Saint-Saëns second concerto, second of a facile and accommodating conductor, and third of an interested and wholly sympathetic band of players. Even so, the major part of the task was for Mr. Levitzki's fingers to accomplish. Nimble and obedient, they performed their task in satisfying fashion. True, the eagerness of the player caused their nimbleness at times to endanger the rhythm, and his intentness on the task in hand obscured the glance he should more often have lifted to the conductor. With experience, however, will come the poise, and meanwhile the beauty of tone is beyond cavil.

Mr. Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" is probably as compact, unified, and scholarly a bit of writing in the modern idiom as has ever been heard at these concerts. It takes but a few bars to establish the mood and the desired atmosphere envelopes even the plodding little ecclesiastical procession, coloring the quasi-Gregorian strains of the chant, and after this dies away lingering unobtrusively so that one involuntarily listens to catch an echo of the procession's measured tread.

The third "Leonora" overture, ordinarily crammed with snap and go, seemed listless and even ragged. It likewise illustrated Mr. Rabaud's overfondness for the blare of the brasses [illegible] orchestral [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 21

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. HOFMANN AFTER FIVE YEARS OF EXILE

A Warm Reception for the Pianist, and a Wellnigh Perfect Performance of Chopin's Concerto in F Minor—D'Indy, Likewise, Welcomed Back in His Graphic, Eloquent Music of "Wallenstein" — The Berlioz of "Lear" for Postlude

YESTERDAY afternoon, for the first time in five years, almost to a day, Mr. Hofmann, the pianist, sat beside the Symphony Orchestra in its own concert-room. Twice before this season he had played with it—once at Cambridge, once in Brooklyn; yet this coming to Symphony Hall may stand as the visible sign of the healing of the long breach between them. Into the causes of the estrangement, into the rights and the wrongs of the high contending parties, it were unprofitable to inquire, since such inquisitive expeditions are usually less illuminating than amusing. Neutral at first, because of evidence to its own ears, the public of the Symphony Concerts has gradually inclined to the pianist, because with the mounting years of absence and his no less ascendant fame as pianist, it missed him more and more. Seemingly the audience of Friday sought to indicate this feeling by the heartiness of the applause it began to bestow upon the pianist as soon as he came into view and that, through two or three minutes, kept him standing by the piano. At each pause in his concerto, it renewed these plaudits, while at the end, it warmly and more than once recalled him. Mr. Hofmann, usually open in his moods toward an audience, did not hide his pleasure in this reception and these rewards. In fact, as though to release it by proxy, he shook heartily the hand of Mr. Rabaud who, if the truth must be told, had returned him no more than a faithful, accurate but inflexible accompaniment. In all these proceedings, except the hand-shaking, the orchestra joined, as it has heretofore when singer or virtuoso has assisted it—a detail of etiquette in the concert-hall about which there are two opinions, either debatable.

Mr. Hofmann's concerto was Chopin's in F minor, music of which he has long been fond, upon which he has spent endless study and pains, and which he now brings to as perfect performance as is, probably possible to human hand, brain, and imagination. Like its fellow in E minor, this concerto is purely a pianistic music, which is to say that Chopin uses the orchestra merely as the complement of a design in which he worked none too easily, none too fruitfully. Perhaps, for that reason, neither concerto rises so high in poetizing imagination, passion of mood, eloquence of expression, as many of his solo pieces. From beginning to end—and the lengths are considerable unless a masterly and sympathetic pianist glamour them—this concerto in F minor primarily displays the beauties, the subtleties, under many an affection, of the voice of the piano and similarly reveals the musician and the virtuoso sitting before it. To say these things is not to diminish a whit the bright charm, the light rhythms, the sparkling pace, the dance-like returns of the Rondo- Finale; or to lessen the sentimental grace of the songful Larghetto, the gradual intensifying of tender mood that deepens it; or to detract from the large plan, the warm speech, the zest of fanciful ornament in the long Maestoso of the first movement. The classical rather than the romantic Chopin fashioned the two concertos, fashioned them less—it is easy to suspect by the records—from imperative impulse to such expression than from utility to him as tools of trade, especially in a day when a pianist could play a single movement of such a piece unquestioned and applauded. In it or in the whole concerto, the audience expected a display of the pianist's skill not merely in the range and fluency of his technical means, as such things went ninety years ago, but of his graces of tone, his elegance in ornament, his play of sentiment and taste. It asked also from his hand like revelation of the finer attributes of the piano itself.

The more, then, does this concerto in F minor minister to many of Mr. Hofmann's distinctive abilities. With much of the music that he plays, it is altogether reasonable to debate his interpretive powers; to assert that he is cerebral rather than impassioned, to deny him ardor of imagination, to question his choice of pace, his distribution of light and shade; to hold or not to hold with his musical designing. On the other hand, there is no debating Mr. Hofmann's command of the voice of the piano. With it, seemingly, in this, his golden noon, he has gone as far, fully and finely as mortal musician and virtuoso may go. There is none to excel him in limpidity, in smoothness, in roundness of tone, in the graduation, in the coloring of it. Endless and endlessly divided, sub-divided, blended, parted, measured are the tints of his palette of the piano, as endless and apt is the range of touch that measures volume, orders force. It is hard to imagine a tone more luminous, transparent, iridescent, disembodied than his—a veritable ærial music though the pianist sit earth-bound in a concert room. No pianist, likewise, excels him in felicity of ornament. His runs purl along their course like vaporous drops in sunshine, or are strung as evenly as matched pearls; his staccati glint without a trace of hardness; his chords are beautifully sonorous and rounded, his arpeggii woo the ear, and so forth through the whole range of the purely pianistic graces. Master is he, also, of the discerning mind, the delicate finger, the imaginative touch, that winds these ornaments in garlands about the main stem of the music or sets them spreading like fine tendrils from it. His taste in touch, tone, song, arabesque, is unerring unless it be when some seated idiosyncracy or passing impulse bids him accent a phrase, a detail beyond the seeming implication of the music itself. As flawless is his elegance of handling, as just his sentiment, as sensitive his style as he pursues his way through the music. How an eighteenth-century of Burneys and like listening connoisseurs would applaud him in this concerto of Chopin!

In due place and with flowing ease all these signal and distinctive qualities shone with gentle radiance out of Mr. Hofmann's performance yesterday. Grace of line and point of rhythm went hand in hand through the mazurka-like Rondo. How spirited the progress of the music, yet with what adroit modulations of pace and emphasis, what exquisite moulding and fusing of the phrases! The lightness of it was like a tonal champagne when soft glows also traverse it. Before had come the Larghetto—all delicate loveliness of line, jewelled with ornament, flecked by fancy, touched with chaste sentiment, the distilled essence of music as beauty of sound animated, enriched by beauty of feeling. The sheer lustre of the pianist's tone was sensuous delight. There are passages in the long first movement in which Chopin seems a little pedantic, somewhat too expository, audibly inclined to music-making for his own particular satisfactions rather than for the general pleasure of the audience. The variety of Mr. Hofmann's touch, the glamours of his tone, the purity and fineness of his articulation cloaked them. Again, in this Maestoso, there are measures in which Chopin would be sonorous, expansive, even grandiose in the fashion of his day and of Hummel's. In the year 1918 of musical grace when the thunders of Liszt are but distant rumblings beside, say, the earthquakes of Prokoflev, these passages may easily sound them, out-moded, futile. They must be saved by such adroit proportioning of tonal volume, of progressive emphasis as that with which Mr. Hofmann and adjusted them to the music out of which they rise, into which they descend. A finer stylistic perception, a more acute stylistic discretion, it would be hard to imagine. For the rest, the exacting "passage-work" fell like spun-silk from the pianist's fingers; while his and Chopin's song was as spell of fancy upon the ear, the magical music with which a dreaming Shakspeare filled Prospero's isle. An Ariel-Hofmann, negation of sprites as the pianist is in the flesh, sounded it.

Romantical music from French composers, as far removed in time and quality as d'Indy and Berlioz, filled the rest of Mr. Rabaud's programme. Long, indeed, has it been, unjustly and mistakenly long, since d'Indy's voice has been heard at a Symphony Concert; yet as the ironies of things would have it, the piece out of which it sounded had been brought to them by the very conductor who willed the war-time exclusion. Irony, too, was the fact that bitter in these days beyond other French composers, as d'Indy has been toward the Germans, he was in the seventies and eighties making this music of "Wallenstein" out of Schiller's play and in the process remembering sundry measures written by one, Richard Wagner. The "triology," however, is none the worse for these imitative passages and if we may not have "The Niebelung's Ring," it is at least pleasant to glimpse it momentarily recalled. Moreover, this pictorial music of Wallenstein's camp, this shadowed and passioned music of the love of Max and Thekla in "Die Piccolomini" this grave, stern, yet glorifying music of Wallenstein's death is quite able to stand upon its own interest, illusion, worth.

The tumult of the camp, the licentious waltz, the monk's sermon mocked and travestied, the sudden interposition of the mighty tonal presence of Wallenstein rise graphically from d'Indy's pages, rose vividly from the strenuous performance of Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra. In those young days d'Indy had a zest for such music that subsequent austerities of mind, heart, creative theory and practice have dulled; yet even in these young years he is characteristically scrupulous, throughout the "trilogy," to write a close-knit music, and ready no less, with appropriate means. There is more hint in the tonal passion of Max and Thekla of the grave and sombre beauty of mood, means, expression, of which the mature d'Indy has long been master. It is as though the lovers stood embraced in their motives for the blows of that other motive of fate to smite them—a fate that the motive of Wallenstein seems also to propel. Again, a d'Indy already imaginative with dramatic tonal design. In turn, the d'Indy of large, stately, noble utterance, upswelling from quelled tumult, speaks out of the music of Wallenstein's death, especially in the final measures that are as apotheosis to Schiller's chieftain. A young hand, but a ripening mind and a quickening imagination wrote this "trilogy" and wrote also a music easier of comprehension by an audience, more stirring to it, than at least one symphony and a tone-poem or two of d'Indy's later days. Corresponding was the response, the reward of yesterday.

Berlioz of the overture to Shakspeare's play, "King Lear," ended the concert and again, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra laid on and spared not in a fashion that might alarm for its future sundry connoisseurs of delicate, anxious ears. Yet is there any other way to play this romantically rampageous, this highly intensified music of a Berlioz excited by Shakspeare, by creative impulse, by his premonitions of effect upon his audience? D'Indy's "trilogy" is full voiced, warmly colored, imaginatively ardent; yet how exact in the degree to which music may attain exactness, is his picturing of the camp; how clear-spoken, and therefore the more poignant, the loves and fate of Max and Thekla; how graphically tragic the death and the glory of Wallenstein! In comparison—or rather in contrast—Berlioz is but "wrought up" in general over the tragedy of Lear, over Shakspearean eloquence, over the translation of both into tones. He writes a stormy music for a stormy tragedy, a music of vivid contrasts, of sharp transitions, as indeed goes Shakspeare's play. He embodies in tones a large impression, a generalized reaction, but the hearer listens almost in vain, unless he has uncommonly susceptible imagination, for the tread of Lear, for Cordelia's voice soft and low, for the ravings of the heath, for the pain and pity of blinded Gloster. Romantic sound and fury, passionate, if the hearer will, wreaking itself through period after period, relieving itself by occasional contrast, fills this overture of Berlioz, as they fill many a poem, picture, novel of his wild day in the arts. Yet if he had entitled his piece, "Overture to Hugo's 'Hernani'" or "Prelude to Byron's 'Giaour'," is there ought in the implication of the music to deny such designation? First, last and all the time it is no more than romantical excitement bursting into tones.

H. T. P.

CONCERT CALENDAR

Mr. Rabaud's Next Programme with Music of His Own and Mr. Levitzki for Assisting Pianist—"The Messiah" in New Circumstance—The Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus Together—Rahkmaninov, Rosen, Seidel, Elman, McCormack and Mme. Lginska All in Prospect

IN the programme of the Symphony Concerts for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Rabaud has at last persuaded himself to include one of his own pieces—the tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne," suggested by the German verses of Lenau, profiting by Wagnerian example and characteristic of the composer-conductor in his earlier rather than his later days. Two German classics likewise stand on the list—Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor, long unheard at Symphony Hall, since Dr. Muck seldom chose beyond the first and the second; and the third of Beethoven's "Leonore" overtures. The fourth item, though it falls in the middle of the programme, is Saint-Saëns's concerto for piano in G minor, in which Mr. Levitzki, the pianist, will play the solo part. Twice and thrice in recitals in Boston he has given proof of his admirable quality as young and expert pianist, young, intelligent and susceptible musician. It is a pleasure to find him called thus early to the Symphony Concerts. His deserts well warrant the invitation.

In its next "southern trip," the second week of January, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play:

In the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, on Monday evening, Jan. 6, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," Berlioz's overture to "King Lear," and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E Minor, with Mr. Fredric Fradkin, the new concertmaster, as soloist.

In the New National Theater, Washington, on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 7, D'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," and Mendelssohn's Concerto with Mr. Fradkin.

In the Lyric Theater, Baltimore, on Wednesday evening, Jan. 8, Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Mendelssohn's Concerto with Mr. Fradkin, a suite of English Sixteenth Century music arranged by Mr. Rabaud, and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole."

In Carnegie Hall, New York, on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, D'Indy's "Wallenstein," Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," the old English suite, and Berlioz's "King Lear."

In the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday evening, Jan. 10, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphony "Antar," Mendelssohn's Concerto with Mr. Fradkin, and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole."

In Carnegie Hall, New York, Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne," Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," [illegible]en's "Leo[illegible] overture

Sunday afternoon, Jan. 5, in Symphony Hall, a concert by Mr. McCormack, the tenor, heard gladly by all sorts and conditions of listeners and deservedly so. According to his present practice, an air from opera or oratorio; classic songs to English texts; Irish folk-pieces and patriotic or sentimental balladry will fill his programme.

Monday afternoon, Dec. 30, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus, to replace that of Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, omitted by reason of the epidemic of influenza. The present concert will "celebrate the close of the year of victory," with the national anthems of the United States, Belgium, Britain, Italy and France; Bizet's overture, "Patrie"; a suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from English music of the days of Elizabeth; and for choral pieces a Te Deum by Verdi; Franck's setting of Psalm CL; and Mr. Chadwick's hymn to America, "Land of Our Hearts." Seemingly all three of these pieces are new in performance to Boston.

Tuesday evening, Dec. 31, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus, to replace that of Saturday evening, Oct. 12, omitted by reason of the epidemic of influenza. The programme is that above specified.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, DECEMBER 22

D'Indy Trilogy Is Given at Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

"Wallenstein" Symphonic Trilogy.....D'Indy
Piano Concerto, E minor.....Chopin
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.
Overture, "King Lear".....Berlioz

M. RABAUD is to be complimented on the rational length of his programs. They are never prolix, and this time, for once, Beethoven was absent from the list, although it was still far removed from the extreme modern school. D'Indy's Trilogy, founded on Schiller's Tragedy, is conservative enough and is somewhat more dramatic than many of the later works of the composer. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," is not exactly as orderly as Camp Devens. The composer makes the most effective scene out of the Sermon of the Capuchin, with its grotesque Latin quotations, its attack on Wallenstein, the anger of the soldiers, and the rally of the Croats to the rescue of the monk. But even this is not exactly "program-music" for D'Indy does not picture a solo instrument heckled by the rest of the orchestra, but gives this as a strange fugue (or a fugal exposition) upon the bassoons, a very quaint and fitting touch, which is afterwards parodied (a la Berlioz) by trumpet and clarinet. The instruments were very clear in this learned portion of the work.

The love scene between Max and Thekla, the second movement, was in strong contrast with the camp movement, and the masculine and feminine themes were excellent foils to each other. This was the simplest and most easily comprehended movement but the first movement was the most effective. The Finale, however, "Wallenstein's Death," is the proper climax of the work. Here one does not find the ascetic and overlearned D'Indy, but a composer who sometimes leans even toward the Tschaikowsky expression of sorrow, and the musical auditor can find an occasional Wagnerian touch, as, for example, when the "Flying Dutchman" comes into port towards the end, with Siegfried evidently on board. But it is all worthy and excellent music, and we like it better than D'Indy in his more bitter and more scholastic moods. We only wish that we had kept upon this path.

The performance was excellent. The ensemble was perfect and the first movement aroused very spontaneous enthusiasm. There are eight harps called for in this triology and in this performance we had four. But the effect which Wagner managed to obtain from massing these instruments was not achieved.

The rentree of Josef Hofmann was undoubtedly the chief attraction of the concert for the public. He has not appeared in these concerts in several years. There were strained relations between him and the symphonic powers ever since he took the Finale of the Schumann concerto at a pace which was simply impossible for the orchestra. He is a great artist, all the same, and everyone was glad to welcome him back. But the piece that he chose was not so entirely welcome. Chopin's piano concertos have their faults. In the first place, they are not real concertos, but piano works almost entirely. A concerto should be first of all symphonic, and Chopin's two are not.

Secondly, the orchestration of Chopin was very weak, and even in the revision used this side of the picture is rather tame. There is also too much of sweetness in the work, too little of powerful contrast. But Mr. Hofmann by his virile playing was able to make the concerto more effective than it generally is, and the amount of tunefulness in it was grateful in these days of discord. Every part of the work was made clear as crystal and the avoidance of sentimentality was something to grow enthusiastic over, for some pianists must needs weep over the keyboard when they play Chopin. Therefore the public welcomed the Prodigal Son with great enthusiasm and killed the fatted calf at his return, in spite of the high price of veal. But even Mr. Hofmann could not make us enjoy the Larghetto, the second movement of this concerto.

Berloz's "King Lear" overture is not one of his greatest works. It is curious to note that in "Les Francs Juges" overture he can tear a passion to tatters, while in the present case one could bear much more continuous frenzy in the part of the tortured king. But the oboe has some beautiful work (and it was finely played, too) in portraying the soft-voiced Cordelia, and the kettledrum, with some emphatic strokes, intimated that Fate was giving the monarch some knockout blows.

We liked the reading very much. It was strongly contrasted in its chief points, and had much more abandon than we recall in some of previous performances. The ...gs particularly gave a whirl... of Passion at one part of the ... and the climaxes were made ...ost of.

... in all we like Mr. Rabaud more ... more at each performance. The ...estra is in superb condition at ...esent, which tells the story of his ...rill-mastership, while the elasticity, the abandon, the poetry of his readings make us felicitate ourselves on having M. Rabaud at the head of the organization.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 5 - 1918

RABAUD PLEASES IN INITIAL APPEARANCE

New Head of Boston Symphony Shows Many Promising Qualities.

ORCHESTRA IS CAPABLE

Henri Rabaud, the new noted French conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., made his Baltimore debut at the Lyric Theater last night at the second concert here of the orchestra this season. The applause which followed his work was smaller in proportion—as applause goes—than the audience and its volume was due largely to relatively a few persons. This condition was a reflection upon the audience, not upon the conductor, for the facts of the case deserved a general cordiality, at least, which was not expressed even if it were possibly felt. The audience filled possibly three-fifths of the house. The program varied from custom in this city in that it contained two symphonies. It was unusual, too, in that, to meet a request, the program was changed to avoid duplicating Beethoven's seventh symphony, recently played here as well as other Beethoven music.

Another variation from custom was that the conductor sat with the players of the orchestra between numbers instead of leaving the stage.

Mr. Rabaud conducted in a mildly objective way, quick and alert, but reposeful and with simplicity. Judging by his manner at this concert alone, he is human in mind and spirit as well as in body, kind, gentle, efficient, modest, and with qualities of pathos and humor. His work showed thorough familiarity with the music of the scores and studiousness.

Now that the orchestra has been heard under his direction, it can be said even more strongly than before that it is by slight means "the same orchestra" as it was before its organization. This is inevitable, since a large proportion of the orchestra was affected by the changes; but while this is so, it is by no means apparent now that it is potentially less capable. Not so. The work of the orchestra, in spite of some instabilities natural under the circumstances, showed brilliance, delicacy and sonority, and altogether proved itself a medium of great potentialities. It remains now for these to be developed, and upon what extent they are developed depends much, full as well as just appraisal here of Mr. Rabaud's capacities as a conductor of a symphony orchestra, and of the capacities of the orchestra itself. It may be said safely now that the conditions seem propitious.

An effective program was comprised of Saint-Saens' Symphonic Poem, No. 4, Opus 50, The Youth of Hercules; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony; Dukas' scherzo, The Sorcerer's Apprentice, and Borodin's second symphony, in B minor. The music of The Star-spangled Banner prefaced the concert, played with pauses in three places, which have not been made at any other symphonic rendition here of it, and which do not seem advisable.

J. N. H.

EVENING MAIL
New York City
1918

PERHAPS "you can't play every instruments in the band," but Rimsky-Korsakoff gave every instrument a little piece of music all to itself in his "Capriccio Espanol," with which the Philadelphia Orchestra dismissed a reluctant audience in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Not a piccolo nor a bassoon, not an oboe or trumpet was neglected, and when Mr. Stokowski swept his gallant crew into the brilliant fandango, everybody's fingers ached for a pair of castenets.

The Philadelphia Orchestra is gradually fitting itself into the niche formerly occupied by the Boston Symphony in the hearts of New York music lovers. It wins new converts to the acknowledgment of its excellences each time it comes to visit us, and Leopold Stokowski's conducting of the Brahms No. 3 Symphony probably made the preparers of wreaths regret that laurel is out of season.

It is a symphony of cloud and sunshine, but its orchestration need never sound muddy nor even opaque. Under Mr. Stokowski's baton the third movement is a miracle of loveliness, and in the fourth movement he brings out with crystal purity the theme of the ancient war-tune that changes toward the close to the soft strains of tenderness. He gets a peerless tone from his violins and 'cellos, and convinces you that a sensitive director can make an orchestra sing with a single glorious voice.

Rachmaninoff was lavish with his melody in his piano concerto in C minor. It is rather simple in contrast to some of that Russian's complexities, making you suspect yourself of being too easily beguiled. Just at the close the tinkling cymbals sound the Muscovite note. Osip Gabrilowitsch, who was the soloist, ...

Springfield, Mass.
DEC 8 - 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Brilliant Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, having weathered troublous storms, is now sailing in smooth waters, with a busy and truly brilliant season well under way. Pierre Monteaux's appearance in the October concerts on the conductor's stand gave some foretaste of the charm and variety of the programs under purely French direction. Enter now, M. Henri Rabaud, foremost of "Conservatoire" and "Opera Comique" conductors, enjoying great vogue in Paris, and a composer of almost international fame. His variegated opera, "Mar-ouf," based upon a tale of the Arabian Nights, is already an enduring par of the Metropolitan repertory; and his "Second Symphony," marking al most a new era among orchestra compositions, has recently been performed in Chicago and several othe American cities with great success.

As an example of the measur heaped up and running over, evi denced in the programs now bein played in Boston, on the 13th and 14t of December the great French or ganist, Joseph Bonnet, will play th great Guilmant D-minor Symphon for the organ with full orchestra, th other numbers being Beethoven Eighth Symphony and "The Myst Trumpeter" by Frederick Convers The presence here of an adequate a litorium organ makes it quite possibl that this is the program whic Springfield is to hear later in th season, when another opportunity wi be given to make a big public di play of the French tricolor. On th 20th and 21st, Josef Hofmann wi be the soloist, playing the E-min Concerto by Frederic Chopin, and the 27th and 28th the fine young Ru sian violinist, Mischa Levitzki, wi play the Saint-Saens Concerto in minor

POST,
JANUARY 1,

HIGHEST HONOR TO CONDUCTOR

Rabaud Elected to French Institute

The news has just come overseas of the election of Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the highest post of honor a musician can hold in France—member of "L'Institut de France."

When W. H. Brennan, the manager, announced the fact at the rehearsal yesterday he requested Mr. Longy, the first oboist, to conduct the "Marseillaise" in tribute, and the occasion became a demonstration. Under the "Institute" is the "Academie des Beaux Arts," comprising five chambers for the various fine arts. The membership of the "Academy" is fixed at 40 and is for life—"the 40 immortals," they are called. Of these there are always six musical composers, judges of the Prix de Rome. These are at present: Saint-Saens, Dubois, Paladilhe, Faure, Charpentier, and new Rabaud, replacing Widor, who in turn has become "secretaire perpetuelle." Thus Mr. Rabaud, elected on his merits as composer, is the only conductor to hold the honor.

TRANSCRIPT
DECEMBER 31,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RECORD OF A DISILLUSIONIZING AFTERNOON

A "Celebration of the Close of the Year of Victory" That Proved but Perfunctory Occasion — A Singular Audience from Which Subscribers Were Conspicuously Absent—Little Interesting or Impressive Music and All in Routine Performance—A Chorus Too Hastily Assembled and Prepared

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT of yesterday afternoon—first of a pair, as the programme-book put it, "to celebrate the year of victory"—was better designed than accomplished. It replaced the concert announced for Oct. 11 last and postponed because of the prevalance of influenza, as the repetition, this evening, will replace the concert of Oct. 12. By so much the occasion fulfilled its purpose, since it lessened by a week the prolongation of the series to the middle of May in amends for omitted concerts. Otherwise, it fell far short of intent. To suit the plan, the programme began with the playing by the orchestra of the national hymns of the United States, Belgium, Britain, Italy and France; it proceeded with three pieces for chorus with orchestra —"Land of Our Hearts: A Patriotic Hymn" written by the American, Mr. Chadwick; a setting of the Te Deum in the offices of the church by the Italian, Verdi; and a setting of the last Psalm—music of triumphant rejoicing—by the Franco-Belgian Franck. Between these were interspersed two orchestral pieces—Bizet's concert overture, "Patrie" and a short Suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from old English tunes of the sixteenth century and originally part of the incidental music to Monsieur Gémier's reproduction of Shakspeare's comedy, "The Merchant of Venice" at Paris in 1916. To conclude as the old playbills had it, orchestra, organ, chorus and audience sounded one stanza of the hymn, "America." So were the numbers of the day distributed among the United States and the co-belligerent nations against Germany; so were these numbers designed to stir appropriate emotions in the segment of the victors dwelling in and around Boston and assembling in Symphony Hall; so were the Symhony Concerts to be linked into what it is ow fashionable to call "the communal fe."

Whatever the outcome may be this ening—the more appropriate time for ch "celebration"—the number and the ality of the audience, Monday afteon, visibly defeated the last of these rposes. The upper balcony, open to "the mmunity," at twenty-eight cents per ad, held only a fringe of listeners, hereas at an ordinary Symphony Conrt, it is filled, usually, to the last seat. the lower balcony and in the parquet e subscribers to the afternoon concerts emed few and far between, having evintly bestowed their tickets hither and n until the auditorium resembled what the palmy days of the Boston Opera ed to be known as "a poor relations' ght." The places disposable for each ncert were occupied by a still more misllaneous company, not too much at ease its surroundings and plainly disapinted in the relative tameness of the oceedings as a "celebration." The whole udience, indeed, declined to be stirred en by the preliminary national hymns, ined only perfunctorily in the singing of America," returned to the other numrs of the day only routine applause hatever the outcome this evening—to re at a necessary proviso—substantial evi nce was not lacking yesterday that the blic of the afternoon concerts prefers e Symphony Orchestra as a cosmopoliin medium for the performance of symhonic music and not as instrument for celebrating the close of the year of vicory." Possibly that public, if it ever reects upon the matter at all, may even elieve that, playing such music from all ands week in and week out from October o May, the Symphony Orchestra sufficiently serves and enriches "the communal life."

In the second place, with the exception of Verdi's loftily imagined and eloquently written setting of the Te Deum—not to "celebrate" anything but because the beauty and the majesty of the hymn of praise deeply stirred him—the music of the afternoon as music seldom rose above commonplace. The national hymns evoke in themselves and by habit in the hearers the emotions they were designed to summon; the least sensitive thereto may hardly hear "La Marseillase" played, especially in the presence of French troops, without answering thrill. But heard as they were Monday afternoon, one after another, "off the reel," on a purely arbitrary occasion, before an unexcited and unexcitable audience, they seemed hardly the sort of musical stuff upon which the Symphony Orchestra exercises its abilities or its audiences their ears. Mr. Chadwick's "hymn" sounded neither better nor worse than the "potboiler" of a practised composer. It clothes simple, straightforward elemental verses —"Land of the North, Land of the South, Land of the East, Land of the West, Land of Our Hearts" and so forth—in as simple, straightforward, elementary music, skilfully and "gratefully" written for the singing chorus, mechanically accompanied by the orchestra—a frank pièce d'occasion designed for general usage, with little imagination, with no distinction. Franck's setting of the one hundred and fiftieth Psalm is music of finer craftsmanship and warmer feeling; as direct, if not quite so elementary; of the tonal prose of the organist of Sainte-Clothilde and not of the tonal poetry, like Verdi's setting of the Te Deum, of an illustrious composer.

...Until Bizet's overture, "Patrie," became haloed to many an ear by new association with a desolate but warlike France, it passed intrinsically for one of his routine pieces seldom to be resurrected in the concert-room when his masterly music to "L'Arlésienne," for example—to say nothing of orchestral fragments of "Carmen" —lay ready to hand. As for the Suite of Mr. Rabaud—honestest and openest of men —it is exactly what it purports to be. Monsieur Gémier, the actor-manager, eager to domicile "Shakspeare in France" contrived a reproduction of "The Merchant of Venice" on the Parisian stage in which the play was barely discoverable through thick swathings of scenery, costumes, lights, dances, music and other spectacular paraphernalia. He deputed the scholarly Rabaud to write this music. The composer-conductor opened the music-books of Shakspeare's time, when England was fertile in tunes of its own, and transcribed pieces appropriate to various incidents in the play, for a very small orchestra—a mere group of instruments in the pit of a theatre. More recently he has rescored the numbers heard yesterday as a Suite for the concert-hall and a sizable orchestra. The resulting piece runs in five short movements—the first and the last, being identical, of sonorous voice, free and ample rhythmic stride; the intervening three either songful with frank English melody, a little touched by melancholy, or sprightly with English high spirits. Mr. Rabaud has well preserved the directness, the heartiness, the honesty of this old English music. He rescores it with a sympathetic, resourceful, reticent hand. There he and the Suite stop. Of all the numbers of the day, only it and Verdi's Te Deum were worthy of the higher standards of the Symphony Concerts.

Finally, the performance of no one of these pieces, however it may go this evening, rose above dutiful routine. A cosmopolitan orchestra, as the Symphony Orchestra by auspicious fate has been, is now, and probably ever will be, cannot with the best will in the world, play an arbitrary assortment of national hymns with the fire of feeling and of utterar that Mr. Messager and his Frenchmen fr the Conservatory lately infused in Sy phony Hall into "La Marseillaise." M Rabaud, besides, was too rigid with while he was literal to a fault with t overture, "Patrie," which needs all the e traneous heat and glamour a conductor ma kindle around it. Only in his own Suit did leader and band seem their usua selves. As for the choral pieces the per formance of all three obviously suffere from the fact that the choir, however abl diligent and finely voiced, has lacked tim for adequate preparation, for the gainin of the elasticity, the sureness, the conf dence, the zest that are half the battl with such music and that were chief glo ries, in another time, of the Boston Sym phony Chorus. In Mr. Chadwick's hymn made to measure, as it were, for the aver age choir, Mr. Townsend's singers regaine not a little of their precision, rhythm sense of quality of tone, of turn of phrase mounting progression and expanding cli max. They fared well enough wit Franck's Psalm, within the limits of competence. But in Verdi's setting of the Te Deum—as exacting as it is beautiful and eloquent in the answers of choir to choir, in intervals and transitions that dim the eye and melt the heart, in glowing arcs of exultant, exalted or poignant tone—the choir and indeed Mr. Rabaud seemed only to grope their way along by no means without occasional missteps. Not always did they achieve even the letter of the music. This done, there was naught left in them to summon its spirit. Nor would it be the truth to say that Mr. Rabaud much distinguished himself as a choral conductor. So runs the record of a disillusioning afternoon.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 3

NEW HONOR FOR RABAUD

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Receives as New Year's Gift Election to the Institute of France

Word came from Paris to Symphony Hall this morning that Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra had been elected a member of the Institute of France in the chamber or section of the Fine Arts—a distinction much coveted by French composers and musicians, since it is the highest of official honors in their profession and one limited to only a few men. The members are chosen to vacant places by ballot of their colleagues already seated in the Institute.

A rehearsal was in progress at Symphony Hall when the news came and spread. The orchestra ceased work to congratulate the conductor; while he, in return, called Mr. Longy to his place to lead the "Marseillaise."

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, DECEMBER 22

D'Indy Trilogy Is Given at Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

"Wallenstein" Symphonic Trilogy.....D'Indy
Piano Concerto, E minor.....Chopin
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.
Overture, "King Lear".....Berlioz

M. RABAUD is to be complimented on the rational length of his programs. They are never prolix, and this time, for once, Beethoven was absent from the list, although it was still far removed from the extreme modern school. D'Indy's Trilogy, founded on Schiller's Tragedy, is conservative enough and is somewhat more dramatic than many of the later works of the composer. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," is not exactly as orderly as Camp Devens. The composer makes the most effective scene out of the Sermon of the Capuchin, with its grotesque Latin quotations, its attack on Wallenstein, the anger of the soldiers, and the rally of the Croats to the rescue of the monk. But even this is not exactly "program-music" for D'Indy does not picture a solo instrument heckled by the rest of the orchestra, but gives this as a strange fugue (or a fugal exposition) upon the bassoons, a very quaint and fitting touch, which is afterwards parodied (a la Berlioz) by trumpet and clarinet. The instruments were very clear in this learned portion of the work.

The love scene between Max and Thekla, the second movement, was in strong contrast with the camp movement, and the masculine and feminine themes were excellent foils to each other. This was the simplest and most easily comprehended movement but the first movement was the most effective. The Finale, however, "Wallenstein's Death," is the proper climax of the work. Here one does not find the ascetic and overlearned D'Indy, but a composer who sometimes leans even toward the Tschaikowsky expression of sorrow, and the musical auditor can find an occasional Wagnerian touch, as, for example, when the "Flying Dutchman" comes into port towards the end, with Siegfried evidently on board. But it is all worthy and excellent music, and we like it better than D'Indy in his more bitter and more scholastic moods. We only wish that we had kept upon this path.

The performance was excellent. The ensemble was perfect and the first movement aroused very spontaneous enthusiasm. There are eight harps called for in this triology and in this performance we had four. But the effect which Wagner managed to obtain from massing these instruments was not achieved.

The rentree of Josef Hofmann was undoubtedly the chief attraction of the concert for the public. He has not appeared in these concerts in several years. There were strained relations between him and the symphonic powers ever since he took the Finale of the Schumann concerto at a pace which was simply impossible for the orchestra. He is a great artist, all the same, and everyone was glad to welcome him back. But the piece that he chose was not so entirely welcome. Chopin's piano concertos have their faults. In the first place, they are not real concertos, but piano works almost entirely. A concerto should be first of all symphonic, and Chopin's two are not.

Secondly, the orchestration of Chopin was very weak, and even in the revision used this side of the picture is rather tame. There is also too much of sweetness in the work, too little of powerful contrast. But Mr. Hofmann by his virile playing was able to make the concerto more effective than it generally is, and the amount of tunefulness in it was grateful in these days of discord. Every part of the work was made clear as crystal and the avoidance of sentimentality was something to grow enthusiastic over, for some pianists must needs weep over the keyboard when they play Chopin. Therefore the public welcomed the Prodigal Son with great enthusiasm and killed the fatted calf at his return, in spite of the high price of veal. But even Mr. Hofmann could not make us enjoy the Larghetto, the second movement of this concerto.

Berloz's "King Lear" overture is not one of his greatest works. It is curious to note that in "Les Francs Juges" overture he can tear a passion to tatters, while in the present case one could bear much more continuous frenzy in the part of the tortured king. But the oboe has some beautiful work (and it was finely played, too) in portraying the soft-voiced Cordelia, and the kettledrum, with some emphatic strokes, intimated that Fate was giving the monarch some knockout blows.

We liked the reading very much. It was strongly contrasted in its chief points, and had much more abandon than we recall in some of previous performances. The ...gs particularly gave a whirl... of Passion at one part of the ... and the climaxes were made ...ost of.

... in all we like Mr. Rabaud more ... more at each performance. The ...estra is in superb condition at ...esent, which tells the story of his ...rill-mastership, while the elasticity, the abandon, the poetry of his readings make us felicitate ourselves on having M. Rabaud at the head of the organization.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.

RABAUD PLEASES IN INITIAL APPEARANCE

New Head of Boston Symphony Shows Many Promising Qualities.

ORCHESTRA IS CAPABLE

Henri Rabaud, the new, noted French conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., made his Baltimore debut at the Lyric Theater last night at the second concert here of the orchestra this season. The applause which followed his work was smaller in proportion — as applause goes—than the audience and its volume was due largely to relatively a few persons. This condition was a reflection upon the audience, not upon the conductor, for the facts of the case deserved a general cordiality, at least, which was not expressed even if it were possibly felt. The audience filled possibly three-fifths of the house. The program varied from custom in this city in that it contained two symphonies. It was unusual, too, in that, to meet a request, the program was changed to avoid duplicating Beethoven's seventh symphony, recently played here as well as other Beethoven music.

Another variation from custom was that the conductor sat with the players of the orchestra between numbers instead of leaving the stage.

Mr. Rabaud conducted in a mildly objective way, quick and alert, but reposeful and with simplicity. Judging by his manner at this concert alone, he is human in mind and spirit as well as in body, kind, gentle, efficient, modest, and with qualities of pathos and humor. His work showed thorough familiarity with the music of the scores and studiousness.

Now that the orchestra has been heard under his direction, it can be said even more strongly than before that it is by slight means "the same orchestra" as it was before its organization. This is inevitable, since a large proportion of the orchestra was affected by the changes; but while this is so, it is by no means apparent now that it is potentially less capable. Not so. The work of the orchestra, in spite of some instabilities natural under the circumstances, showed brilliance, delicacy and sonority, and altogether proved itself a medium of great potentialities. It remains now for these to be developed, and upon what extent they are developed depends much, full as well as just appraisal here of Mr. Rabaud's capacities as a conductor of a symphony orchestra, and of the capacities of the orchestra itself. It may be said safely now that the conditions seem propitious.

An effective program was comprised of Saint-Saens' Symphonic Poem, No. 4, Opus 50, The Youth of Hercules; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony; Dukas' scherzo, The Sorcerer's Apprentice, and Borodin's second symphony, in B minor. The music of The Star-spangled Banner prefaced the concert, played with pauses in three places, which have not been made at any other symphonic rendition here of it, and which do not seem advisable.

J. N. H.

EVENING MAIL
New York City

PERHAPS "you can't play every instruments in the band," but Rimsky-Korsakoff gave every instrument a little piece of music all to itself in his "Capriccio Espanol," with which the Philadelphia Orchestra dismissed a reluctant audience in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Not a piccolo nor a bassoon, not an oboe or trumpet was neglected, and when Mr. Stokowski swept his gallant crew into the brilliant fandango, everybody's fingers ached for a pair of castenets.

The Philadelphia Orchestra is gradually fitting itself into the niche formerly occupied by the Boston Symphony in the hearts of New York music lovers. It wins new converts to the acknowledgment of its excellences each time it comes to visit us, and Leopold Stokowski's conducting of the Brahms No. 3 Symphony probably made the preparers of wreaths regret that laurel is out of season.

It is a symphony of cloud and sunshine, but its orchestration need never sound muddy nor even opaque. Under Mr. Stokowski's baton the third movement is a miracle of loveliness, and in the fourth movement he brings out with crystal purity the theme of the ancient war-tune that changes toward the close to the soft strains of tenderness. He gets a peerless tone from his violins and 'cellos, and convinces you that a sensitive director can make an orchestra sing with a single glorious voice.

Rachmaninoff was lavish with his melody in his piano concerto in C minor. It is rather simple in contrast to some of that Russian's complexities, making you suspect yourself of being too easily beguiled. Just at the close the tinkling cymbals sound the Muscovite note. Ossip Gabrilowitch, who was the soloist, [illegible]

Springfield, Mass.
ss
DEC 8 - 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Brilliant Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, having weathered troublous storms, is now sailing in smooth waters, with a busy and truly brilliant season well under way. Pierre Monteaux's appearance in the October concerts on the conductor's stand gave some foretaste of the charm and variety of the programs under purely French direction. Enter now, M. Henri Rabaud, foremost of "Conservatoire" and "Opera Comique" conductors, enjoying great vogue in Paris, and a composer of almost international fame. His variegated opera, "Mar-ouf," based upon a tale of the Arabian Nights, is already an enduring par of the Metropolitan repertory; and his "Second Symphony," marking al most a new era among orchestra compositions, has recently been performed in Chicago and several othe American cities with great succes

As an example of the measur heaped up and running over, evi denced in the programs now bein played in Boston, on the 13th and 14t of December the great French or ganist, Joseph Bonnet, will play th great Guilmant D-minor Symphon for the organ with full orchestra, th other numbers being Beethoven Eighth Symphony and "The Mystl Trumpeter" by Frederick Convers The presence here of an adequate a ditorium organ makes it quite possibl that this is the program whic Springfield is to hear later in th season, when another opportunity wi be given to make a big public di play of the French tricolor. On th 20th and 21st, Josef Hofmann wi be the soloist, playing the E-minc Concerto by Frederic Chopin, and c the 27th and 28th the fine young Ru sian violinist, Mischa Levitzki, wi play the Saint-Saens Concerto in G minor

POST,
JANUARY 1,

HIGHEST HONOR TO CONDUCTOR

Rabaud Elected to French Institute

The news has just come overseas of the election of Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the highest post of honor a musician can hold in France—member of "L'Institut de France."

When W. H. Brennan, the manager, announced the fact at the rehearsal yesterday he requested Mr. Longy, the first oboist, to conduct the "Marseillaise" in tribute, and the occasion became a demonstration. Under the "Institute" is the "Academie des Beaux Arts," comprising five chambers for the various fine arts. The membership of the "Academy" is fixed at 40 and is for life—"the 40 immortals," they are called. Of these there are always six musical composers, judges of the Prix de Rome. These are at present: Saint-Saens, Dubois, Paladilhe, Faure, Charpentier, and now Rabaud, replacing Widor, who in turn has become "secretaire perpetuelle." Thus Mr. Rabaud, elected on his merits as composer, is the only conductor to hold the honor.

TRANSCRIPT
DECEMBER 31,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RECORD OF A DISILLUSIONIZING AFTERNOON

A "Celebration of the Close of the Year of Victory" That Proved but Perfunctory Occasion — A Singular Audience from Which Subscribers Were Conspicuously Absent—Little Interesting or Impressive Music and All in Routine Performance—A Chorus Too Hastily Assembled and Prepared

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT of yesterday afternoon—first of a pair, as the programme-book put it, "to celebrate the year of victory"—was better designed than accomplished. It replaced the concert announced for Oct. 11 last and postponed because of the prevalance of influenza, as the repetition, this evening, will replace the concert of Oct. 12. By so much the occasion fulfilled its purpose, since it lessened by a week the prolongation of the series to the middle of May in amends for omitted concerts. Otherwise, it fell far short of intent. To suit the plan, the programme began with the playing by the orchestra of the national hymns of the United States, Belgium, Britain, Italy and France; it proceeded with three pieces for chorus with orchestra —"Land of Our Hearts: A Patriotic Hymn" written by the American, Mr. Chadwick; a setting of the Te Deum in the offices of the church by the Italian, Verdi; and a setting of the last Psalm—music of triumphant rejoicing—by the Franco-Belgian Franck. Between these were interspersed two orchestral pieces—Bizet's concert overture, "Patrie" and a short Suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from old English tunes of the sixteenth century and originally part of the incidental music to Monsieur Gémier's reproduction of Shakspeare's comedy, "The Merchant of Venice" at Paris in 1916. To conclude as the old playbills had it, orchestra, organ, chorus and audience sounded one stanza of the hymn, "America." So were the numbers of the day distributed among the United States and the co-belligerent nations against Germany; so were these numbers designed to stir appropriate emotions in the segment of the victors dwelling in and around Boston and assembling in Symphony Hall; so were the Symphony Concerts to be linked into what it is now fashionable to call "the communal life."

Whatever the outcome may be this evening—the more appropriate time for such "celebration"—the number and the quality of the audience, Monday afternoon, visibly defeated the last of these purposes. The upper balcony, open to "the community," at twenty-eight cents per head, held only a fringe of listeners, whereas at an ordinary Symphony Concert, it is filled, usually, to the last seat. In the lower balcony and in the parquet the subscribers to the afternoon concerts seemed few and far between, having evidently bestowed their tickets hither and yon until the auditorium resembled what in the palmy days of the Boston Opera used to be known as "a poor relations' night." The places disposable for each concert were occupied by a still more miscellaneous company, not too much at ease in its surroundings and plainly disappointed in the relative tameness of the proceedings as a "celebration." The whole audience, indeed, declined to be stirred even by the preliminary national hymns, joined only perfunctorily in the singing of "America," returned to the other numbers of the day only routine applause. Whatever the outcome this evening—to repeat a necessary proviso—substantial evidence was not lacking yesterday that the public of the afternoon concerts prefers the Symphony Orchestra as a cosmopolitan medium for the performance of symphonic music and not as instrument for celebrating the close of the year of victory." Possibly that public, if it ever reflects upon the matter at all, may even believe that, playing such music from all hands week in and week out from October to May, the Symphony Orchestra sufficiently serves and enriches "the communal life."

In the second place, with the exception of Verdi's loftily imagined and eloquently written setting of the Te Deum—not to "celebrate" anything but because the beauty and the majesty of the hymn of praise deeply stirred him—the music of the afternoon as music seldom rose above commonplace. The national hymns evoke in themselves and by habit in the hearers the emotions they were designed to summon; the least sensitive thereto may hardly hear "La Marseillase" played, especially in the presence of French troops, without answering thrill. But heard as they were Monday afternoon, one after another, "off the reel," on a purely arbitrary occasion, before an unexcited and unexcitable audience, they seemed hardly the sort of musical stuff upon which the Symphony Orchestra exercises its abilities or its audiences their ears. Mr. Chadwick's "hymn" sounded neither better nor worse than the "pot-boiler" of a practised composer. It clothes simple, straightforward elemental verses —"Land of the North, Land of the South, Land of the East, Land of the West, Land of Our Hearts" and so forth—in as simple, straightforward, elementary music, skilfully and "gratefully" written for the singing chorus, mechanically accompanied by the orchestra—a frank pièce d'occasion designed for general usage, with little imagination, with no distinction. Franck's setting of the one hundred and fiftieth Psalm is music of finer craftsmanship and warmer feeling; as direct, if not quite so elementary; of the tonal prose of the organist of Sainte-Clothilde and not of the tonal poetry, like Verdi's setting of the Te Deum, of an illustrious composer.

Until Bizet's overture, "Patrie," became haloed to many an ear by new association with a desolate but warlike France, it passed intrinsically for one of his routine pieces seldom to be resurrected in the concert-room when his masterly music to "L'Arlésienne," for example—to say nothing of orchestral fragments of "Carmen" —lay ready to hand. As for the Suite of Mr. Rabaud—honestest and openest of men —it is exactly what it purports to be. Monsieur Gémier, the actor-manager, eager to domicile "Shakspeare in France" contrived a reproduction of "The Merchant of Venice" on the Parisian stage in which the play was barely discoverable through thick swathings of scenery, costumes, lights, dances, music and other spectacular paraphernalia. He deputed the scholarly Rabaud to write this music. The composer-conductor opened the music-books of Shakspeare's time, when England was fertile in tunes of its own, and transcribed pieces appropriate to various incidents in the play, for a very small orchestra—a mere group of instruments in the pit of a theatre. More recently he has rescored the numbers heard yesterday as a Suite for the concert-hall and a sizable orchestra. The resulting piece runs in five short movements—the first and the last, being identical, of sonorous voice, free and ample rhythmic stride; the intervening three either songful with frank English melody, a little touched by melancholy, or sprightly with English high spirits. Mr. Rabaud has well preserved the directness, the heartiness, the honesty of this old English music. He rescores it with a sympathetic, resourceful, reticent hand. There he and the Suite stop. Of all the numbers of the day, only it and Verdi's Te Deum were worthy of the higher standards of the Symphony Concerts.

Finally, the performance of no one of these pieces, however it may go this evening, rose above dutiful routine. A cosmopolitan orchestra, as the Symphony Orchestra by auspicious fate has been, is now, and probably ever will be, cannot with the best will in the world, play an arbitrary assortment of national hymns with the fire of feeling and of utterar that Mr. Messager and his Frenchmen fr the Conservatory lately infused in Sy phony Hall into "La Marseillaise." M Rabaud, besides, was too rigid with while he was literal to a fault with tl overture, "Patrie," which needs all the e traneous heat and glamour a conductor ma kindle around it. Only in his own Suit did leader and band seem the'r usu selves. As for the choral pieces the pe formance of all three obviously suffere from the fact that the choir, however abl diligent and finely voiced, has lacked tim for adequate preparation, for the gainin of the elasticity, the sureness, the conf dence, the zest that are half the battl with such music and that were chief glo ries, in another time, of the Boston Sym phony Chorus. In Mr. Chadwick's hym made to measure, as it were, for the aver age choir, Mr. Townsend's singers regaine not a little of their precision, rhythm sense of quality of tone, of turn of phrase mounting progression and expanding cli max. They fared well enough wit Franck's Psalm, within the limits of com petence. But in Verdi's setting of the Te Deum—as exacting as it is beautiful and eloquent in the answers of choir to choir, in intervals and transitions that dim the eye and melt the heart, in glowing arcs of exultant, exalted or poignant tone—the choir and indeed Mr. Rabaud seemed only to grope their way along by no means without occasional missteps. Not always did they achieve even the letter of the music This done, there was naught left in them to summon its spirit. Nor would it be the truth to say that Mr. Rabaud much distinguished himself as a choral conductor. So runs the record of a disillusioning afternoon.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 31

NEW HONOR FOR RABAUD

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Receives as New Year's Gift Election to the Institute of France

Word came from Paris to Symphony Hall this morning that Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra had been elected a member of the Institute of France in the chamber or section of the Fine Arts—a distinction much coveted by French composers and musicians, since it is the highest of official honors in their profession and one limited to only a few men. The members are chosen to vacant places by ballot of their colleagues already seated in the Institute.

A rehearsal was in progress at Symphony Hall when the news came and spread. The orchestra ceased work to congratulate the conductor; while he, in turn, called Mr. Longy to his place to lead the "Marseillaise."

HERALD DECEMBER 28.

RABAUD MAKES OLD MUSIC LIVE

Departs from Perfunctory Reading of Schumann at Symphony Concert

LEVITZKI HEARD WITH ORCHESTRA

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, symphony No. 4, D minor; Rabaud, "La Procession Nocturne," symphonic poem (after Lenau's "Faust")—first time at these concerts; Saint-Saens, piano concerto No. 2, G minor; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore" No. 3.

Mr. Nikisch, a romantic conductor, gave a singularly romantic interpretation of Schumann's symphony in D minor. The music appealed to him strongly, as did Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The performance of these two works was the crowning glory of his career in Boston. After his departure there were many performances of this symphony; some highly respectable and therefore ineffective, some curiously unintelligent and dull. His successors unfortunately regarded the symphony as "a classic," forgetting the fact that the romanticist of one generation, if he has a spark of genius or even conspicuous talent, is a classic in the eyes of the generation following; but the works of this "classic" composer should still be performed in the romantic spirit. Thus the occasional bombast, the extravagance of the Berlioz of the "Hernani" and "Antony" period should be defiantly expressed. So with Schumann. Yet too many conductors treat a symphony by him as though they were exhibiting a corpse and calling attention to the beauty of its features in death. They are afraid of disturbing the body. This symphony is not dead; its spirit did not die with Schumann.

Spirit of Music Prevails

Mr. Rabaud, fortunately for the audience, looks on the symphony as living music; as romantic in spite of the years. There was nothing perfunctory in the performance; there was no trace of the required respect of the professional mourner in the funeral chamber or at the grave. For once the spirit of the music prevailed over its material body. No conductor can change certain awkward passages in the symphony or reorchestrate it in the performance; but Mr. Rabaud made the hearer forget Schumann's deficiencies, by bringing out fully the beauty of the musical thought. Take, for instance, the haunting Trio of the Scherzo. No conductor here has so comprehended its rhythmic character, the melancholy, so wistful, so contemplative, so peculiarly Schumannesque since Mr. Nikisch left us. The symphony gained greatly by being played without pauses between the movements as the composer directed.

"La Procession Nocturne" is illustrative of an episode in Lenau's "Faust." The symphonic poem was performed here 15 years ago by the Orchestral Club under Mr. Longy. There has also been a performance by the New England Conservatory Orchestra. The work was brought out in Paris in 1899. It shows the sensitive, impressionable nature of an accomplished musician, an imaginative composer whose technical skill allows him to create at once a mood, to maintain it without inducing monotony, to re-establish the mood after an ecclesiastically impressive middle section. The effects are gained by artfully simple means, a sober use of musical material; but the sobriety is not for a moment academic. The moods of Nature and of Faust are suggested without any atempts at bald realism. The despair of Faust is not frenzy. The religious procession seen by him, the solemn hymn as it swells and dies away—these furnish the contrast to the portrayal of the night, the stillness of the forest, the gloomy Faust as he envies the happiness of those singing the sacred hymn. The audience was quick to appreciate the charm of the music and the perfection of the performance. The composer was recalled several times.

Praise Levitzki's Playing

Young Mr. Levitzki has given three recitals in Boston. Yesterday he played here for the first time with the orchestra, and gave a delightful performance of Saint-Saens's almost too familiar concerto. He played the first movement of pseudo-Bach character in the appropriately dignified manner, not endeavoring to infuse the emotional quality that is inherently lacking, but giving due importance to melodic figures, displaying strength and a clear and charming touch. In the other movements, the clarity, the grace and the fleetness were noteworthy. We have not heard for many years so well-balanced and so interesting a reading of this concerto, a performance wholly in keeping with the character of the music.

By this time, no experienced and unprejudiced hearer has any doubt about the ability of Mr. Rabaud as an interpreter of Beethoven. His interpretations neither conventional nor extravagant are vital and illuminating, as was Mr. Rachmaninoff's treatment of music by Mozart and Beethoven not long ago.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of the concerts next Monday afternoon and Tuesday evening will include national airs of Belgium, England, France, Italy and the United States; these choral works—Verdi's "Te Deum," Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts," Cesar Franck's Psalm CL., and these orchestral works: Bizet's overture "Patrie" and the third suite of music by composers represented in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book (16th century) derived from the stage music arranged by Rabaud for a performance of "The Merchant of Venice" in Paris.

The program of the concerts for J[illegible] comprises the "Antar" symphony Rimsky-Korsakoff; Beethoven's [illegible] concerto (Mr. Heifitz, violinist a[illegible] vel's "Rapsodie Espagnole."

DECEMBER 31

SYMPHONY HAS CELEBRATION OF YEAR OF VICTORY

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Special concert by the orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, and a large chorus, celebrating the close of the year of victory.

Star Spangled Banner
La Brabanconne
God Save the King
Marcia Reale Italiana
La Marseillaise

G. W. Chadwick (b. Lowell, Mass., 1854)—"Land of Our Hearts," Patriotic Hymn (to words by John Hall Ingham)
Chorus and Orchestra

G. Bizet (b. Paris, France, 1838)—"Patrie," Dramatic Overture.

G. Verdi (b. Roncole, Italy, 1813)—Te Deum
Double Chorus and Orchestra

Giles Farnaby (b. Truro, Eng., 1568 (?) and anonymous English composers, Suite of the XVIth Century (Arranged by Henri Rabaud)
Maestoso. Moderato. Allegro. Andante. Maestoso.

C. Franck (b. Liege, Belgium, 1822)—Psalm CL.
Chorus, Orchestra and Organ

America
Chorus, Orchestra and Organ

Never was there a symphony concert given by the Boston Orchestra that has less the air of a symphony concert than this. The musicians were in their familiar places. The audience was as usual, excepting that ordinarily vacant places were filled because of the large number of persons attending. After that usual conditions stopped. There was no symphony; there was no symphonic poem. This symphony concert was like "Hamlet" with Hamlet and Ophelia missing. The war has caused many changes—certainly none more striking in Boston social and artistic life than in offering such a program at a symphony concert.

Mr. Rabaud's music was delightful. He has arranged three orchestral suites from the music he provided for Lucien Nepoty's version of "The Merchant of Venice" when it was produced at the Theatre Antoine in Paris in 1916-7. He turned to the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, one of the several MS collections of clavier music that was brought together in the Elizabethan period, for material. This music has a delightful comedy element. Hearing it one can imagine much of it used as overture or incidental music. Such music would lend itself deliciously to "As You Like It" or "Twelfth Night" as well as "The Merchant." The orchestration was made for instruments that are not anachronistic—the oboe the bassoon, the trumpet, the harp, organ and strings. It has sufficient odd to carry well. It is excellently proportioned, but it is never unduly modern. The introduction and the andante, the fourth section, were especially ingratiating.

Mr. Chadwick's composition was based on a poem by John Hall Ingham, a Philadelphia lawyer. The verses are patriotic verses without any marked distinction. They were first used by Mr. Chadwick in his class in composition at the N. E. Conservatory of Music as exercises in vocal writing. Later Mr. Chadwick made the arrangement heard yesterday. The work is obviously that of a trained musician, a scholarly example of writing for chorus and orchestra.

The chorus in patriotic airs and in the Verdi and Franck numbers sang with fair precision and quality of tone. The volume of tone was not excessive. It is a fact, however, that the choral numbers with choral singing, somewhat of a novelty at these concerts, did not give the pleasure that Ma. Rabaud's new work and the old "Patrie" overture gave. The Bizet overture was played with less brilliancy than Mr. Messager brought to it when he was here recently, but it was played with such care that its music assumed a new value. Mr Rabaud refined and rather glorified a well made, but not great, work.

French Institute Honors Rabaud

The news has just come overseas of the election of Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the highest post of honor a musician can hold in France—member of "L'Institut de France."

The announcement was made at the rehearsal this morning by W. H. Brennan, who requested Mr. Longy to conduct La Marseillaise in tribute, and the occasion became a demonstration.

The "Institute" comprises five chambers for the various fine arts. Its membership is fixed at 40, and is for life. Upon the musical section are but a handful of the first composers of France, such as Saint Saens and Charpentier, and Rabaud, elected on his merits as a composer, is the only conductor to hold the honor.

AMERICAN DECEMBER 31

SYMPHONY HAS CELEBRATION OF VICTORY

By FRED J. McISAAC

To celebrate the close of the year of victory the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a special concert yesterday afternoon which will be repeated tonight.

The participation of a chorus of 150 enabled Conductor Rabaud to place upon his program such wonderful hymns of joy as Verdi's "Te Deum" and Franck's "One Hundred Fiftieth Psalm," as well as a patriotic piece for chorus and orchestra by George W. Chadwick, entitled "Land of Our Hearts."

This chorus, which I presume to be the organization trained by Stephen Townsend, although the program is silent, has participated at several Symphony concerts during the past two seasons, and not only sings with a beautiful quality of tune, but with great precision and skillful contrasts. Against such a band as the Boston Symphony Orchestra it is unable to get some of the climatic effects that a chorus twice as large would secure, but its work on the whole deserves the highest praise.

Much enthusiasm greeted the playing of the airs of the Allies, culminating in that wondrous hymn of Liberty, the "Marseillaise," led as it was with fervor and devotion by Monsieur Rabaud.

Mr. Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts" is based upon a poem by John H. Ingram. It is intended to intone the moods of the North, South, East and West. Like all Chadwick works its orchestration was graceful and some of the choral effects fine but the melodies could hardly be called inspired.

Next came Bizet's very noble and intensely dramatic overture "Patrie," written by the composer of Carmen at a time when France was still groaning over her sufferings and wounds of 1870.

There is a very silly discussion, by the way, as to whether the French word Patrie should be translated into English as "Country," instead of Fatherland, because of the Teutonic monopoly of that word. Patria in Latin and Patrie in French mean the "land of one fathers." It means exactly to a Frenchman what Vaterland used to mean to the Germans before they went insane.

Verdi's "Te Deum" had never before been sung at the Symphony concerts, nor had the Franck Psalm.

Verdi was eighty-four years old when he wrote the "Te Deum," but it is one of the mightiest and most wonderful works of devotion in existence. Not as operatic as the Manzoni "Requiem," it falls little behind it in fine dramatic effects.

And the short "Hymn of Praise" by Cesar Franck is a pure burst of melodic joy.

TRAVELER DECEMBER 31

SYMPHONY GIVES VICTORY CONCERT

Patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts enjoyed a concert yesterday afternoon without parallel in the history of the orchestra. It was in celebration of the close of the year of victory, and naturally the program was largely of a patriotic character. The orchestra had the assistance of Stephen Townsend's admirable chorus of some 200 voices, which chorus is fast becoming known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra chorus.

The program opened with the playing of the national airs of America, Belgium, Great Britain, Italy and France in the order named, the chorus singing the words, "The Star Spangled Banner."

It is always a pleasure to hear these excellent singers. It was doubly so yesterday afternoon, for one and all seemed inspired by the occasion. The orchestra, too, appeared to be "in the vein," crowded though the players were by the large body of singers on the stage. Mr. Rabaud could well afford to feel satisfied for he has never been heard here to better advantage.

Bizet's dramatic overture, "Patrie"; Verdi's "Te Deum" for double chorus and orchestra; Mr. Rabaud's arrangement of music found in a virginal book of Queen Elizabeth; Franck's "Psalm 150" for chorus, orchestra and organ, and "America" made up a concert that will long be remembered. No small item in the success of the afternoon was the excellent organ playing of Albert Snow.

The concert took the place of the first scheduled concert of the season, Oct. 11, which had to be omitted on account of the epidemic.

FRANCE HONORS SYMPHONY LEADER

The news has just come overseas of the election of Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the highest honor a musician can hold in France—member of "L'Institute de France."

The announcement was made at the rehearsal this morning by W. H. Brennan, business manager of the orchestra, who requested Mr. Longy to conduct the Marseillaise in tribute, and the occasion became a demonstration.

The "Institute" comprises five chambers for the vari us fine arts. Its membership is fixed at 40, and is for life. Upon the musical section are but a handful of the first composers of France, such as Saint Saens and Charpentier, and Mr. Rabaud, elected on his merits as a composer, is the only conductor to hold the honor.

JANUARY 1.

RABAUD BECOMES FRENCH 'IMMORTAL'

Symphony Conductor Wins Highest Honor for Musician

The news has just come overseas of the election of Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to the highest post of honor a musician can hold in France—member of L'Institute de France. When W. H. Brennan, the manager, announced the fact at the rehearsal yesterday, he requested Mr. Longy, the first oboist, to conduct the "Marseillaise" in tribute, and the occasion became a demonstration.

Under the Institute is the Academie des Beaux Arts, comprising five chambers for the various fine arts. The membership of the Academy is fixed at 40, and is for life—"the forty immortals." they are called. Of these, there are always six musical composers, judges of the Prix de Rome. These are at present Saint-Saens, Dubois, Paladilhe, Faure, Carpentier, and now Rabaud, replacing Widor, who in turn has become secretaire perpetuelle. Thus Mr. Rabaud, elected on his merits as composer, is the only conductor to hold the honor.

HERALD DECEMBER 31.

9TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Chorus Assists in Celebrating Close of Year of Victory

NATIONAL AIRS OF ALLIES ON PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestra was assisted by a chorus prepared by Stephen Townsend. The concert celebrated the close of the year of victory. The program was as follows: National airs of the United States, Belgium, England, Italy, France; Chadwick, "Land of Our Hearts," for chorus and orchestra (first time in Boston); Bizet, "Patrie," dramatic overture; Verdi, "Te Deum," for double chorus and orchestra (first time at these concerts); Barnaby and anonymous English composers of the 16th century, Suite No. 3, from the stage music arranged by Mr. Rabaud for the production of "Le Marchand de Venise" in Paris; Cesar Franck, Psalm CL., for chorus, orchestra and organ (first time at these concerts); "America."

There was a large audience, but the seats of many subscribers were filled by others, and, strange to say, there were many vacant seats in the second balcony.

The concert as a whole was tame and a disappointment. Even the patriotic hymns of the allied nations aroused little enthusiasm. There was a slight crescendo of applause during the playing. The heartiest manifestation of joy followed the Marseillaise, and yet, taken at a little slower pace than that chosen by Mr. Messager, the Marseillaise—"luckiest musical composition ever promulgated; the sound of which will make the blood tingle in men's veins," to quote Carlyle—was not so spirited and flaming as when it was played here con amore by the Paris Conservatory Orchestra two months ago.

Mr. Rabaud planned the program so that the United States, France, Italy, England and Belgium should be represented. As Russia's heroic soldiers in the early years of the war alarmed the Germans and gave the English time to form a second army, Russia, theoretically, should have been heard in music. Alas, what is Russia today? What has she been since the Revolution and the substitution of a weak tune by Gretchaninoff for the superb National Hymn associated with the Tsar?

For the United States, Mr. Chadwick's unpretentious and patriotic hymn, "Land of Our Hearts," was chosen; it was sung sonorously by the chorus and well received by the audience.

Verdi's noble and profoundly impressive "Te Deum" was a doubly appropriate selection. It is to be regretted that the choral performance was timid and generally ineffective. It too plainly showed the lack of confidence that results from insufficient preparation. A work like this "Te Deum" is not to be treated in Mr. Wemmick fashion "Hullo, here's a 'Te Deum'; let's sing it." There was not sufficient time for thorough rehearsal between the announcement of [illegible] performance was, it was a pleasure to hear Verdi's music again, an extraordinary work for the Verdi of "Aida" and the "Requiem," an almost incredible work for the Verdi of 84 or 85 years. How the significance of the text inspired him with an imposing simplicity of expression! The grandeur of "The Father of an Infinite Majesty"; the ineffable beauty of "Also the Holy Ghost the Comforter," the monotone "Day by Day We Magnify Thee," the wonderful "O Lord Have Mercy," and the marvelous ending in which the hope of the world is voiced clamorously, with the following few orchestral chords, pianissimo, never to be forgotten—these are only a few of the glories in this dramatico-musical composition.

Cesar Franck's Psalm, which gains its effect with the orchestral accompaniment, is straightforward jubilation. Here the task of the chorus was comparatively easy.

Bizet's "Patrie," written shortly after the Franco-Prussian war, was again an appropriate selection, expressing the martial spirit, the grief, the indomitable courage of the French; yet one wished that Bizet had invented music more worthy the composer of "Carmen" and "L'Arlesienne." The overture was written to order. Some of the pages are trivial, indeed; some are only bombast. Only here and there does one recognize the better Bizet, whose letters as a soldier in 1870 are more eloquent than this tonal expression of feeling.

Mr. Rabaud's Suite shows his taste in selection from the old English composers and his skill in editing and arranging the pieces, without the foolish reverence that respects the archaism that is synonymous with dulness in modern ears; without the impertinent modernization that takes away the delicate and delightful flavor of old songs and dance tunes. The opening Maestoso is distinctively English in its formality and ruggedness. The gems of the Suite are the Moderato by Farnaby and the Andante by an unknown composer of Elizabethan days. The Suite found immediate favor.

This concert which took the place of that announced for Oct. 11 and deferred on account of the influenza, will be repeated tonight.

The program of the concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 3, 4, is as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Antar," symphony No. 2; Beethoven, violin concerto (Mr. Heifetz, violinist); Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole.

GLOBE DECEMBER 31

VICTORY PROGRAM AT THE SYMPHONY

National Anthems of the Allies Superbly Played and Sung

Yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one in the regular series which was not given at the beginning of the season in October, and the program arranged by Mr Rabaud was in the nature of a musical celebration at the close of the year in honor of the victory of the Allies. Patriotic selections dominated the program and the orchestra was assisted by a large group of singers who had been coached by Mr Stephen Townsend, the well-known baritone. The performance will be repeated this evening.

It is an unusual thing to see nearly a dozen numbers scheduled at a Symphony concert; but circumstances warranted the innovation, and certainly it showed the catholicity of Mr Rabaud's conductorship.

Evidently he didn't apply any hard and fast rule as to what music was considered by some musicians as foreign to a "symphonic atmosphere." Peace and patriotism in song was good enough at this time. And so the program was made up of famous and familiar tunes of five Nations, Prof Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts," Bizet's "Patrie" overture, Verdi's "Te Deum," Mr Rabaud's arrangement of 16th century melodies, Franck's 150th Psalm, with "America" for the finale of the afternoon. Not classical, of course, but enjoyable and highly appreciated by an audience that filled every seat.

It was a spirited and joyous occasion from first to last. The first five numbers were played with orchestra, chorus and audience standing. "The Star Spangled Banner" was sung, the anthems of Belgium, England, Italy and France were instrumental pieces and all received spontaneous tributes of hearty plaudits.

The gentler and more solemn moods of Prof Chadwick's patriotic hymn formed a fine contrast to the before mentioned numbers. The performance by orchestra and chorus was sympathetic and effective. Bizet's fiery, pulsating "Patrie" went with the necessary verve and the Verdi "Te Deum" and Franck's psalm were given with superb, well blended association by voices and instruments.

The orchestral work in Mr Rabaud's arrangements made the old-fashioned suite delightfully piquant and interesting, the body of strings showing up notably well. The performance of "America" closed the afternoon with a voluminous burst of song.

MISCHA LEVITSKI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Mischa Levitzki, an unusually gifted young pianist, was soloist with the Boston Symphony. He is a twenty-year-old Russian youth who received his early education in this country and returned to Europe for his initial successes.

He played the Saint Saens Concerto No. 2, a work which hasn't been worked to death recently, which is ornate, picturesque, melodious and something more than an opportunity for a pianist to show off. This piece he played with great intelligence, technical brilliancy and assurance, and fine effect. The audience recalled him half a dozen times.

KNOWN AS COMPOSER.

For the first time we heard an important work by Henri Rabaud, the new conductor. Rabaud is even more renowned abroad as a conmposer than a conductor and his "La Procession Nocturne" is one of his best works.

This piece describes in music a weird poem by the crazy Hungarian poet Lenau, which [illegible] passing through a gloomy forest by night and meeting there a religious procession. As it passes and leaves him in darkness he feels his own doom and sobs bitterly.

ADMIRABLE COLOR.

This narrative is rather more faithfully painted than most tone poems. The gloom and mystery of the forest is admirably tinted, while the devotion of the weird religious procession which approaches, passes and dies away is equally striking.

Schumann's Fourth Symphony, a short and inspiring work, and Beethoven's Third Leonore Overture, a masterpiece of grace and elegance, completed the program. The orchestra played with beautiful precision, while Rabaud, though by no means a graceful conductor to watch, never fails to get just what effects he desires.

HERALD, DECEMBER 28.

RABAUD MAKES OLD MUSIC LIVE

Departs from Perfunctory Reading of Schumann at Symphony Concert

LEVITZKI HEARD WITH ORCHESTRA

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, symphony No. 4, D minor; Rabaud, "La Procession Nocturne," symphonic poem (after Lenau's "Faust")—first time at these concerts; Saint-Saens, piano concerto No. 2, G minor; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore" No. 3.

Mr. Nikisch, a romantic conductor, gave a singularly romantic interpretation of Schumann's symphony in D minor. The music appealed to him strongly, as did Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The performance of these two works was the crowning glory of his career in Boston. After his departure there were many performances of this symphony; some highly respectable and therefore ineffective, some curiously unintelligent and dull. His successors unfortunately regarded the symphony as "a classic," forgetting the fact that the romanticist of one generation, if he has a spark of genius or even conspicuous talent, is a classic in the eyes of the generation following; but the works of this "classic" composer should still be performed in the romantic spirit. Thus the occasional bombast, the extravagance of the Berlioz of the "Hernani" and "Antony" period should be defiantly expressed. So with Schumann. Yet too many conductors treat a symphony by him as though they were exhibiting a corpse and calling attention to the beauty of its features in death. They are afraid of disturbing the body. This symphony is not dead; its spirit did not die with Schumann.

Spirit of Music Prevails

Mr. Rabaud, fortunately for the audience, looks on the symphony as living music; as romantic in spite of the years. There was nothing perfunctory in the performance; there was no trace of the required respect of the professional mourner in the funeral chamber or at the grave. For once the spirit of the music prevailed over its material body. No conductor can change certain awkward passages in the symphony or reorchestrate it in the performance; but Mr. Rabaud made the hearer forget Schumann's deficiencies, by bringing out fully the beauty of the musical thought. Take, for instance, the haunting Trio of the Scherzo. No conductor here has so comprehended its rhythmic character, the melancholy, so wistful, so contemplative, so peculiarly Schumannesque since Mr. Nikisch left us. The symphony gained greatly by being played without pauses between the movements as the composer directed.

"La Procession Nocturne" is illustrative of an episode in Lenau's "Faust." The symphonic poem was performed here 15 years ago by the Orchestral Club under Mr. Longy. There has also been a performance by the New England Concervatory Orchestra. The work was brought out in Paris in 1899. It shows the sensitive, impressionable nature of an accomplished musician, an imaginative composer whose technical skill allows him to create at once a mood, to maintain it without inducing monotony, to re-establish the mood after an ecclesiastically impressive middle section. The effects are gained by artfully simple means, a sober use of musical material; but the sobriety is not for a moment academic. The moods of Nature and of Faust are suggested without any atempts at bald realism. The despair of Faust is not frenzy. The religious procession seen by him, the solemn hymn as it swells and dies away—these furnish the contrast to the portrayal of the night, the stillness of the forest, the gloomy Faust as he envies the happiness of those singing the sacred hymn. The audience was quick to appreciate the charm of the music and the perfection of the performance. The composer was recalled several times.

Praise Levitzki's Playing

Young Mr. Levitzki has given three recitals in Boston. Yesterday he played here for the first time with the orchestra, and gave a delightful performance of Saint-Saens's almost too familiar concerto. He played the first movement of pseudo-Bach character in the appropriately dignified manner, not endeavoring to infuse the emotional quality that is inherently lacking, but giving due importance to melodic figures, displaying strength and a clear and charming touch. In the other movements, the clarity, the grace and the fleetness were noteworthy. We have not heard for many years so well-balanced and so interesting a reading of this concerto, a performance wholly in keeping with the character of the music.

By this time, no experienced and unprejudiced hearer has any doubt about the ability of Mr. Rabaud as an interpreter of Beethoven. His interpretations neither conventional nor extravagant are vital and illuminating, as was Mr. Rachmaninoff's treatment of music by Mozart and Beethoven not long ago.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of the concerts next Monday afternoon and Tuesday evening will include national airs of Belgium, England, France, Italy and the United States; these choral works—Verdi's "Te Deum," Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts," Cesar Franck's Psalm CL., and these orchestral works: Bizet's overture "Patrie" and the third suite of music by composers represented in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book (16th century) derived from the stage music arranged by Rabaud for a performance of "The Merchant of Venice" in Paris.

The program of the concerts for J[illegible] comprises the "Antar" symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff; Beethoven's [illegible] concerto (Mr. Heifitz, violinist a[illegible] vel's "Raspodie Espagnole."

RECORD, DECEMBER 31

SYMPHONY HAS CELEBRATION OF YEAR OF VICTORY

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Special concert by the orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, and a large chorus, celebrating the close of the year of victory.

Star Spangled Banner
La Brabanconne
God Save the King
Marcia Reale Italiana
La Marseillaise

G. W. Chadwick (b. Lowell, Mass., 1854)—"Land of Our Hearts," Patriotic Hymn (to words by John Hall Ingham)
Chorus and Orchestra

G. Bizet (b. Paris, France, 1838)—"Patrie," Dramatic Overture.

G. Verdi (b. Roncole, Italy, 1813)—Te Deum
Double Chorus and Orchestra

Giles Farnaby (b. Truro, Eng., 1568 (?) and anonymous English composers, Suite of the XVIth Century (Arranged by Henri Rabaud)
Maestoso. Moderato. Allegro. Andante. Maestoso.

C. Franck (b. Liege, Belgium, 1822)—Psalm CL.
Chorus, Orchestra and Organ
America
Chorus, Orchestra and Organ

Never was there a symphony concert given by the Boston Orchestra that has less the air of a symphony concert than this. The musicians were in their familiar places. The audience was as usual, excepting that ordinarily vacant places were filled because of the large number of persons attending. After that usual conditions stopped. There was no symphony; there was no symphonic poem. This symphony concert was like "Hamlet" with Hamlet and Ophelia missing. The war has caused many changes—certainly none more striking in Boston social and artistic life than in offering such a program at a symphony concert.

Mr. Rabaud's music was delightful. He has arranged three orchestral suites from the music he provided for Lucien Nepoty's version of "The Merchant of Venice" when it was produced at the Theatre Antoine in Paris in 1916-7. He turned to the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, one of the several MS collections of clavier music that was brought together in the Elizabethan period, for material. This music has a delightful comedy element. Hearing it one can imagine much of it used as overture or incidental music. Such music would lend itself deliciously to "As You Like It" or "Twelfth Night" as well as "The Merchant." The orchestration was made for instruments that are not anachronistic—the oboe the bassoon, the trumpet, the harp, organ and strings. It has sufficient odd to carry well. It is excellently proportioned, but it is never unduly modern. The introduction and the andante, the fourth section, were especially ingratiating.

Mr. Chadwick's composition was based on a poem by John Hall Ingham, a Philadelphia lawyer. The verses are patriotic verses without any marked distinction. They were first used by Mr. Chadwick in his class in composition at the N. E. Conservatory of Music as exercises in vocal writing. Later Mr. Chadwick made the arrangement heard yesterday. The work is obviously that of a trained musician, a scholarly example of writing for chorus and orchestra.

The chorus in patriotic airs and in the Verdi and Franck numbers sang with fair precision and quality of tone. The volume of tone was not excessive. It is a fact, however, that the choral numbers with choral singing, somewhat of a novelty at these concerts, did not give the pleasure that Ma. Rabaud's new work and the old "Patrie" overture gave. The Bizet overture was played with less brilliancy than Mr. Messager brought to it when he was here recently, but it was played with such care that its music assumed a new value. Mr. Rabaud refined and rather glorified a well made, but not great, work.

French Institute Honors Rabaud

The news has just come overseas of the election of Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the highest post of honor a musician can hold in France—member of "L'Institut de France."

The announcement was made at the rehearsal this morning by W. H. Brennan, who requested Mr. Longy to conduct La Marseillaise in tribute, and the occasion became a demonstration.

The "Institute" comprises five chambers for the various fine arts. Its membership is fixed at 40, and is for life. Upon the musical section are but a handful of the first composers of France, such as Saint Saens and Charpentier, and Rabaud, elected on his merits as a composer, is the only conductor to hold the honor.

AMERICAN, DECEMBER 31

SYMPHONY HAS CELEBRATION OF VICTORY

By FRED J. McISAAC

To celebrate the close of the year of victory the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a special concert yesterday afternoon which will be repeated tonight.

The participation of a chorus of 150 enabled Conductor Rabaud to place upon his program such wonderful hymns of joy as Verdi's "Te Deum" and Franck's "One Hundred Fiftieth Psalm," as well as a patriotic piece for chorus and orchestra by George W. Chadwick, entitled "Land of Our Hearts."

This chorus, which I presume to be the organization trained by Stephen Townsend, although the program is silent, has participated at several Symphony concerts during the past two seasons, and not only sings with a beautiful quality of tune, but with great precision and skillful contrasts. Against such a band as the Boston Symphony Orchestra it is unable to get some of the climatic effects that a chorus twice as large would secure, but its work on the whole deserves the highest praise.

Much enthusiasm greeted the playing of the airs of the Allies, culminating in that wondrous hymn of Liberty, the "Marseillaise," led as it was with fervor and devotion by Monsieur Rabaud.

Mr. Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts" is based upon a poem by John H. Ingram. It is intended to intone the moods of the North, South, East and West. Like all Chadwick works its orchestration was graceful and some of the choral effects fine but the melodies could hardly be called inspired.

Next came Bizet's very noble and intensely dramatic overture "Patrie," written by the composer of Carmen at a time when France was still groaning over her sufferings and wounds of 1870.

There is a very silly discussion, by the way, as to whether the French word Patrie should be translated into English as "Country," instead of Fatherland, because of the Teutonic monopoly of that word. Patria in Latin and Patrie in French mean the "land of one fathers." It means exactly to a Frenchman what Vaterland used to mean to the Germans before they went insane.

Verdi's "Te Deum" had never before been sung at the Symphony concerts, nor had the Franck Psalm.

Verdi was eighty-four years old when he wrote the "Te Deum," but it is one of the mightiest and most wonderful works of devotion in existence. Not as operatic as the Manzoni "Requiem," it falls little behind it in fine dramatic effects.

And the short "Hymn of Praise" by Cesar Franck is a pure burst of melodic joy.

TRAVELER DECEMBER 31

SYMPHONY GIVES VICTORY CONCERT

Patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts enjoyed a concert yesterday afternoon without parallel in the history of the orchestra. It was in celebration of the close of the year of victory, and naturally the program was largely of a patriotic character. The orchestra had the assistance of Stephen Townsend's admirable chorus of some 200 voices, which chorus is fast becoming known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra chorus.

The program opened with the playing of the national airs of America, Belgium, Great Britain, Italy and France in the order named, the chorus singing the words, "The Star Spangled Banner."

It is always a pleasure to hear these excellent singers. It was doubly so yesterday afternoon, for one and all seemed inspired by the occasion. The orchestra, too, appeared to be "in the vein," crowded though the players were by the large body of singers on the stage. Mr. Rabaud could well afford to feel satisfied for he has never been heard here to better advantage.

Bizet's dramatic overture, "Patrie"; Verdi's "Te Deum" for double chorus and orchestra; Mr. Rabaud's arrangement of music found in a virginal book of Queen Elizabeth; Franck's "Psalm 150" for chorus, orchestra and organ, and "America" made up a concert that will long be remembered. No small item in the success of the afternoon was the excellent organ playing of Albert Snow.

The concert took the place of the first scheduled concert of the season, Oct. 11, which had to be omitted on account of the epidemic.

Whi

The news has just come overseas of the election of Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the highest honor a musician can hold in France—member of "L'Institute de France."

The announcement was made at the rehearsal this morning by W. H. Brennan, business manager of the orchestra, who requested Mr. Longy to conduct the Marseillaise in tribute, and the occasion became a demonstration.

The "Institute" comprises five chambers for the vari us fine arts. Its member-

JANUARY 1.

RABAUD BECOMES FRENCH 'IMMORTAL'

Symphony Conductor Wins Highest Honor for Musician

The news has just come overseas of the election of Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to the highest post of honor a musician can hold in France—member of L'Institute de France. When W. H. Brennan, the manager, announced the fact at the rehearsal yesterday, he requested Mr. Longy, the first oboist, to conduct the "Marseillaise" in tribute, and the occasion became a demonstration.

Under the Institute is the Academie des Beaux Arts, comprising five chambers for the various fine arts. The membership of the Academy is fixed at 40, and is for life—"the forty immortals." they are called. Of these, there are always six musical composers, judges of the Prix de Rome. These are at present Saint-Saens, Dubois, Paladilhe, Faure, Carpentier, and now Rabaud, replacing Widor, who in turn has become secretaire perpetuelle. Thus Mr. Rabaud, elected on his merits as composer, is the only conductor to hold the honor.

HERALD DECEMBER 31.

9TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Chorus Assists in Celebrating Close of Year of Victory

NATIONAL AIRS OF ALLIES ON PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestra was assisted by a chorus prepared by Stephen Townsend. The concert celebrated the close of the year of victory. The program was as follows: National airs of the United States, Belgium, England, Italy, France; Chadwick, "Land of Our Hearts," for chorus and orchestra (first time in Boston); Bizet, "Patrie," dramatic overture; Verdi, "Te Deum," for double chorus and orchestra (first time at these concerts); Barnaby and anonymous English composers of the 16th century, Suite No. 3, from the stage music arranged by Mr. Rabaud for the production of "Le Marchand de Venise" in Paris; Cesar Franck, Psalm CL., for chorus, orchestra and organ (first time at these concerts); "America."

There was a large audience, but the seats of many subscribers were filled by others, and, strange to say, there were many vacant seats in the second balcony.

The concert as a whole was tame and a disappointment. Even the patriotic hymns of the allied nations aroused little enthusiasm. There was a slight crescendo of applause during the playing. The heartiest manifestation of joy followed the Marseillaise, and yet, taken at a little slower pace than that chosen by Mr. Messager, the Marseillaise—"luckiest musical composition ever promulgated; the sound of which will make the blood tingle in men's veins," to quote Carlyle—was not so spirited and flaming as when it was played here con amore by the Paris Conservatory Orchestra two months ago.

Mr. Rabaud planned the program so that the United States, France, Italy, England and Belgium should be represented. As Russia's heroic soldiers in the early years of the war alarmed the Germans and gave the English time to form a second army, Russia, theoretically, should have been heard in music. Alas, what is Russia today? What has she been since the Revolution and the substitution of a weak tune by Gretchaninoff for the superb National Hymn associated with the Tsar?

For the United States, Mr. Chadwick's unpretentious and patriotic hymn, "Land of Our Hearts," was chosen; it was sung sonorously by the chorus and well received by the audience.

Verdi's noble and profoundly impressive "Te Deum" was a doubly appropriate selection. It is to be regretted that the choral performance was timid and generally ineffective. It too plainly showed the lack of confidence that results from insufficient preparation. A work like this "Te Deum" is not to be treated in Mr. Wemmick fashion "Hullo, here's a 'Te Deum'; let's sing it." There was not sufficient time for thorough rehearsal between the announcement of the concert and the day of performance. Nor is this "Te Deum" a work for many of the amateurs that were in the chorus, a work that demands picked singers, trained musicians with independent voices; not merely amiable singers following the more experienced in their neighborhood. Yet, pale as the choral performance was, it was a pleasure to hear Verdi's music again, an extraordinary work for the Verdi of "Aida" and the "Requiem," an almost incredible work for the Verdi of 84 or 85 years. How the significance of the text inspired him with an imposing simplicity of expression! The grandeur of "The Father of an Infinite Majesty"; the ineffable beauty of "Also the Holy Ghost the Comforter," the monotone "Day by Day We Magnify Thee," the wonderful "O Lord Have Mercy," and the marvelous ending in which the hope of the world is voiced clamorously, with the following few orchestral chords, pianissimo, never to be forgotten—these are only a few of the glories in this dramatico-musical composition.

Cesar Franck's Psalm, which gains in effect with the orchestral accompaniment, is straightforward jubilation. Here the task of the chorus was comparatively easy.

Bizet's "Patrie," written shortly after the Franco-Prussian war, was again an appropriate selection, expressing the martial spirit, the grief, the indomitable courage of the French; yet one wished that Bizet had invented music more worthy the composer of "Carmen" and "L'Arlesienne." The overture was written to order. Some of the pages are trivial, indeed; some are only bombast. Only here and there does one recognize the better Bizet, whose letters as a soldier in 1870 are more eloquent than this tonal expression of feeling.

Mr. Rabaud's Suite shows his taste in selection from the old English composers and his skill in editing and arranging the pieces, without the foolish reverence that respects the archaism that is synonymous with dulness in modern ears; without the impertinent modernization that takes away the delicate and delightful flavor of old songs and dance tunes. The opening Maestoso is distinctively English in its formality and ruggedness. The gems of the Suite are the Moderato by Farnaby and the Andante by an unknown composer of Elizabethan days. The Suite found immediate favor.

This concert which took the place of that announced for Oct. 11 and deferred on account of the influenza, will be repeated tonight.

The program of the concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 3, 4, is as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Antar," symphony No. 2; Beethoven, violin concerto (Mr. Heifetz, violinist); Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole.

GLOBE DECEMBER 31

VICTORY PROGRAM AT THE SYMPHONY

National Anthems of the Allies Superbly Played and Sung

Yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one in the regular series which was not given at the beginning of the season in October, and the program arranged by Mr Rabaud was in the nature of a musical celebration at the close of the year in honor of the victory of the Allies. Patriotic selections dominated the program and the orchestra was assisted by a large group of singers who had been coached by Mr Stephen Townsend, the well-known baritone. The performance will be repeated this evening.

It is an unusual thing to see nearly a dozen numbers scheduled at a Symphony concert; but circumstances warranted the innovation, and certainly it showed the catholicity of Mr Rabaud's conductorship.

Evidently he didn't apply any hard and fast rule as to what music was considered by some musicians as foreign to a "symphonic atmosphere." Peace and patriotism in song was good enough at this time. And so the program was made up of famous and familiar tunes of five Nations, Prof Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts," Bizet's "Patrie" overture, Verdi's "Te Deum," Mr Rabaud's arrangement of 16th century melodies, Franck's 150th Psalm, with "America" for the finale of the afternoon. Not classical, of course, but enjoyable and highly appreciated by an audience that filled every seat.

It was a spirited and joyous occasion from first to last. The first five numbers were played with orchestra, chorus and audience standing. "The Star Spangled Banner" was sung, the anthems of Belgium, England, Italy and France were instrumental pieces and all received spontaneous tributes of hearty plaudits.

The gentler and more solemn moods of Prof Chadwick's patriotic hymn formed a fine contrast to the before mentioned numbers. The performance by orchestra and chorus was sympathetic and effective. Bizet's fiery, pulsating "Patrie" went with the necessary verve and the Verdi "Te Deum" and Franck's psalm were given with superb, well blended association by voices and instruments.

The orchestral work in Mr Rabaud's arrangements made the old-fashioned suite delightfully piquant and interesting, the body of strings showing up notably well. The performance of "America" closed the afternoon with a voluminous burst of song.

MISCHA LEVITSKI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Mischa Levitzki, an unusually gifted young pianist, was soloist with the Boston Symphony. He is a twenty-year-old Russian youth who received his early education in this country and returned to Europe for his initial successes.

He played the Saint Saens Concerto No. 2, a work which hasn't been worked to death recently, which is ornate, picturesque, melodious and something more than an opportunity for a pianist to show off. This piece he played with great intelligence, technical brilliancy and assurance, and fine effect. The audience recalled him half a dozen times.

KNOWN AS COMPOSER.

For the first time we heard an important work by Henri Rabaud, the new conductor. Rabaud is even more renowned abroad as a conmposer than a conductor and his "La Procession Nocturne" is one of his best works.

This piece describes in music a weird poem by the crazy Hungarian poet Lenau, which [illegible] passing through a gloomy forest [illegible] night and meeting there a religio[illegible] procession. As it passes and leaves him in darkness he feels his own doom and sobs bitterly.

ADMIRABLE COLOR.

This narrative is rather more faithfully painted than most tone poems. The gloom and mystery of the forest is admirably tinted, while the devotion of the weird religious procession which approaches, passes and dies away is equally striking.

Schumann's Fourth Symphony, a short and inspiring work, and Beethoven's Third Leonore Overture, a masterpiece of grace and elegance, completed the program. The orchestra played with beautiful precision, while Rabaud, though by no means a graceful conductor to watch, never fails to get just what effects he desires.

REDUCTION RATIO 13x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A4

A5

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

TRANSCRIPT DECEMBER 31

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RECORD OF A DISILLUSIONIZING AFTERNOON

A "Celebration of the Close of the Year of Victory" That Proved but Perfunctory Occasion — A Singular Audience from Which Subscribers Were Conspicuously Absent—Little Interesting or Impressive Music and All in Routine Performance—A Chorus Too Hastily Assembled and Prepared

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT of yesterday afternoon—first of a pair, as the programme-book put it, "to celebrate the year of victory"—was better designed than accomplished. It replaced the concert announced for Oct. 11 last and postponed because of the prevalance of influenza, as the repetition, this evening, will replace the concert of Oct. 12. By so much the occasion fulfilled its purpose, since it lessened by a week the prolongation of the series to the middle of May in amends for omitted concerts. Otherwise, it fell far short of intent. To suit the plan, the programme began with the playing by the orchestra of the national hymns of the United States, Belgium, Britain, Italy and France; it proceeded with three pieces for chorus with orchestra —"Land of Our Hearts: A Patriotic Hymn" written by the American, Mr. Chadwick; a setting of the Te Deum in the offices of the church by the Italian, Verdi; and a setting of the last Psalm—music of triumphant rejoicing—by the Franco-Belgian Franck. Between these were interspersed two orchestral pieces—Bizet's concert overture, "Patrie" and a short Suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from old English tunes of the sixteenth century and originally part of the incidental music to Monsieur Gémier's reproduction of Shakspeare's comedy, "The Merchant of Venice" at Paris in 1916. To conclude as the old playbills had it, orchestra, organ, chorus and audience sounded one stanza of the hymn, "America." So were the numbers of the day distributed among the United States and the co-belligerent nations against Germany; so were these numbers designed to stir appropriate emotions in the segment of the victor dwelling in and around Boston and assembling in Symphony Hall; so were the Symphony Concerts to be linked into what it is now fashionable to call "the communal life."

Whatever the outcome may be this evening—the more appropriate time for such "celebration"—the number and the quality of the audience, Monday afternoon, visibly defeated the last of these purposes. The upper balcony, open to "the community," at twenty-eight cents per head, held only a fringe of listeners whereas at an ordinary Symphony Concert, it is filled, usually, to the last seat. In the lower balcony and in the parquet the subscribers to the afternoon concerts seemed few and far between, having evidently bestowed their tickets hither and yon until the auditorium resembled what in the palmy days of the Boston Opera used to be known as "a poor relations night." The places disposable for each concert were occupied by a still more miscellaneous company, not too much at ease in its surroundings and plainly disappointed in the relative tameness of the proceedings as a "celebration." The whole audience, indeed, declined to be stirred even by the preliminary national hymns. Joined only perfunctorily in the singing of "America," returned to the other numbers of the day only routine applause. Whatever the outcome this evening—to repeat a necessary proviso—substantial evidence was not lacking yesterday that the public of the afternoon concerts prefers the Symphony Orchestra as a cosmopolitan medium for the performance of symphonic music and not as instrument for "celebrating the close of the year of victory." Possibly that public, if it ever reflects upon the matter at all, may ever believe that, playing such music from all lands week in and week out from October to May, the Symphony Orchestra sufficiently serves and enriches "the communal life."

In the second place, with the exception of Verdi's loftily imagined and eloquently written setting of the Te Deum—not to "celebrate" anything but because the beauty and the majesty of the hymn of praise deeply stirred him—the music of the afternoon as music seldom rose above commonplace. The national hymns evoke in themselves and by habit in the hearers the emotions they were designed to summon; the least sensitive thereto may hardly hear "La Marseillase" played, especially in the presence of French troops, without answering thrill. But heard as they were Monday afternoon, one after another, "off the reel," on a purely arbitrary occasion, before an unexcited and unexcitable audience, they seemed hardly the sort of musical stuff upon which the Symphony Orchestra exercises its abilities or its audiences their ears. Mr. Chadwick's "hymn" sounded neither better nor worse than the "pot-boiler" of a practised composer. It clothes simple, straightforward elemental verses —"Land of the North, Land of the South, Land of the East, Land of the West, Land of Our Hearts" and so forth—in as simple, straightforward, elementary music, skilfully and "gratefully" written for the singing chorus, mechanically accompanied by the orchestra—a frank pièce d'occasion designed for general usage, with little imagination, with no distinction. Franck's setting of the one hundred and fiftieth Psalm is music of finer craftsmanship and warmer feeling; as direct, if not quite so elementary; of the tonal prose of the organist of Sainte-Clothilde and not of the tonal poetry, like Verdi's setting of the Te Deum, of an illustrious composer.

Until Bizet's overture, "Patrie," became haloed to many an ear by new association with a desolate but warlike France, it passed intrinsically for one of his routine pieces seldom to be resurrected in the concert-room when his masterly music to "L'Arlésienne," for example—to say nothing of orchestral fragments of "Carmen" with the fire of feeling and of utterance that Mr. Messager and his Frenchmen from the Conservatory lately infused in Symphony Hall into "La Marseillaise." Mr. Rabaud, besides, was too rigid with it while he was literal to a fault with the overture, "Patrie," which needs all the extraneous heat and glamour a conductor may kindle around it. Only in his own Suite did leader and band seem their usual selves. As for the choral pieces the performance of all three obviously suffered from the fact that the choir, however able, diligent and finely voiced, has lacked time for adequate preparation, for the gaining of the elasticity, the sureness, the confidence, the zest that are half the battle with such music and that were chief glories, in another time, of the Boston Symphony Chorus. In Mr. Chadwick's hymn made to measure, as it were, for the average choir, Mr. Townsend's singers regained not a little of their precision, rhythmic sense of quality of tone, of turn of phrase, mounting progression and expanding climax. They fared well enough with Franck's Psalm, within the limits of competence. But in Verdi's setting of the Te Deum—as exacting as it is beautiful and eloquent in the answers of choir to choir in intervals and transitions that dim the eye and melt the heart, in glowing arcs of exultant, exalted or poignant tone—the choir and indeed Mr. Rabaud seemed only to grope their way along by no means without occasional missteps. Not always did they achieve even the letter of the music. This done, there was naught left in them to summon its spirit. Nor would it be the truth to say that Mr. Rabaud much distinguished himself as a choral conductor. So runs the record of a disillusioning afternoon.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT JANUARY 2,

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Symphony Chorus, Present and Future—An Enlightening Word from a Singer in It—Montemezzi's Opera from d'Annunzio—A Novel French Piece at the Metropolitan

UNFAVORABLE comments in these columns and elsewhere upon the singing of the Symphony Chorus in the concerts of Monday and Tuesday last "to celebrate the close of the year of victory" have drawn an interesting and sugggstive note from a member of Mr. Townsend's choir. If the chorus was ragged—writes N. C. M.—there are two main reasons apparently—one is that Mr. Rabaud does not speak much English; and the other that the chorus had not more than thirty days in which to prepare three pieces, one of which at least needed two months of rehearsing. Therefore, before another appearance of the chorus, these difficulties are likely to be remedied, for Mr. Rabaud, it is to be assumed, will all the time be picking up English; although whether he will acquire enough American idioms to put the "punch" into a company of men and women singers running all the way from professionals to amateurs—there were no Bush Leaguers in the crowd, it appeared—is still a question.

In such a group of singers, the "punch" is the main thing; and Mr. Townsend, who was getting near to success, would have achieved it probably, if he had had even two more full rehearsals in Symphony Hall. There were the first chorus and the second chorus at these concerts, and they were at first drilled separately and then together with two rehearsals on the Symphony Hall stage with the orchestra. But they were not well enough acquainted, chorus to chorus, and part to part to know one another by sight—let alone voice. As is usual in such amateur bodies, moreover, everybody—of the men at least—did not attend all the rehearsals, and instructions given by Mr. Townsend at a certain rehearsal might be wholly unknown by a percentage of the singers—in fact they were. Of course such ignorance did not help, for while nudging a neighboring singer, when he comes in in the wrong place, shuts him off, it does not add appreciably to the artistic success of the production. The writer would not put the burden of sliding easily over certain passages entirely on his singing companions; he admits that, as the boys on thin ice run "tiddledees," he took similar chances now and then. Nobody happened to nudge him, however.

Mr. Townsend was getting the "punch" into his singers, as has been said, but time was lacking. Coming to the full rehearsals in Symphony Hall, we find Mr. Townsend relinquishing the stick to Mr. Rabaud, the stick that the former had, in a sense, been using over the backs of his singers, for he had politely urged the women, and had "cursed out" the men until they all were getting into form. Then the gentler Mr. Rabaud—a man of few (English) words. He may have essayed the language used generally in the United States, but if he did, it was under his breath, for his audible directions to the singers ran something like this—"Allons!" or "Composez—vous," at the end of a piece, or "Au commencement," for a new try at the opening measures. The singers were for the most part so erudite that they understood Mr. Rabaud's French, and if he had continued in that language and given it to them slowly he might have reinforced Mr. Townsend's "punch." For some reason, he didn't do so. He may have thought that they were all as skilful at reading music as his well-trained orchestra. A few of them were, no doubt, but not all; and that was certainly part of the trouble. They hitched along—the poorer readers waiting for the better ones to give them the cue—and more than one giving a sigh of relief when they had come to the concluding "Speravi" of Verdi's "Te Deum"—the "hope" being that the next time they would sing the piece at least no worse.

Tuesday evening's concert went better than that of Monday afternoon, and whether it was on that account or not, the audience was more responsive; and vice versa, a better hand, of course, brings better singing; and given more time for rehearsal, the Symphony Chorus will constantly give a better account of itself, or Mr. Townsend will know the reason why.

But whatever the critics and the audience in general thought of the chorus work, the members of the chorus enjoyed every minute of their stage appearances —with the possible exception of the times they were singing the a capella passages in the "Te Deum"—for it is interesting to be up-stage and to watch the time beaten out, and the response of every individual player. The chorus, therefore, kept as still as mice, when they were not performing, and, in the intermission, many of the men concluded that life could be sustained even if they did not have a smoke.

Such criticism as the singers of the Symphony Chorus have had has been good for them. They will do better on their next appearance, for they will have sufficient time to learn their pieces—or it is safe to say they will not sing. And, it is to be hoped that when they again air their voices in Symphony Hall, the handful of tenors in the Second Chorus will be so disposed that they will not have to sit almost upon the bass drum and tympani.

"The Canine of the Nation"

A suspicion has invaded my consciousness during the past month; like the smell of escaping gas on the premises, it won't be dissipated till the windows are thrown open, admitting fresh air. This is the particular gaseous odor referred to: Time was when plays were "tried on the dog" elsewhere, sometimes in the remote "provinces." Pianists and singers have been known to indulge in a full-dress rehearsal somewhere in Iowa or Pennsylvania. When they made their bow here their initial nervousness had vanished, or, at least, was attenuated. Nowadays, things seem to be ordered otherwise. New York is the canine, the proving ground for players and singers, violinists and pianists of an inartistic calibre that would make creep the scalp of the least critical inhabitant in a mining camp. The question is, Why do these misguided folk do these things? Councillor Brack, in "Hedda Gabler," exclaims: "But people don't do such things!" Alas! the answer is that they do. They fetch to the metropolis their little pint measure of talent, they drink from it in the presence of an invited public, not large, but always enthusiastic, and gather in a few perfunctory press notices, and return to their native town in triumph. They have played or sung in New York. Therefore, they are among the elect. But no one is the gainer thereby except the musical agencies.

This craze for the New York critic's rubber stamp has also transformed the most charming part of the city into a foreign farm where all the nations do congregate. Commerce versus culture, with culture overwhelmingly routed. New York is become the Canine of the nation. It is, in theatrical parlance, the "dog," and by comparison Atlantic City languishes and Oshkosh is envious. [James Huneker in The New York Times.

om WORLD

ddress New York City

ate

PHILHARMONIC PLAYERS IN DIRGE TO ROOSEVELT.

Concert Follows — Rabaud Hears His Own Opera at the Metropolitan.

[illegible] the evening "Marouf" had its turn at the Metropolitan Opera House, at popular prices. Henri Rabaud, its composer, and leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was discovered in the audience, and was induced to appear before the curtain with the singing artists.

[illegible] 50-yard swim, 100-yard swim, 220-yard [illegible] and 200-yard relay race. Mont-

Silhouetted Serenity

Mr Heifetz Playing

From a New and Recent Photograph

(Photograph by Mishkin)

TIMES

s: Washington, D. C.

RABAUD DELIGHTS CONCERT AUDIENCE

The poet as librettist, poetry as the inspiration of symphonic music, prevailed in the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington under the baton of M. Henri Rabaud, given at the National Theater yesterday afternoon before the usual capacity audience. And between two-tone interpretations of the poetic muse, the lovely Mendelssohn Concerto for violin in E minor, was exquisitely played, with Fredric Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist.

With what spirit and vitality M. Rabaud lifts his players! More than at the first concert, given immediately after M. Rabaud assumed leadership of this orchestra, did one feel his individuality and his mastery. Coming as a novelty to Washington, the symphonic trilogy, as it is called, that Vincent D'Indy composed after the dramatic poem, "Wallenstein," of Schiller, is richest in its first movement—the life of the camp of this military hero.

Dramatic it was, animated in the verve of its presto—a sort of fandango—and again charmingly exotic in a melodious serenade, with the first violins and the winds singing its melody. Rich in orchestration, it was with esprit, in lightning changes of mood, a delicacy that was alive—and a brusque humor in the basson fugue —that M. Rabaud tellingly conveyed the scene, bringing it to a thrilling close in the soft crescendo at the end.

Sharp Contrasts Feature.

Sharp contrasts marked the rest of this tone-poem. An andante of repose inwoven with a sherzo; lyric loveliness, martial tumult, and, in the finale, a quality echoing the Catholic ritual with rare beauty. Here again struggle and peace held this melodrama, a graphic distortion of the main theme for the former. The long climax was massively built, though it was not overweighted with musical content.

After program music, graphic scenes in tone, the fair beauty of Mendelssohn, placid, melodious, fluent, brings one out of the introspective and into a welcome land where "beauty is its own excuse for being." The solo part was admirably played by Mr. Fradkin with great purity and suave loveliness, the sheer musical appeal of this music bringing the art of the players into greater relief. The blend was appreciable, between orchestra and solo, the solo instrument ever showing an artistic sense for ensemble, while the orchestra was rare in its blitheness and its caprice, creating a gem of pure music delightfully executed. Mr. Fradkin was recalled many times.

Tribute From Conductor.

An American symphonic work, the Converse setting to the Walt Whitman poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," was gratifying as a tribute from this forceful French conductor in presenting it on his program. The work, though imaginatively played, is overburdened with reiterations, the program scarcely enriched enough, orchestrally, for the theme, and the trumpeter a bit lonely and isolated. The rendition was given with much power dynamically and with forceful climaxes. Sudden transitions in key were unconvincing in their modulations—and why, one asks, a sudden strain of "Marching Through Georgia?"

Two more concerts under M. Rabaud yet remain. They will be awaited with expectance, for this newcomer to America has much to say through his orchestra; and his decisive impress is a real life-spark that animates his players and gains response from his hearers, for, as Whitman says, "Music is what awakes from me at the sound of the instruments."

J. MacB.

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has presented two programs within a week, one of much interest, the other, which by all laws of precedent ought to have been an affair worthy of mark, distinctly tedious. This latter came first, replacing one of the concerts postponed by a late opening of the season. It was advertised to "celebrate the close of the year of victory," and was given on Monday afternoon, Dec. 30, and Tuesday evening, Dec. 31. The chorus, trained by Stephen Townsend, manifested a lack of rehearsal not in evidence on former appearances. The program traversed the national airs of the allied nations, Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts," Bizet's "Patrie" overture, Verdi's "Te Deum," old English composers' works in a suite of the Sixteenth Century arranged by Mr. Rabaud, and Franck's Psalm CL. Of these numbers by far the most interesting was that comprising Mr. Rabaud's homage to England. In this suite he performed the difficult task of keeping archaic music without anachronisms, and this he did partly by orchestrating it with great skill, avoiding instruments of distinctly modern invention, but mostly through his unerring instinct for the fitness of things.

The regular tenth program of the season presented Jascha Heifetz as soloist. He played the Beethoven D major concerto, Op. 61, in a manner that revealed a musical understanding heretofore not in evidence in the programs with which he has been wont to amuse his recital audiences and with an astounding command of technique that brought hearty applause not only from the audience but from the men of the orchestra, and even the conductor himself. So overshadowing was the performance of the concerto that it obliterated the unhealthy, sensual atmosphere of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony which preceded it and took away the flavor of Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" which followed it. The "Antar" symphony made little impression and even the third movement, which is supposed to represent the delights of power, and which is the most understandable of the four, seemed strangely lacking. Verdi has said this sort of thing so much better that other triumphal processions seem led by hobby-horses. The Ravel number is worth a rehearing when it occupies a fortuitous position on a program.

TIMES

: New York City

Rabaud's "Marouf" Sung Again.

Rabaud's "Marouf," an opera in the lighter French style by the Boston Symphony's scholarly conductor, was sung again at the Metropolitan last night, as once before it had been in Brooklyn, on a day when M. Rabaud and his orchestra were visitors to New York. The Frenchman heard his work last month on one of the opera company's visits to the Academy over the river. Last night's repetition on Broadway was at popular prices, and the cast, as usual, contained Mmes. Alda and Howard, Messrs. De Luca, Bada, Chalmers, De Segurola, and Rothier, conducted by Mr. Monteux. Mr. Rabaud was again present last evening, and, going behind the scenes, received an ovation when Mr. De[illegible] and Mme. Alda dragged him on the stage.

[illegible] Rabaud—honestest and ope[illegible] —It is exactly what it purports to be. Monsieur Gémier, the actor-manager, eager to domicile "Shakspeare in France" contrived a reproduction of "The Merchant of Venice" on the Parisian stage in which the play was barely discoverable through thick swathings of scenery, costumes, lights, dances, music and other spectacular paraphernalia. He deputed the scholarly Rabaud to write this music. The composer-conductor opened the music-books of Shakspeare's time, when England was fertile in tunes of its own, and transcribed pieces appropriate to various incidents in the play, for a very small orchestra—a mere group of instruments in the pit of a theatre. More recently he has rescored the numbers heard yesterday as a Suite for the concert-hall and a sizable orchestra. The resulting piece runs in five short movements—the first and the last, being identical, of sonorous voice, free and ample rhythmic stride; the intervening three either songful with frank English melody, a little touched by melancholy, or sprightly with English high spirits. Mr. Rabaud has well preserved the directness, the heartiness, the honesty of this old English music. He rescores it with a sympathetic, resourceful, reticent hand. There he and the Suite stop. Of all the numbers of the day, only it and Verdi's Te Deum were worthy of the higher standards of the Symphony Concerts.

Finally, the performance of no one of these pieces, however it may go this evening, rose above dutiful routine. A cosmopolitan orchestra, as the Symphony Orchestra by auspicious fate has been, is now, and probably ever will be, cannot with the best will in the world, play an [illegible] assortment of national hymns

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 31,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RECORD OF A DISILLUSIONIZING AFTERNOON

A "Celebration of the Close of the Year of Victory" That Proved but Perfunctory Occasion — A Singular Audience from Which Subscribers Were Conspicuously Absent—Little Interesting or Impressive Music and All in Routine Performance—A Chorus Too Hastily Assembled and Prepared

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT of yesterday afternoon—first of a pair, as the programme-book put it, "to celebrate the year of victory"—was better designed than accomplished. It replaced the concert announced for Oct. 11 last and postponed because of the prevalance of influenza, as the repetition, this evening, will replace the concert of Oct. 12. By so much the occasion fulfilled its purpose, since it lessened by a week the prolongation of the series to the middle of May in amends for omitted concerts. Otherwise, it fell far short of intent. To suit the plan, the programme began with the playing by the orchestra of the national hymns of the United States, Belgium, Britain, Italy and France; it proceeded with three pieces for chorus with orchestra —"Land of Our Hearts: A Patriotic Hymn" written by the American, Mr. Chadwick; a setting of the Te Deum in the offices of the church by the Italian, Verdi; and a setting of the last Psalm—music of triumphant rejoicing—by the Franco-Belgian Franck. Between these were interspersed two orchestral pieces—Bizet's concert overture, "Patrie" and a short Suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from old English tunes of the sixteenth century and originally part of the incidental music to Monsieur Gémier's reproduction of Shakspeare's comedy, "The Merchant of Venice" at Paris in 1916. To conclude as the old playbills had it, organ, chorus and audience sounded one stanza of the hymn, "America." So were the numbers of the day distributed among the United States and the co-belligerent nations against Germany; so were these numbers designed to stir appropriate emotions in the segment of the victor dwelling in and around Boston and assembling in Symphony Hall; so were the Symphony Concerts to be linked into what it is now fashionable to call "the communal life."

Whatever the outcome may be this evening—the more appropriate time for such "celebration"—the number and the quality of the audience, Monday afternoon, visibly defeated the last of these purposes. The upper balcony, open to "the community," at twenty-eight cents per head, held only a fringe of listeners whereas at an ordinary Symphony Concert, it is filled, usually, to the last seat. In the lower balcony and in the parquet the subscribers to the afternoon concerts seemed few and far between, having evidently bestowed their tickets hither and yon until the auditorium resembled what in the palmy days of the Boston Opera used to be known as "a poor relations night." The places disposable for each concert were occupied by a still more miscellaneous company, not too much at ease in its surroundings and plainly disappointed in the relative tameness of the proceedings as a "celebration." The whole audience, indeed, declined to be stirred even by the preliminary national hymns, joined only perfunctorily in the singing of "America," returned to the other numbers of the day only routine applause. Whatever the outcome this evening—to repeat a necessary proviso—substantial evidence was not lacking yesterday that the public of the afternoon concerts prefers the Symphony Orchestra as a cosmopolitan medium for the performance of symphonic music and not as instrument for "celebrating the close of the year of victory." Possibly that public, if it ever reflects upon the matter at all, may ever believe that, playing such music from all lands week in and week out from October to May, the Symphony Orchestra sufficiently serves and enriches "the communal life."

In the second place, with the exception of Verdi's loftily imagined and eloquently written setting of the Te Deum—not to "celebrate" anything but because the beauty and the majesty of the hymn of praise deeply stirred him—the music of the afternoon as music seldom rose above commonplace. The national hymns evoke in themselves and by habit in the hearers the emotions they were designed to summon; the least sensitive thereto may hardly hear "La Marseillase" played, especially in the presence of French troops, without answering thrill. But heard as they were Monday afternoon, one after another, "off the reel," on a purely arbitrary occasion, before an unexcited and unexcitable audience, they seemed hardly the sort of musical stuff upon which the Symphony Orchestra exercises its abilities or its audiences their ears. Mr. Chadwick's "hymn" sounded neither better nor worse than the "pot-boiler" of a practised composer. It clothes simple, straightforward elemental verses —"Land of the North, Land of the South, Land of the East, Land of the West, Land of Our Hearts" and so forth—in as simple, straightforward, elementary music, skilfully and "gratefully" written for the singing chorus, mechanically accompanied by the orchestra—a frank pièce d'occasion designed for general usage, with little imagination, with no distinction. Franck's setting of the one hundred and fiftieth Psalm is music of finer craftsmanship and warmer feeling; as direct, if not quite so elementary; of the tonal prose of the organist of Sainte-Clothilde and not of the tonal poetry, like Verdi's setting of the Te Deum, of an illustrious composer.

Until Bizet's overture, "Patrie," became haloed to many an ear by new association with a desolate but warlike France, it passed intrinsically for one of his routine pieces seldom to be resurrected in the concert-room when his masterly music to "L'Arlésienne," for example—to say nothing of orchestral fragments of "Carmen" with the fire of feeling and of utterance that Mr. Messager and his Frenchmen from the Conservatory lately infused in Symphony Hall into "La Marseillaise." Mr. Rabaud, besides, was too rigid with it while he was literal to a fault with the overture, "Patrie," which needs all the extraneous heat and glamour a conductor may kindle around it. Only in his own Suite did leader and band seem their usual selves. As for the choral pieces the performance of all three obviously suffered from the fact that the choir, however able, diligent and finely voiced, has lacked time for adequate preparation, for the gaining of the elasticity, the sureness, the confidence, the zest that are half the battle with such music and that were chief glories, in another time, of the Boston Symphony Chorus. In Mr. Chadwick's hymn made to measure, as it were, for the average choir, Mr. Townsend's singers regained not a little of their precision, rhythm, sense of quality of tone, of turn of phrase, mounting progression and expanding climax. They fared well enough with Franck's Psalm, within the limits of competence. But in Verdi's setting of the Te Deum—as exacting as it is beautiful and eloquent in the answers of choir to choir in intervals and transitions that dim the eye and melt the heart, in glowing arcs of exultant, exalted or poignant tone—the choir and indeed Mr. Rabaud seemed only to grope their way along by no means without occasional missteps. Not always did they achieve even the letter of the music. This done, there was naught left in them to summon its spirit. Nor would it be the truth to say that Mr. Rabaud much distinguished himself as a choral conductor. So runs the record of a disillusioning afternoon.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT JANUARY 2,

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Symphony Chorus, Present and Future—An Enlightening Word from a Singer in It—Montemezzi's Opera from d'Annunzio—A Novel French Piece at the Metropolitan

UNFAVORABLE comments in these columns and elsewhere upon the singing of the Symphony Chorus in the concerts of Monday and Tuesday last "to celebrate the close of the year of victory" have drawn an interesting and sugggstive note from a member of Mr. Townsend's choir. If the chorus was ragged—writes N. C. M.—there are two main reasons apparently—one is that Mr. Rabaud does not speak much English; and the other that the chorus had not more than thirty days in which to prepare three pieces, one of which at least needed two months of rehearsing. Therefore, before another appearance of the chorus, these difficulties are likely to be remedied, for Mr. Rabaud, it is to be assumed, will all the time be picking up English; although whether he will acquire enough American idioms to put the "punch" into a company of men and women singers running all the way from professionals to amateurs—there were no Bush Leaguers in the crowd, it appeared—is still a question.

In such a group of singers, the "punch" is the main thing; and Mr. Townsend, who was getting near to success, would have achieved it probably, if he had had even two more full rehearsals in Symphony Hall. There were the first chorus and the second chorus at these concerts, and they were at first drilled separately and then together with two rehearsals on the Symphony Hall stage with the orchestra. But they were not well enough acquainted, chorus to chorus, and part to part to know one another by sight—let alone voice. As is usual in such amateur bodies, moreover, everybody—of the men at least—did not attend all the rehearsals, and instructions given by Mr. Townsend at a certain rehearsal might be wholly unknown by a percentage of the singers—in fact they were. Of course such ignorance did not help, for while nudging a neighboring singer, when he comes in in the wrong place, shuts him off, it does not add appreciably to the artistic success of the production. The writer would not put the burden of sliding easily over certain passages entirely on his singing companions; he admits that, as the boys on thin ice run "tiddledees," he took similar chances now and then. Nobody happened to nudge him, however.

Mr. Townsend was getting the "punch" into his singers, as has been said, but time was lacking. Coming to the full rehearsals in Symphony Hall, we find Mr. Townsend relinquishing the stick to Mr. Rabaud, the stick that the former had, in a sense, been using over the backs of his singers, for he had politely urged the women, and had "cursed out" the men until they all were getting into form. Then the gentler Mr. Rabaud—a man of few (English) words. He may have essayed the language used generally in the United States, but if he did, it was under his breath, for his audible directions to the singers ran something like this—"Allons!" or "Composez—vous," at the end of a piece, or "Au commencement," for a new try at the opening measures. The singers were for the most part so erudite that they understood Mr. Rabaud's French, and if he had continued in that language and given it to them slowly he might have reinforced Mr. Townsend's "punch." For some reason, he didn't do so. He may have thought that they were all as skilful at reading music as his well-trained orchestra. A few of them were, no doubt, but not all; and that was certainly part of the trouble. They hitched along—the poorer readers waiting for the better ones to give them the cue—and more than one giving a sigh of relief when they had come to the concluding "Speravi" of Verdi's "Te Deum"—the "hope" being that the next time they would sing the piece at least no worse.

Tuesday evening's concert went better than that of Monday afternoon, and whether it was on that account or not, the audience was more responsive; and vice versa, a better hand, of course, brings better singing; and given more time for rehearsal, the Symphony Chorus will constantly give a better account of itself, or Mr. Townsend will know the reason why.

But whatever the critics and the audience in general thought of the chorus work, the members of the chorus enjoyed every minute of their stage appearances —with the possible exception of the times they were singing the a capella passages in the "Te Deum"—for it is interesting to be up-stage and to watch the time beaten out, and the response of every individual player. The chorus, therefore, kept as still as mice, when they were not performing, and, in the intermission, many of the men concluded that life could be sustained even if they did not have a smoke.

Such criticism as the singers of the Symphony Chorus have had has been good for them. They will do better on their next appearance, for they will have sufficient time to learn their pieces—or it is safe to say they will not sing. And, it is to be hoped that when they again air their voices in Symphony Hall, the handful of tenors in the Second Chorus will be so disposed that they will not have to sit almost upon the bass drum and tympani.

"The Canine of the Nation"

A suspicion has invaded my consciousness during the past month; like the smell of escaping gas on the premises, it won't be dissipated till the windows are thrown open, admitting fresh air. This is the particular gaseous odor referred to: Time was when plays were "tried on the dog" elsewhere, sometimes in the remote "provinces." Pianists and singers have been known to indulge in a full-dress rehearsal somewhere in Iowa or Pennsylvania. When they made their bow here their initial nervousness had vanished, or, at least, was attenuated. Nowadays, things seem to be ordered otherwise. New York is the canine, the proving ground for players and singers, violinists and pianists of an inartistic calibre that would make creep the scalp of the least critical inhabitant in a mining camp. The question is, Why do these misguided folk do these things? Councillor Brack, in "Hedda Gabler," exclaims: "But people don't do such things!" Alas! the answer is that they do. They fetch to the metropolis their little pint measure of talent, they drink from it in the presence of an invited public, not large, but always enthusiastic, and gather in a few perfunctory press notices, and return to their native town in triumph. They have played or sung in New York. Therefore, they are among the elect. But no one is the gainer thereby except the musical agencies.

This craze for the New York critical rubber stamp has also transformed the most charming part of the city into a foreign farm where all the nations do congregate. Commerce versus culture, with culture overwhelmingly routed. New York is become the Canine of the nation. It is in theatrical parlance, the "dog," and by comparison Atlantic City languishes and Oshkosh is envious. [James Huneker in The New York Times.

om WORLD

ldress New York City

ate

PHILHARMONIC PLAYERS IN DIRGE TO ROOSEVELT.

Concert Follows — Rabaud Hears His Own Opera at the Metropolitan.

[illegible] "Marouf" had its turn at the Metropolitan Opera House, at popular prices. Henri Rabaud, its composer, and leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was discovered in the audience, and was induced to appear before the curtain with the singing artists.

Silhouetted Serenity

Mr H[illegible] Playing

From a New and Recent Photograph

TIMES (Photograph by Mishkin)

s: Washington, D. C.

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has presented two programs within a week, one of much interest, the other, which by all laws of precedent ought to have been an affair worthy of mark, distinctly tedious. This latter came first, replacing one of the concerts postponed by a late opening of the season. It was advertised to "celebrate the close of the year of victory," and was given on Monday afternoon, Dec. 30, and Tuesday evening, Dec. 31. The chorus, trained by Stephen Townsend, manifested a lack of rehearsal not in evidence on former appearances. The program traversed the national airs of the allied nations, Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts," Bizet's "Patrie" overture, Verdi's "Te Deum," old English composers' works in a suite of the Sixteenth Century arranged by Mr Rabaud, and Franck's Psalm CL. Of these numbers by far the most interesting was that comprising Mr. Rabaud's homage to England. In this suite he performed the difficult task of keeping archaic music without anachronisms, and this he did partly by orchestrating it with great skill, avoiding instruments of distinctly modern invention, but mostly through his unerring instinct for the fitness of things.

The regular tenth program of the season presented Jascha Heifetz as soloist. He played the Beethoven D major concerto, Op. 61, in a manner that revealed a musical understanding heretofore not in evidence in the programs with which he has been wont to amuse his recital audiences and with an astounding command of technique that brought hearty applause not only from the audience but from the men of the orchestra, and even the conductor himself. So overshadowing was the performance of the concerto that it obliterated the unhealthy, sensual atmosphere of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony which preceded it and took away the flavor of Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" which followed it. The "Antar" symphony made little impression and even the third movement, which is supposed to represent the delights of power, and which is the most understandable of the four, seemed strangely lacking. Verdi has said this sort of thing so much better that other triumphal processions seem led by hobby-horses. The Ravel number is worth a rehearing when it occupies a fortuitous position on a program.

TIMES

: New York City

Rabaud's "Marouf" Sung Again.

Rabaud's "Marouf," an opera in the lighter French style by the Boston Symphony's scholarly conductor, was sung again at the Metropolitan last night, as once before it had been in Brooklyn, on a day when M. Rabaud and his orchestra were visitors to New York. The Frenchman heard his work last month on one of the opera company's visits to the Academy over the river. Last night's repetition on Broadway was at popular prices, and the cast, as usual, contained Mmes. Alda and Howard, Messrs. De Luca, Bada, Chalmers, De Segurola, and Rothier, conducted by Mr. Monteux. Mr. Rabaud was again present last evening, and, going behind the scenes, received an ovation when Mr. De Segurola and Mme. Alda dragged him on the stage.

—Rabaud—honestest and open[illegible] —it is exactly what it purports to be. Monsieur Gémier, the actor-manager, eager to domicile "Shakspeare in France" contrived a reproduction of "The Merchant of Venice" on the Parisian stage in which the play was barely discoverable through thick swathings of scenery, costumes, lights, dances, music and other spectacular paraphernalia. He deputed the scholarly Rabaud to write this music. The composer-conductor opened the music-books of Shakspeare's time, when England was fertile in tunes of its own, and transcribed pieces appropriate to various incidents in the play, for a very small orchestra—a mere group of instruments in the pit of a theatre. More recently he has rescored the numbers heard yesterday as a Suite for the concert-hall and a sizable orchestra. The resulting piece runs in five short movements—the first and the last, being identical, of sonorous voice, free and ample rhythmic stride; the intervening three either songful with frank English melody, a little touched by melancholy, or sprightly with English high spirits. Mr. Rabaud has well preserved the directness, the heartiness, the honesty of this old English music. He rescores it with a sympathetic, resourceful, reticent hand. There he and the Suite stop. Of all the numbers of the day, only it and Verdi's Te Deum were worthy of the higher standards of the Symphony Concerts.

Finally, the performance of no one of these pieces, however it may go this evening, rose above dutiful routine. A cosmopolitan orchestra, as the Symphony Orchestra by auspicious fate has been, is now, and probably ever will be, cannot with the best will in the world, play an [illegible]rary assortment of national hymns

RABAUD DELIGHTS CONCERT AUDIENCE

The poet as librettist, poetry as the inspiration of symphonic music, prevailed in the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington under the baton of M. Henri Rabaud, given at the National Theater yesterday afternoon before the usual capacity audience. And between two-tone interpretations of the poetic muse, the lovely Mendelssohn Concerto for violin in E minor, was exquisitely played, with Fredric Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist.

With what spirit and vitality M. Rabaud lifts his players! More than at the first concert, given immediately after M. Rabaud assumed leadership of this orchestra, did one feel his individuality and his mastery. Coming as a novelty to Washington, the symphonic trilogy, as it is called, that Vincent D'Indy composed after the dramatic poem, "Wallenstein," of Schiller, is richest in its first movement—the life of the camp of this military hero.

Dramatic it was, animated in the verve of its presto—a sort of fandango—and again charmingly exotic in a melodious serenade, with the first violins and the winds singing its melody. Rich in orchestration, it was with esprit, in lightning changes of mood, a delicacy that was alive—and a brusque humor in the basson fugue —that M. Rabaud tellingly conveyed the scene, bringing it to a thrilling close in the soft crescendo at the end.

Sharp Contrasts Feature.

Sharp contrasts marked the rest of this tone-poem. An andante of repose inwoven with a sherzo; lyric loveliness, martial tumult, and, in the finale, a quality echoing the Catholic ritual with rare beauty. Here again struggle and peace held this melodrama, a graphic distortion of the main theme for the former. The long climax was massively built, though it was not overweighted with musical content.

After program music, graphic scenes in tone, the fair beauty of Mendelssohn, placid, melodious, fluent, brings one out of the introspective and into a welcome land where "beauty is its own excuse for being." The solo part was admirably played by Mr. Fradkin with great purity and suave loveliness, the sheer musical appeal of this music bringing the art of the players into greater relief. The blend was appreciable, between orchestra and solo, the solo instrument ever showing an artistic sense for ensemble, while the orchestra was rare in its blitheness and its caprice, creating a gem of pure music delightfully executed. Mr. Fradkin was recalled many times.

Tribute From Conductor.

An American symphonic work, the Converse setting to the Walt Whitman poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," was gratifying as a tribute from this forceful French conductor in presenting it on his program. The work, though imaginatively played, is overburdened with reiterations, the program scarcely enriched enough, orchestrally, for the theme, and the trumpeter a bit lonely and isolated. The rendition was given with much power dynamically and with forceful climaxes. Sudden transitions in key were unconvincing in their modulations—and why, one asks, a sudden strain of "Marching Through Georgia?"

Two more concerts under M. Rabaud yet remain. They will be awaited with expectance, for this newcomer to America has much to say through his orchestra; and his decisive impress is a real life-spark that animates his players and gains response from his hearers, for, as Whitman says, "Music is what awakes from me at the sound of the instruments."

J. MacB.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 28

SYMPHONY CONCERT

CLASSICS, MUSIC BY MR. RABAUD, AND MR. LEVITZKI

A Youthful Pianist, Engaging in Himself and Apt with an Agreeable Concerto —The Conductor Gives Schumann Free, Clear Voice, and Then Photographs an Overture of Beethoven—His Own Interesting and Applauded Tone-Poem

TO the observer of the manners and customs of the Symphony Concerts, often as interesting as music and performance, one circumstance of yesterday afternoon brought good omen. A few over-zealous persons sought, by example, to persuade the listeners to rise "in homage" to Mr. Rabaud in the course of the applause rewarding his tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne." A few more straggled to their feet; the rest of the audience, a full nineteen-twentieths of it, remained firmly planted in its chairs and so made the "standees" deservedly and impotently conspicuous. For once, at least, there was check to that parochial custom, which would pull the listeners at Symphony Hall to their feet, not only on special and signal occasion, but whenever a passion for "homage" stirs restless or flattering souls. Mr. Rabaud, like the rest of us, is a man—a truly modest man, a righteous and honest hater of all sorts of adulation, a man, so to say, written in serviceable prose and not in romantic poetry. In the practice of his profession as conductor and composer, he was doing a good job, yesterday, alike in his leading of the orchestra and in his writing of "La Procession Nocturne." The close attention and the warm applause of the audience fittingly rewarded it. There was not the slightest occasion for "homage," in the fashion of the "grand-ducal" opera house of Mecklenberg-Strelitz or Mecklenberg-Schwerin, where this custom of rising also prevails. A sensible audience perceived it and "sat tight."

For second happy circumstance youth, in Mr. Levitzki, the pianist of the day, came into the rather elderly place that the Symphony Concerts admittedly are. There sat the orchestra, distinctly middle-aged and since the reorganization, with white beards and white heads showing out of it; there sat the audience, for the most part as placidly and obviously beyond its young years. Between, of a sudden, came a youth at the beginning of his twenties and looking his age, comely, modest, poised, alert, distinctly a pleasurable and stimulating presence. With reason, so rare and contrasting is such youth "in these concerts," the house applauded him, was well disposed toward him, before he had struck a note. With equal reason at each pause in his concerto and at the end, the listeners swelled their plaudits. For this concerto in G minor by Saint-Saëns, dating from the sixties though it does, remains an engaging music, while in the playing of the piano part, Mr. Levitzki glamoured aptness with charm. Moreover, since the piece was of Saint-Saëns, who seems always to stir Mr. Rabaud, the conductor appreciably and agreeably relaxed the exact and literal accompaniment that hitherto he has lent "assisting artists."

As some may plausibly say, this concerto, negatively and positively, is an ideal piece in kind. Negatively, they will remark, it is such because it seeks neither deep matter nor large manner, avoids any appeal to the emotions, cultivates no poetic quality, distorts itself into no quasi-symphony in which a conspicuous piano is added to the orchestra. Positively, they will add as truly, it escapes academic orthodoxy, is free, yet eminently coherent of form; offers an interesting and frequently fanciful content; proceeds persuasively, skilfully, gracefully, not without a corresponding fancy of handiwork; slips adroitly over bare spots; displays piano and pianist yet makes deft use of the orchestra— in sum an expert and amusing piece, springing from Saint-Saëns's scholarly and well-filled mind, set to paper by his expert and knowing pen. He was only thirty-three when he wrote it; yet already he is old hand of the concert-hall. The young mind and the young hand of Mr. Levitzki were as intelligent and apt with it.

Not a whit more than the composer did the pianist try to read emotion or poetry into the music, to inflate the substance, to intensify the progress. He was content to unfold the music in speckless clarity of line and march, in light play of figure, ornament and technical dexterities, with charm of bright, sensuous, edgeless, flowing tone, with happy little touches upon pace, rhythm, modulation, color, with the instinct for music and the piano that divined the quality of the concerto and so imparted it. The concerto sounded as prismatic and crystalline, as though Saint-Saëns had ruled in the last double-bar only the day before yesterday—probably much more so. The cool charm of the performance matched the cool charm of the piece; from both came pleasurable sense of music as a delicate chiselling in tones, as an exercise in that preservative of all arts, which is fancy and style. Diverted and delighted, the audience rejoiced accordingly. Youth, after all, is worth the hearing.

The classics of Mr. Rabaud's programme were, as almost always, classics of German music—Schumann's symphony in D minor and the third of Beethoven's "Leonore" overtures. The conductor's objective method served the first piece better than it did the second. Leave Schumann to speak for himself in his symphonies and the ardor of his creative impulse, the warmth of his songful imagination, his mingled suppleness and intensity of mood, the romantic visioning that swam before his eyes and sounded in his ears, will mantle his embarrassments with an uncongenial form, his clumsiness with processes that he never mastered. When a conductor attempts to clarify and diversify Schumann's scoring [illegible] modulations to lead him, "perfectly conducted," through the high ways and byways of symphonic form, then does the dust of the process choke the composer's natural and compelling voice. Mr. Rabaud is far too clear-minded, far too just in his self-subordination to the composer to attempt such superfluous and clouding methods. He saw to it that by well chosen pace, well distributed accents, appropriate rhythms, sedulous regard for the clear implications of the music, the symphony had full and free voice—and wisely left the rest to Schumann. He failed neither conductor nor hearers—in the way progress, the lively fancy, the high [illegible] mood of the first movement, is romantic ardor set to music-making; in the beauty of wistful, moody song that fills the slow movement and the trio of the Scherzo; in the shadowed beginning of the Finale, in the happy rhythmic energies of the rest.

Through and through the performance renewed the romantic beauty and zest of Schumann's music, the sense of warm vision and high impulse that it bodies forth, the imagination, as in the trombone figure of the first movement or the rhythm of the trio, that makes vividly articulate his symphonic tongue. For himself, by himself, as Mr. Rabaud wisely left him, Schumann speaks well. Less, however, does this objective conducting suit Beethoven's "Leonore" overture. There was not a flaw in the exposition of the music. The listener heard it clearly, heard it in integrity, heard the process, the manner, the mood of it, heard it in discerningly ordered admirably accomplished pace, phrasing, contrasts, climaxes. Had Aristides the Just known the overture and possessed an orchestra, so would he, doubtless, have played it. But there is a passion in the dramatic progress and suspense of the music that Mr. Rabaud knows not, a splendor of orchestral eloquence for voice and vesture to it, that he cannot or will not summon from the present band. After all, it is not good to hear the trumpet that is Leonora's salvation or the joyous tumult of "O, Namenlöse Freude" without an answering thrill.

The remaining orchestral number was Mr. Rabaud's own tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne," encouraging sign that before he departs the composer-conductor will not deny his hearers the pleasure of his second symphony. An episode in Lenau's "Faust" is background to the music which Mr. Rabaud wrote almost twenty years ago. The German poem pictures Faust wandering solitary and brooding, at midnight, through a darksome wood, yet stirred by the breath of spring. A procession, distant, nearing, receding, traverses the forest—old men and children, veiled and holy maidens, keeping pious rite, lifting voices in devout song. Hidden Faust sees, hears, is troubled, yet comforted. . . . Mr. Rabaud's mind has clearly visualized the changing scene, apprehended the sensations it evokes in Faust and, so to say, the interested bystander. He has wrought this picture, these sensations, into an exceedingly clear, concise, well-made and highly polished tone-poem. From patiently meditated motives springs by economical yet graphic process music that compasses the atmosphere of the wood and summons the desolate and brooding Faust; music that leads forth the simple, pious train, sings its gentle canticle; music that returns to a Faust woful yet solaced; while over all is suggestion of magic scene. The distribution of contrasts in the course of the tonal narrative is exact and flawless; the utilization of expressive means in modulations, harmonies and instrumental voices is as impeccable as it is economical. Not a detail, thoughtfully devised, fails to fall into place in the progress of the piece or misses suggestion to the attentive ear. The chosen motives justify the wisdom of Mr. Rabaud's invention; the development of them keeps uncommonly even pace with the course of the poem. Few are the surrenders of delineation and suggestion to the real or assumed necessities of the concert-hall. Even then, the music does not cease to be atmospheric, illusory. Music by mental process, addressed, in turn, to the mind may hardly further go, so clear, cold, chaste and passionless is "La Procession Nocturne."

H. T. P.

CONCERT CALENDAR

Two Pairs of Symphony Concerts Next Week, One with Chorus and One with Mr. Heifetz as Assisting Violinist—Mme. Leginska and Mr. Elman Return—Mr. Rosen for a Newcomer—Mr. Zimbalist and Mr. Seidel in Prospect

IN departure from all precedent, two pairs of Symphony Concerts are announced for next week. The first pair, appointed for the afternoon of Monday and the evening of Tuesday, replaces the concerts that should have befallen on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11 and Saturday evening, Oct. 12 last, but which were postponed because of the epidemic of influenza. Subscribers, therefore, will present tickets numbered one (1) and dated Oct. 11, for the concert of Monday, and tickets numbered one (1) and dated Oct. 12, for the concert of Tuesday. On both occasions the programme is exceptional, consisting of choral and orchestral pieces and designed to celebrate the victory of the United States and its co-belligerents over Germany and Austria in the late war. It will begin, accordingly, with the national hymns of the conquering powers and end with the singing of "America." Between, for purely orchestral pieces, stand Bizet's familiar overture, "Patrie," and a suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from English music of the sixteenth century for the representations of Shakspeare's comedy, "The Merchant of Venice," by Monsieur Gémier at the Théatre Antoine in Paris two winters ago. Choral pieces with orchestra fill the rest of the list viz.: Franck's setting of the last Psalm, a hymn of triumph; Verdi's setting of the Te Deum; and a "patriotic piece" by Mr. Chadwick, "Land of Our Hearts." In these numbers the Symphony Chorus, as reassembled and trained by Mr. Townsend, will join forces with the orchestra.

At the second pair of concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in usual course, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra will be heard in Rimsky-Korsakov's highly colored, pictorial and quasi-oriental symphony, "Antar," suggested by legends of the adventures of that Arab hero, and in Ravel's pungent and subtle "Spanish Rhapsody," graphic music of a sharply imagined Spain. Between these numbers, Mr. Heifetz appearing for the first times with the orchestra, will play the solo part in Beethoven's concerto for violin. In such music he should excel all the youngest generation of violinists.

GLOBE, JANUARY 4

HEIFETZ SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST

Famous Violinist Plays for First Time With Boston Orchestra

Jascha Haifetz, the marvelous boy violinist, was the soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and again revealed his remarkable gifts as interpreter of music written for his chosen instrument. The modest bearing of this young genius and the unassuming manner with which he conquers the tremendous difficulties of masterpieces composed for the violin have been mentioned before, and the encomiums given him for his recitals the past year are equally applicable to his captivating performance yesterday in the familiar D major concerto by Beethoven.

When Heifetz appeared the cordiality of his greeting indicated that his standard as an artist was well established here. He began his performance of the concerto with a freedom from pose and a quiet dignity which didn't desert him while playing, even when he had some difficulty with the strings of the violin by reason of weather conditions.

His exquisite tone, facile technique, double stops, clean-cut phrasing and impeccable finger work again claimed the admiration of his auditors, the variety of shading and delicacy of detail appearing to be spontaneous and free from mechanical control.

In the ethereal slow movement the breadth and resonance of the work was set forth with compelling effect, and the two cadenzas were made fairly scintillating by the phenomenal brilliancy of his work. A half dozen recalls were given him at the close of his performance.

Rimsky-Korsaltoff's "Autar" Symphony and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" completed the program. The Oriental atmosphere of the former, with its sensuous and dreamy significance of the adventures of Antar and the transformed fairy, tends to awaken the imagination because of the skillful use of the orchestral forces by the composer.

The tone pictures are vivid and beautifully contrasted, love, triumph, frenzy, regret and passion being the principal emotions upon which the story is based. Under Mr Rabaud's guidance the rich and barbaric splendor of the composition was given with fine effect.

Ravel's rapsodic pictures of Spanish life went with the proper spirit and abandon, an easy task for the orchestra. There will be no concerts next week, the orchestra being away on the regular tour.

NEW YORK TIMES, JANUARY 10,

The Boston Symphony.

In the evening Mr. Henri Rabaud played an interesting program, which consisted of Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein's Trilogy," Opus 12, (after the dramatic poem of Schiller); "The Mystic Trumpeter," orchestral fantasy by Frederick Shepherd Converse, (after the poem by Walt Whitman); a Suite of the sixteenth century, by Farnaby and anonymous English composers, arranged by Henri Rabaud, and the overture to "King Lear," by Berlioz; altogether an unusual collocation, yet none the less diverting. The D'Indy music is beginning to date. It was "modern" years ago. It is no longer. The composer's "Istar" is of finer fibre and fabric; it is also a later work than the Trilogy, which was begun in 1873, and first heard here in 1888 at Steinway Hall, under the baton of Anton Seidl, who probably produced it because of its Wagnerisms. There are many.

In his program notes Philip Hale tells us Mr. Rabaud arranged three orchestral suites for the incidental music to "The Merchant of Venice," (at the Theatre Antoine, Paris, 1916-17, Lucien Nepoly's version). The stage music was found in Fitzwilliams Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth, (who always harped on her Virginal;) "one of several MS. collections of clavier and arrangements for the clavier which were brought together in Elizabethan times. Mr. Rabaud has orchestrated the Suites for concert use, using instruments that are not unachronistic." It was the third Suite that was given on this occasion, this in five movements.

"The Mystic Trumpeter" was first heard here at Carnegie Hall on April 2, 1906. The composer is a Massachusetts man, and despite his New England blood there is not ink ice-water in his score. Indeed, as music it is artistically superior to the music of the Camden poet, whose centenary we are to celebrate next May. However, the Whitmaniacs will demur at this assertion, so we withdraw it—temporarily; but what will the Wagnerites say? The mixture of Whitman and Wagner is about half and half, not forgetting a dash of the other Richard—strauss is his last name. Mr. Converse is a master of his material. His orchestral hues are gorgeous. But the hands are the hands of Converse and the voice is the voice of Richard I. of Beireuth.

The old English Suite was charming as Mr. Rabaud knows the secret of orchestral coloring. The tunes were jolly and sweet and melancholy, and they did not suggest in the least their archaic origin, owing to the rich, even exotic, scoring; the Andante was a possible exception, yet the strings were too luscious, even lascivious, in quality for the quaint message they conveyed. And then came a blast from Berlioz, and all these Jerry-built musical walls of Jericho crumbled. The master spoke!

ADVERTISER, AMERICAN, JANUARY 5,

Antar Given by Symphony Artists

By LOUIS. C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

"Antar" Symphony .....Rimski-Korsakoff
Violin Concerto .....Beethoven
Soloist, Jascha Heifetz
Rhapsodie Espagnole .....Ravel

"ANTAR" is a symphony that tells an Oriental story. The first movement shows Antar, the great hunter, amid the ruins of Palmyra, the ruins being inhabited evidently by trombones, bassoons and clarinettes. A flute is now pursued by ferocious cellos and contrabasses, picturing the fairy Ghul-Nazar chased by the spirits of darkness. As Antar saves her she rewards him, as all good fairies do, by three gifts—Revenge, Power and Love. All this first part is splendidly graphic and original. In Revenge, the second movement, Antar evidently takes vengeance upon harmony teachers and gives many dissonances of the most modern school. A muscular kettle-drummer, a healthy cymbal player and an artist upon the gong emphasize this part with the fury of a Bolsheviki caucus meeting. Stopped horns and other disagreeable things join in this portion of the trouble.

The movement picturing Power, being Russian, of course made it military power, but here there was also a charming Eastern dance, a good contrast to the military effects. This was the finest part of the work and it was splendidly interpreted. In the finale Love, the English horn and the clarinette are evidently enamored of each other. The dialogue between these two instruments, very well given, presented a good contrast between the masculine yearning of the former and the more delicate dreaminess of the latter instrument. Antar dies at the end of this (kissed to death by the fairy), but his Liebestod was by no means as striking as one that Wagner has written.

It is a strong, if rather barbaric picture, and the scoring as well as the harmonic progressions are effective and often novel, but one may object to such a free tone-poem masquerading under the title of "Symphony." The work was greatly applauded, but the chief enthusiasm followed the third movement.

Beethoven's one violin concerto distances all other works of this form, but it is only to be played by passion and technique. It is the visiting card (along with Bach's "Chaconne") of all the violinists who claim pre-eminence. We have heard it given as if it were an advanced exercise, and we have also heard it played in a ladylike manner. Not so on this occasion, for Jascha Heifetz at once proved his title to being "primus inter pares" in the lofty composition. The long cadenza of the first movement showed the young artist equipped in every technical direction, while the massive power of the great theme, with its four emphatic notes as its principal figure, [illegible] altogether commendable.

As with the Emperor Piano Concerto, this work has its chief glories in the first movement, while the finale falls off somewhat in power, yet the brilliancy of the playing of the rondo made it remarkably successful at this concert and the enthusiasm at the end was much more intense than anything at the "Peace celebration" concerts of the earlier part of the week. Of course, Heifetz was the chief honors of this concert. He could not count the number of times that he was recalled, and, barring a little lack of breadth in the first movement, he deserved it all.

Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody was given an interesting reading. The French and the Russians have both invaded Spain, but we fancy if Granados had not been killed we might through him have had the best Spanish music. But this work strikes us as more graphic and original than the Spanish caprice by Rimski-Korsakoff, recently heard. It also more gave proof of the elasticity and abandon of M. Rabaud's readings, and it ended the concert in a spicy manner, a concert which for one was more than half modern. The Rhapsody is a fantasie of rhythms and dynamic contrasts. There were many modern experiments in scoring in it, and its many explosions were startling if not convincing.

This week there were four symphonic concerts instead of two, an aftermath of the grippe epidemic prohibitions, for one of the postponed concerts was made up by a series of symphonic Peace Festival on Monday afternoon and Tuesday evening. We need a Gilmore and a military band for this kind of thing and it must be confessed that the interpolated concerts were somewhat tepid. This was the program:

National Hymns of America, Belgium, England, Italy and France.
Chadwick, "Land of Our Hearts." Patriotic Hymn.
Bizet, "Patrie" overture.
Verdi, "Te Deum." Double chorus and orchestra.
Rabaud, Suite of XVI. Century, Arr. from Farnaby and others.
Franck, Psalm CL. Chorus, orchestra and organ.
And the whole concluded with the singing of "America."

It was somewhat of a stand-up affair, for no one ventured to remain seated while any of the six national anthems were sung or played. By the way there is a trumpet fanfare that generally is given in the Italian [illegible] might have been rather inferior piece of music. Italy, the Mother of Music, should have an infinitely greater national march.

Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts" is the most ambitious piece of work that the war has brought forth in America. It celebrates the North, South, East and West, in turn, has an instrumental introduction and an interlude, contains considerable figure treatment and some counterpoint (canonic), and has a fine climax. It was done full justice to by chorus, orchestra and conductor. A more compact work would be better for national music.

Bizet's "Patrie" has been recently reviewed in these columns. It is not a masterpiece, but it certainly never has had such a fine reading as M. Rabaud gave it on this occasion. The severe ecclesiastical vein of Verdi's "Te Deum" must have puzzled those who are not familiar with Catholic music. It was very difficult for the chorus, and there was some timidity, but Mr. Stephen Townsend had done hard work in the vocal training and the pitfalls were generally avoided.

M. Rabaud's suite arranged from the old virginal music of Farnaby and others was very discreetly treated. Never once was the antique flavor contradicted by any modern style of scoring. The first and last movements were the most successful.

Franck's setting of the 150th Psalm was the best music of the concert, but there had been such heavy vocal work before it that it did not win enthusiastic recognition. There was applause after each number, but not the enthusiasm that would have followed a rollicking, tuneful concert of military band music, such as a popular national war (or peace) celebration generally calls for.

RECORD, JANUARY 4,

HEIFETZ WINS TRIUMPH AT THE SYMPHONY

Rimsky-Korsakoff and Ravel Works by the Orchestra

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Henri Rabaud, conductor. Jascha Heifetz, violinist, soloist. Tenth concert of the season., Symphony Hall yesterday—same program to be repeated this evening. The program:—

Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphony No. 2 "Antar"
Beethoven Concerto in D major for violin.
Ravel .....Rapsodie Espagnole

Mr. Heifetz dominated the performance. He proved in all respects that if there are to be soloists at the Symphony concerts they ought to be the very best—the few great vocalists or instrumentalists of the day. Only artists of the first rank can compete with the orchestra and, rightly or wrongly, only artists of the first rank have a "box office" appeal. The audience yesterday was larger than on any other Friday afternoon of the season. There were some vacant places, mirable dictu, for although the general public packs the house every time certain famous artists, like Mr. Heifetz, appears in recital there is not always the same eagerness to her them with orchestra. Such conditions are unexplainable.

The audience yesterday was the most heterogeneous that has heard a Symphony concert in many a day. There were the regular subscribers; there were amateurs and professional violinists galore; there were curiosity seekers drawn by newspaper stories of Mr. Heifetz's gifts and there were in the second balcony great numbers of Mr. Heifetz's own people. Well may the Jews of Boston turn out in throngs every time Mr. Heifetz plays. He is one of the geniuses of their race.

Many wondered at Mr. Heifetz's choice of a concerto. "If he plays the Beethoven concerto now, what will he play when he is 35, 45, or 55?" they asked. Possibly to grey heads only the mellowed should play the concerto, but Mr. Heifetz obviously wanted to test himself with its heavenly pages. In his playing of the concerto he somewhat heightened the impression he has made at his recitals. For lyric lovliness in violin playing he is unmatched. He possibly does not have the extreme, dazzling brilliancy that some violinists possess. Some fiddlers flash like a cut glass chandelier—and that is about all. Mr. Heifetz is not of their number. Others, and Mr. Kreisler is most notable among contemporary violinists, give a sense of great reserve power that is astonishing. Mr. Heifetz, while he has dignity, strength and poise, in his playng, as well as in his bearing, does not impress one as having strength for his dominant characteristic. It is tone, silken, delicate and iridescent, that gives him his undisputed place among the great players of the volin. To match and assist this tone in wearing its spell is almosa flawless technique. His tone yesterday was always marvellously beautiful, his intonation flawless, his playing in all respects technically superb. A newspaper article is not the place for a minute analysis of a virtu-

M. HENRI RABAUD, ACADEMICIAN

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

The election of M. Rabaud, now conductor of the Boston Symphony, to a seat in the Institute, is a high tribute to a musician of much learning. It may be also something more than that—a veiled compliment to the Bostonian public. So does a government lift up the special envoys whom it sends abroad, turning rear-admirals into admirals, and ministers into full-fledged ambassadors.

This does not mean that, had he not been made conductor of the great Boston orchestra, M. Rabaud would not have been chosen to be a member of the French Institute. It merely hints that what might have come fitly—later on—has happened sooner. Well—tant mieux pour M. Rabaud. There is no doubt that he has worked hard, and with honesty, to win the place which he now occupies, not with the "Immortals" (for that term belongs exclusively to the Forty of the Académie Française), but in the Académie des Beaux-Arts. In his favor he has a distinguished past as a composer of two operatic efforts, his "Fille de Roland" and "Marouf," besides many very interesting concert works, and as conductor for seven years or more at the Paris Opera House, or, to give it its absurd official name, the Académie Nationale de Musique. As a composer he is ingenious and erudite. Not possibly quite so original as some, but well worth studying. He had at least as good a right to be elected as M. Paladilhe or M. Dubois, who had preceded him. And if his name, by some strange chance, does not appear in Baltzell's "Dictionary of Musicians," the omission need not worry him.

It may be mentioned, just in passing, that the Académie des Beaux-Arts is one of the five academic bodies which make up the Institute. The others are the Académie Française (reserved, at least in theory, for writers); the Académie des Sciences; the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres; and the Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, all sit beneath the roof of the domed building on the Seine, facing the Tuileries, known as the Palais-Mazarin, in recognition of the part which that too crafty though most able statesman played, after Richelieu, in building up French art and letters. Besides musicians, the Académie des Beaux-Arts welcomes painters, sculptors, architects and engravers. At present it includes six composers, of unequal rank—M. Saint-Saëns, M. Dubois, M. Paladilhe, M. Fauré, M. Charpentier and now M. Rabaud.

Among Frenchmen, since the creation of "the" Académie by Richelieu, it has been the fashion to deride the Institute. But, notwithstanding all the jibes of Alphonse Daudet, Zola and the de Goncourts, it is the ambition of most writers, artists and scientific men in France to become Academicians. The sneers, which Voltaire spoke about and satirized, have been largely due to the regrettable narrowness which has at times led the Academicians to snub such celebrities as Molière, Pascal, Piron, Diderot and Balzac. The neglected have avenged themselves in many ways; some, like Piron, by epigrams, others by insults. The most scathing of all hits at the Académie was embodied in Piron's own epitaph:

"Ci-git Piron, que ne fût rien—
Pas même académicien."
"Here lies Piron, who was naught—
Not even an academician."

The Immortals got even with that author by declining as one man to attend his funeral.

The de Goncourts, on the other hand, showed their dislike (or, as they no doubt would have preferred to say, contempt) for the Institute by founding an Académie of their own, and attaching their name to it. Daudet, Zola and their followers were members of this body. But, in the end, even Zola, despite all his truculence, became more than deferential to the Immortals.

Of the qualities most cherished by the Institute in dealing with writers and artists in general, the first is style. And for that reason, to their shame, the Academicians preferred Mérimée to Balzac. It may be for his style, even more than for his unquestioned erudition, that the Académie des Beaux-Arts has elected M. Rabaud, rather than M. d'Indy, M. Ravel, or M. Florent Schmitt—to say nothing of M. Février, M. Pierné, M. Messager and M. Xavier Leroux. Tot homines, tot sententiæ.

In the United States not much is known as yet with regard to the value of M. Rabaud's more important concert works. It is by these, not by his operas, that he might best like to win reputation here. Why should he not give the Boston public opportunities, from time to time, of enjoying and discussing at least some of them? To most Americans he is the composer of one opera, "Marouf," which has been heard in various places, and more especially at the Metropolitan. If he were judged by that alone, he might not rank so high as some of his French rivals. M. Rabaud is too modest and sincere to think that "Marouf" is in the same class as the "Louise" of M. Charpentier, the "Samson et Dalila" or "Henri VIII" of M. Saint-Saëns, or even the less flawless, though delightful, "Monna Vanna" of M. Février. It has much charm and grace, much piquancy and scholarship to help it. But it lacks unity and it is not original. Bizet, Delibes and others, had they been up-to-date, might have written many passages and scenes in the first part of "Marouf." As for the last, it can be traced direct to Wagner to a very large extent, and more particularly to that composer's "Meistersinger." As to its style, it is romantic and fantastic. But the romantic feeling is not quite so poetic as it might have been, while the fantasy is—shall we say, theatric? New Yorkers are still wondering why the manager of the Metropolitan selected "Marouf" for production when he had works like "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame" and "Pelléas et Mélisande" and above all, "Louise," still waiting to be added to his repertory. Can he have known (such things are possible) that M. Rabaud was to succeed Dr. Muck in Boston? Or was he anxious (as some wicked persons say) to exclude the more nearly perfect art of France from the chief New York opera house?

To deny the merits of "Marouf" would be ungenerous. But to exaggerate them would be more than foolish. "Marouf" will have its fleeting day of favor. And after that—? The prophets may reply.

There are many who would rather have their "Kismet" as a play and their "Chu-Chin-Chow" as a mere extravaganza. There are others who prefer it in the pretentious form it takes as opera. De gustibus. However it may rank, "Marouf" does credit to the craftsmanship of the newly elected Academician. One of his smaller orchestral compositions, "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after Lenau's Faust poem, also does credit to a remarkable craftsmanship, for it combines successfully the two antithetical qualities of compactness and atmosphere. No one will grudge M. Rabaud his high good fortune. Whatever else he may or may not be, he is a musician of authority and taste.

CITIZEN

ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Big Brooklyn Audience at the Academy Applauds the Musicians.

The music which M. Henri Rabaud brought to the hearing of his audience at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night before a capacity audience was evidence conclusive that this famous orchestra had lost none of its wonted drawing powers with Brooklyn concert-goers.

A programme made up of compositions by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Mendelssohn and Ravel was rich with charming music as conducted by Mr. Rabaud, a musician with a distinct message who has something very interesting to say and who knows exactly how to say it.

The opening number, Symphony No. 2, "Antar," op. 15 (Rimsky-Korsakoff), with its introductory Largo, melodic phrases against chromatic harmonies, was well executed. The second movement was more free in form with frequent changes in tempo. In the third there is a brilliant march theme and a sensuous cantilena, and the fourth is similar to the first, ending in pianissimo. All were delightfully given.

The second number, Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor for violin, op. 64, with Fedric Fradkin as the soloist, with accompaniment by stringed instruments, in three connected movements. Mr. Fradkin, the concert master and soloist, played with a most musical tone and showed himself a skillful technician. He had a cordial reception and was heartily applauded for his brilliant work.

"Rapsodie Espagnole," by Ravel, bewitching in tonal combinations, was the concluding number on the programme.

The audience, appreciating the charm of the music and the perfection of the performance, recalled Mr. Rabaud many times.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON OF EXCEPTIONAL PLEASURE

Happy Return of a "Halcyon Day" for Orchestra, Audience and Conductor—Mr. Heifetz Plays Beethoven's Concerto for Violin at the Acme of His Powers—Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar" and Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" Make Contrasts in Imaginative and Graphic Music

FOR the first time since the new régime took possession of the Symphony Concerts, they recalled yesterday the atmosphere and accomplishment, yielded the pleasant excitement of an earlier day. For once, thanks, no doubt, to the presence of Mr. Heifetz as "assisting artist," every place in Symphony Hall seemed taken by an audience of the familiar, distinctive quality of years past. By reason of his first coming to the concerts that agreeable air of anticipation, which is antidote to placid routine, pervaded the assembled company. Those who regretted his absence last winter, in the first flush of his fame in America, were now expectantly content; those who had waited to hear him—and in Beethoven's Concerto—at a Symphony Concert were becomingly eager. To the full, Mr. Heifetz fulfilled these lively anticipations, and, in the keenest of memories few of the eminent violinists preceding him upon the stage of Symphony Hall these many years, and sometimes in this Concerto, have surpassed his playing. For the time he was at the acme of his powers, so far as Bostonian audiences yet know them, and loud, long, altogether spontaneous and generous—since for once there was no hope of extra pieces—were the plaudits rewarding him. The whole hall rang with them and it was pleasanter than words can half say to hear this return to the old enthusiasms. For still ampler measure, the forepiece to the Concerto, Rimsky-Kosakov's symphonic Suite, "Antar," and the after-piece, Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," were interesting music of modern or ultra-modern voice, well read in his usual objective fashion by Mr. Rabaud, played by the orchestra with a nearer approximation to ancient mingling of technical perfection and of expressive warmth than it has often attained since the reorganization of last autumn. Once more, it was a band commanding both finesse and power, euphony and pliancy, ardor and exactitude of characterizing and revealing voice. For an afternoon at least, the "halcyon days" of the Symphony Orchestra, as its good-willed public in New York is beginning to call them, were come again. They warrant rejoicing; they justify hope of such continuing quality.

Mr. Heifetz, in whom the interest of the afternoon plainly centred, chose wisely in Beethoven's Concerto often as it has been played in recent years at Symphony Hall. It is not music of the puissant Beethoven, storming the heavens in a passion of self-release in tones. It is, by record, no more than a piece written to oblige his friend, the violinist, Clement, and designed to display virtuoso, musician and instrument. The lines of the Concerto curve, expand, interweave agreeably upon the ear. The subject-matter charms in the sentimental grace of the slow movement or the rhythmic animation of the finale; interests in the long first Allegro by ingenious variety of progress, by felicitous and fanciful adornment. At every turn, even in the decorative "passage-work," the voice of the music is songful. Sentiment, elegance continuously touch it and invite like qualities in the playing violinist. How finely spun and piquant to the ear is many a transition in the first movement; how gently flowing in singing orchestra and in embroidering violin is the succeeding Romance; with what gay energy play the returns of the motives of the Rondo. The hand of Beethoven light is not less good to hear and to feel than the hand of Beethoven, puissant. The Beethoven of fancy and charm is rare beside the Beethoven of power and passion. Beethoven, if the listener will, displaying violin and violinist, but so doing with the discernment, the imagination, the felicity of a master. Hackneyed "repertory piece" though it is, played in any fashion above routine, the Concerto still gladdens the ear, warms the heart.

Played by Mr. Heifetz at the zenith of his present powers, with the orchestra kindling to the occasion, with Mr. Rabaud steadily considerate of the quality of the music and the will of the violinist, the Concerto was clothed in transcendent beauty. From youth Mr. Heifetz is ripening fast into young manhood; even to the eye he is a far maturer figure than he was a year ago; while to ear and mind, he seems to gain finer insight into his music keener sensibility in the communication of it, a yet more adroit command of the violin, of the subtleties and the glamours of the tone he draws from it. Intent solely upon his work yet instinctively or reflectively measuring every stroke and detail, he is rare figure of the concert-hall in this mingling of concentration and poise. But for his sedulous regard for euphonies with the orchestra, for his fidelity in almost every measure to Beethoven's clear intent, he might have been summoning the Concerto from himself, from the surrounding air. The pedants of the violin and the music of the violin could find no flaw in the minute perfections of his performance; yet it flowed from period through period as in spontaneous re-creative impulse. Violinist and composer, the speech of the instrument, the speech of the music were as one, illuding a whole audience into as rapt impression.

Beauty and sensibility dwelt hand in hand in Mr. Heifetz's tone. Never dried nor over-refined, never coarsened nor thickened, luminous, edgeless, animate, exquisitely textured to the ear, it gains and maintains a sensuous loveliness that is as the voice of the violin, transfigured, the voice of ordered and songful sound idealized. Merely to hear it as such is to re[illegible]

pure an emotion. As it was yesterday, it [illegible] was the quintessence of the sensuous be[illegible] that the violin may yield. The sensib[illegible] of Mr. Heifetz's tone falls not a whit [illegible] low this beauty. It is ever in undulant [illegible] tion, unless the music bid an exact e[illegible] ness; light and shadow play as incessa[illegible] over it till it touches the rarest of [illegible] descence; as many accents as there are [illegible] the music this tone commands; it kn[illegible] the ply of twenty textures. Beethoven s[illegible] the violinist to the embroidery of the s[illegible] timental song of the slow movement, [illegible] Mr. Heifetz's playing wrote shimmer[illegible] arabesques upon the air. Beethoven s[illegible] the violinist to artful "passage-work" [illegible] figure and ornament and Mr. Heifetz gl[illegible] ified it into pattern that fancy drew a[illegible] warm creative impulse glamoured. M[illegible] than once, as in transition to the fina[illegible] the music by the lightest of hints anti[illegible] rates the rhythm that is to come a[illegible] Mr. Heifetz's tone as lightly quicken[illegible] with it. There are transitions in the Co[illegible] certo that are as insinuating as creepi[illegible] ght. The violinist was radiant with the[illegible] Given songful measures and he shap[illegible] the curve in unfailing loveliness of li[illegible] while the contents melted from phrase [illegible] to phrase in limpid beauty. Bright w[illegible] the sport of rhythm in the finale; yet M[illegible] Heifetz's bow never lost deft elegan[illegible] The smallest fancy, the lightest inflecti[illegible] of Beethoven upon the surface of t[illegible] music seemed not once to elude him.

Behind this beauty and this sensibilit[illegible] lay an instinctive sense of style; for M[illegible] Heifetz, prodigy though he was, is hardl[illegible] of the age to evolve such faculty by menta[illegible] process. He understood, he imparted th[illegible] Concerto as an elegant and flowing musi[illegible] skilfully adorned with tonal fancies, wit[illegible] displayful ornament, touched here an[illegible]

there with gentle sentiment or playfu[illegible] zest, music designed to charm, to give in[illegible] gratiating, yet exciting speech to violi[illegible] and violinist. Service, likewise, of th[illegible] beauty and sensibility was Mr. Heifetz' [illegible] caressing command of his instrument [illegible] Seemingly he has passed the day in which [illegible] "technical problems," as the teacher call[illegible] them, at all preoccupying him. Whatever [illegible] he wills, fingers, wrist, bow-arm readily [illegible] accomplish. For him now, there re[illegible] mains to repose upon textures, to multiply [illegible] shadings, to increase susceptibilities, [illegible] heighten expressive quality, to make the [illegible] voice of the violin more penetrating, more [illegible] beautiful, more significant of mood, as it [illegible] sometimes seems in the sensations of the [illegible] moment, than the voice of singing men or [illegible] women.

In few violinists have the qualities of [illegible] master been so assembled and coördinated [illegible] as they are in Mr. Heifetz—the technica[illegible] skill that works its will upon the instru[illegible] ment; the instinct, the affection tha[illegible] divines and draws from it close-hel[illegible] secrets; the perceiving sense and th[illegible] achieving hand that compass beauty o[illegible] tone; the responsive and imaginative sen[illegible] sibility to music; the imparting facult[illegible] glorifying what it transmits; the menta[illegible] oversight, so to say, that designs an[illegible] measures, flowering equally in the poi[illegible] and the concentration that mingle in him [illegible] As for personality, does not the sum o[illegible] these qualities, as they stood yesterday [illegible] constitute as rare and signal a personalit[illegible] as the whole field of executive artistry—[illegible] letters, music, painting—has of late re[illegible] vealed. Our time has disclosed no violin[illegible] ist that gains such ideal beauty of per[illegible] formance. According to the programm[illegible] book, Mr. Heifetz has not yet turned hi[illegible] twentieth year; yet Fate has given hi[illegible] the highest and finest of human felicities—[illegible] the ability to do one thing supremely we[illegible] for his own pleasure, for the pleasure o[illegible] all within reach of it. Not often is youth [illegible] so crowned as is this reason so to wonder—[illegible] perhaps to tremble—over maturity.

Happily, the halcyon day" neither began [illegible] nor ended with Beethoven's Concerto an[illegible] Heifetz's playing of it. Rinshy-Korschow's [illegible] suite of "Antar" dates from 1868, but stil[illegible] remains as an imaginative, eloquent, stimu[illegible] lating music. He stretches his tonal can[illegible] vas broadly; he fills it amply; he lays o[illegible] the color thickly, richly; he opens vista[illegible] to enkindled an answering imagination [illegible] Writing "Antar" when he was relatively [illegible] a young man, he is not yet pre-occupied [illegible] with subtlitier of harmonic and instrumen[illegible] tal coloring, with ingenuities of repetitio[illegible] refinements of atmosphere and suggestion [illegible] Eagerly, warmly, he writes a forthrig[illegible] music, that expands succintly from itse[illegible] proceeds until clear creative ardor, tak[illegible] form and speech as by inevitable proces[illegible] wears its own harmonic and instrument[illegible] dress. It were possible to hear "Anta[illegible] with little thought of the figure of t[illegible] Arab hero, the course of the Arab lege[illegible] behind it and yet find it a warmly invente[illegible] resourcefully conducted music, graphic [illegible] the ear, enkindling to all the listening f[illegible] ulties. There is no more need to stre[illegible] its oriental quality which is obvious enou[illegible] than its occasional "obligation" to L[illegible] which indebtness is transparent. Ev[illegible] when the third division was played as [illegible] mere intermazzo between Russian ballets [illegible] with large stride, flashed with candid colo[illegible] —music of the wonderful power of the [illegible] composer, as well as of the dominion it [illegible] would symbolize.

So, too, with the wild and rugged music, as it still sounds after fifty years, that in the scheme of the suite would speak of revenge—a virtue not often so frankly celebrated in these altruistic days, and needing, no doubt, the apologetic Oriental background. Yet it still seizes ears, that note no longer strange intervals and progressions, now become familiar, as music of savage force, image, impulse. If it is possible to write a cruel music, here Rimsky-Korsakov has written it. His pictorial imagination in tones speaks out of the Largo of the empty desert, vivid picturing, again after half a century of that process applied to tones, of a vast solitary, empty, ominous place. Strauss in some of his tone-poems dies not more graphically set his tonal scene, evoke the figure of his imagination. Only in the amorous, the semi-sensual music of the final division does "Antar" seem faded. In those days Rinsky-Korschov was less apt of hand, less disposed to dwell imaginatively upon the sensuous suggestion that fills no little of his later "Scheherazade" and "The Golden Cockerel." The amorous Arab melody, with which among the composer's decorations, Antar "dies upon a kiss" seems somewhat all in the day's work for Rimsky-Korsakov. After the music of revenge, the music of power, Antar might bet[illegible]

the arts, moreover, often courts such suggestion.

As Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra were variously graphic and eloquent with "Antar," so were they no less with the far-removed "Spanish Rhapsody" of Ravel. Indeed, it is the clear merit of this objective conducting that it descries and imparts each piece of a given concert in appropriate mood and image. Ravel's purpose in his Suite is seemingly as delineative as Rimsky-Korsakov's in his. The Parisian, no less than the Russian, would summon and sustain an atmosphere, set imaginative suggestion upspringing from it. He bids hearers catch from the music the stillness, the softness and yet the expectant tremor of his fancied Spanish night. A little and he leads them into the nervous rhythmic sensations of his Malaguena—music of the glint and the smoke of Spanish dance. In contrast, he sets beside it the voluptuous and insinuating languors of his Habanera, yet tingling beneath the smooth surface of the music. Then, for the ending, the rhythmic, the harmonic whirl of "The Fair," beating high with hot color, receding as in surfeit, but only to glow again.

Yet how different are Ravel's means in 1908 from Rimsky-Korsakov's of 1868. The Russian is lavish; the Parisian is economical. When the ear has almost forgotten it a figure of Ravel's music fructifies into motive for expanding measures. The Frenchman is as subtle as he is economical. Here a little play with the timbres of his orchestra; there like exercise of harmonic ingenuity; an astute repetition at one moment; an incisive progression at the next. Stroke upon stroke, point laid beside point; a mosaic of sedulous jointure; yet always a music that says precisely, yet with imagination; what it is designed to say. Moreover, out of these economies, these subtleties, this "pointillage" and manipulation, rise the imagery, the illusion that Ravel seeks. Who may hear his preludium without sense of the sensuous glow and quiver of the Spanish night, his dance without nervous excitement, or listen unstirred to the riotous flood, ebbing and flowing, of his fair? So to accomplish his ends by a procedure altogether his own, so to make each orchestral piece, the tour de force in kind that the "Spanish Rhapsody" surely is, is the individuality, the genius, almost, of Ravel.

H. T. P.

Baltimore, Md.
NEWS DEC 29

Henri Rabaud

M. Rabaud is the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will make his second Baltimore appearance at the Lyric the night of January 8, when the Boston Symphony will give its third local concert of the season. Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster of the organization, will be the soloist.

M. Rabaud is one of the foremost French musicians of the day, being distinguished both as a composer and a conductor.

The Boston Symphony concerts must by no means be forgotten. Everything, indeed, should be done to stimulate interest in them and to put the orchestra back in the place it formerly occupied here.

The musicians may not be as well drilled as in the old days and in other ways the organization may not measure up to past standards. But for all that it is a great organization, and [illegible] fancy that after M. Rabaud has [illegible] control of its destiny for a little while longer there will be no cause for complaint whatever.

He is a musician of thoroughly soun principles, one whose reputation wa made years ago both as a composer an as a director, and the least that Balt more music-lovers can do is to mak him feel that they are glad to welcom his visits to Baltimore and are willing give him and the body of players und him their hearty encouragement a support. He has a winning personali which is more than can sanely be sa of his predecessor, and conducts wi extreme grace.

Soloists are, unhappily, to all inter and purposes, matters of first conside tion with orchestra audiences in t city, and it might have been bet policy had the Boston Symphony—a the Philadelphia Orchestra, too, for t matter—engaged artists of greater dr ing power than those selected.

The Boston Symphony's soloist at first concert, Florence Easton, is an complished and agreeable singer, she was quite unknown here. No sol at all was heard at the second cond that having been the occasion of M. baud's debut, considered of suffic importance in itself to warrant omission, as in truth it was.

The numbers performed at these concerts were Franck's D minor S phony, Handel's Concerto Grosso, D fier's tone poem "La Bonne Chans Schubert's "Unfinished Sympho Saint-Saens' "Youth of Hercu Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier" and B din's B minor Symphony.

Frederick Fradkin, the Orches new concertmaster, will be the so at the next concert, which will place at the Lyric on January

M. HENRI RABAUD, ACADEMICIAN

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

The election of M. Rabaud, now conductor of the Boston Symphony, to a seat in the Institute, is a high tribute to a musician of much learning. It may be also something more than that—a veiled compliment to the Bostonian public. So does a government lift up the special envoys whom it sends abroad, turning rear-admirals into admirals, and ministers into full-fledged ambassadors.

This does not mean that, had he not been made conductor of the great Boston orchestra, M. Rabaud would not have been chosen to be a member of the French Institute. It merely hints that what might have come fitly—later on—has happened sooner. Well—tant mieux pour M. Rabaud. There is no doubt that he has worked hard, and with honesty, to win the place which he now occupies, not with the "Immortals" (for that term belongs exclusively to the Forty of the Académie Française), but in the Académie des Beaux-Arts. In his favor he has a distinguished past as a composer of two operatic efforts, his "Fille de Roland" and "Marouf," besides many very interesting concert works, and as conductor for seven years or more at the Paris Opera House, or, to give it its absurd official name, the Académie Nationale de Musique. As a composer he is ingenious and erudite. Not possibly quite so original as some, but well worth studying. He had at least as good a right to be elected as M. Paladilhe or M. Dubois, who had preceded him. And if his name, by some strange chance, does not appear in Baltzell's "Dictionary of Musicians," the omission need not worry him.

It may be mentioned, just in passing, that the Académie des Beaux-Arts is one of the five academic bodies which make up the Institute. The others are the Académie Française (reserved, at least in theory, for writers); the Académie des Sciences; the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres; and the Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, all sit beneath the roof of the domed building on the Seine, facing the Tuileries, known as the Palais-Mazarin, in recognition of the part which that too crafty though most able statesman played, after Richelieu, in building up French art and letters. Besides musicians, the Académie des Beaux-Arts welcomes painters, sculptors, architects and engravers. At present it includes six composers, of unequal rank—M. Saint-Saëns, M. Dubois, M. Paladilhe, M. Fauré, M. Charpentier and now M. Rabaud.

Among Frenchmen, since the creation of "the" Académie by Richelieu, it has been the fashion to deride the Institute. But, notwithstanding all the jibes of Alphonse Daudet, Zola and the de Goncourts, it is the ambition of most writers, artists and scientific men in France to become Academicians. The sneers, which Voltaire spoke about and satirized, have been largely due to the regrettable narrowness which has at times led the Academicians to snub such celebrities as Molière, Pascal, Piron, Diderot and Balzac. The neglected have avenged themselves in many ways; some, like Piron, by epigrams, others by insults. The most scathing of all hits at the Académie was embodied in Piron's own epitaph:

"Ci-git Piron, que ne fût rien—
Pas même académicien."
"Here lies Piron, who was naught—
Not even an academician."

The Immortals got even with that author by declining as one man to attend his funeral.

The de Goncourts, on the other hand, showed their dislike (or, as they no doubt would have preferred to say, contempt) for the Institute by founding an Académie of their own, and attaching their name to it. Daudet, Zola and their followers were members of this body. But, in the end, even Zola, despite all his truculence, became more than deferential to the Immortals.

Of the qualities most cherished by the Institute in dealing with writers and artists in general, the first is style. And for that reason, to their shame, the Academicians preferred Mérimée to Balzac. It may be for his style, even more than for his unquestioned erudition, that the Académie des Beaux-Arts has elected M. Rabaud, rather than M. d'Indy, M. Ravel, or M. Florent Schmitt—to say nothing of M. Février, M. Pierné, M. Messager and M. Xavier Leroux. Tot homines, tot sententiæ.

In the United States not much is known as yet with regard to the value of M. Rabaud's more important concert works. It is by these, not by his operas, that he might best like to win reputation here. Why should he not give the Boston public opportunities, from time to time, of enjoying and discussing at least some of them? To most Americans he is the composer of one opera, "Marouf," which has been heard in various places, and more especially at the Metropolitan. If he were judged by that alone, he might not rank so high as some of his French rivals. M. Rabaud is too modest and sincere to think that "Marouf" is in the same class as the "Louise" of M. Charpentier, the "Samson et Dalila" or "Henri VIII" of M. Saint-Saëns, or even the less flawless, though delightful, "Monna Vanna" of M. Février. It has much charm and grace, much piquancy and scholarship to help it. But it lacks unity and it is not original. Bizet, Delibes and others, had they been up-to-date, might have written many passages and scenes in the first part of "Marouf." As for the last, it can be traced direct to Wagner to a very large extent, and more particularly to that composer's "Meistersinger." As to its style, it is romantic and fantastic. But the romantic feeling is not quite so poetic as it might have been, while the fantasy is—shall we say, theatric? New Yorkers are still wondering why the manager of the Metropolitan selected "Marouf" for production when he had works like "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame" and "Pelléas et Mélisande" and above all, "Louise," still waiting to be added to his repertory. Can he have known (such things are possible) that M. Rabaud was to succeed Dr. Muck in Boston? Or was he anxious (as some wicked persons say) to exclude the more nearly perfect art of France from the chief New York opera house?

To deny the merits of "Marouf" would be ungenerous. But to exaggerate them would be more than foolish. "Marouf" will have its fleeting day of favor. And after that—? The prophets may reply.

There are many who would rather have their "Kismet" as a play and their "Chu-Chin-Chow" as a mere extravaganza. There are others who prefer it in the pretentious form it takes as opera. De gustibus. However it may rank, "Marouf" does credit to the craftsmanship of the newly elected Academician. One of his smaller orchestral compositions, "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after Lenau's Faust poem, also does credit to a remarkable craftsmanship, for it combines successfully the two antithetical qualities of compactness and atmosphere. No one will grudge M. Rabaud his high good fortune. Whatever else he may or may not be, he is a musician of authority and taste.

CITIZEN

ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Big Brooklyn Audience at the Academy Applauds the Musicians.

The music which M. Henri Rabaud brought to the hearing of his audience at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night before a capacity audience was evidence conclusive that this famous orchestra had lost none of its wonted drawing powers with Brooklyn concert-goers.

A programme made up of compositions by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Mendelssohn and Ravel was rich with charming music as conducted by Mr. Rabaud, a musician with a distinct message who has something very interesting to say and who knows exactly how to say it.

The opening number, Symphony No. 2, "Antar," op. 15 (Rimsky-Korsakoff), with its introductory Largo, melodic phrases against chromatic harmonies, was well executed. The second movement was more free in form with frequent changes in tempo. In the third there is a brilliant march theme and a sensuous cantilena, and the fourth is similar to the first, ending in pianissimo. All were delightfully given.

The second number, Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor for violin, op. 64, with Fedric Fradkin as the soloist, with accompaniment by stringed instruments, in three connected movements. Mr. Fradkin, the concert master and soloist, played with a most musical tone and showed himself a skillful technician. He had a cordial reception and was heartily applauded for his brilliant work.

"Rapsodie Espagnole," by Ravel, bewitching in tonal combinations, was the concluding number on the programme.

The audience, appreciating the charm of the music and the perfection of the performance, recalled Mr. Rabaud many times.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON OF EXCEPTIONAL PLEASURE

Happy Return of a "Halcyon Day" for Orchestra, Audience and Conductor—Mr. Heifetz Plays Beethoven's Concerto for Violin at the Acme of His Powers—Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar" and Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" Make Contrasts in Imaginative and Graphic Music

FOR the first time since the new régime took possession of the Symphony Concerts, they recalled yesterday the atmosphere and accomplishment, yielded the pleasant excitement of an earlier day. For once, thanks, no doubt, to the presence of Mr. Heifetz as "assisting artist," every place in Symphony Hall seemed taken by an audience of the familiar, distinctive quality of years past. By reason of his first coming to the concerts that agreeable air of anticipation, which is antidote to placid routine, pervaded the assembled company. Those who regretted his absence last winter, in the first flush of his fame in America, were now expectantly content; those who had waited to hear him—and in Beethoven's Concerto—at a Symphony Concert were becomingly eager. To the full, Mr. Heifetz fulfilled these lively anticipations, and, in the keenest of memories few of the eminent violinists preceding him upon the stage of Symphony Hall these many years, and sometimes in this Concerto, have surpassed his playing. For the time he was at the acme of his powers, so far as Bostonian audiences yet know them, and loud, long, altogether spontaneous and generous—since for once there was no hope of extra pieces—were the plaudits rewarding him. The whole hall rang with them and it was pleasanter than words can half say to hear this return to the old enthusiasms. For still ampler measure, the forepiece to the Concerto, Rimsky-Kosakov's symphonic Suite, "Antar," and the after-piece, Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," were interesting music of modern or ultra-modern voice, well read in his usual objective fashion by Mr. Rabaud, played by the orchestra with a nearer approximation to ancient mingling of technical perfection and of expressive warmth than it has often attained since the reorganization of last autumn. Once more, it was a band commanding both finesse and power, euphony and pliancy, ardor and exactitude of characterizing and revealing voice. For an afternoon at least, the "halcyon days" of the Symphony Orchestra, as its good-willed public in New York is beginning to call them, were come again. They warrant rejoicing; they justify hope of such continuing quality.

Mr. Heifetz, in whom the interest of the afternoon plainly centred, chose wisely in Beethoven's Concerto often as it has been played in recent years at Symphony Hall. It is not music of the puissant Beethoven, storming the heavens in a passion of self-release in tones. It is, by record, no more than a piece written to oblige his friend, the violinist, Clement, and designed to display virtuoso, musician and instrument. The lines of the Concerto curve, expand, interweave agreeably upon the ear. The subject-matter charms in the sentimental grace of the slow movement or the rhythmic animation of the finale; interests in the long first Allegro by ingenious variety of progress, by felicitous and fanciful adornment. At every turn, even in the decorative "passage-work," the voice of the music is songful. Sentiment, elegance continuously touch it and invite like qualities in the playing violinist. How finely spun and piquant to the ear is many a transition in the first movement; how gently flowing in singing orchestra and in embroidering violin is the succeeding Romance; with what gay energy play the returns of the motives of the Rondo. The hand of Beethoven light is not less good to hear and to feel than the hand of Beethoven, puissant. The Beethoven of fancy and charm is rare beside the Beethoven of power and passion. Beethoven, if the listener will, displaying violin and violinist, but so doing with the discernment, the imagination, the felicity of a master. Hackneyed "repertory piece" though it is, played in any fashion above routine, the Concerto still gladdens the ear, warms the heart.

Played by Mr. Heifetz at the zenith of his present powers, with the orchestra kindling to the occasion, with Mr. Rabaud steadily considerate of the quality of the music and the will of the violinist, the Concerto was clothed in transcendent beauty. From youth Mr. Heifetz is ripening fast into young manhood; even to the eye he is a far maturer figure than he was a year ago; while to ear and mind, he seems to gain finer insight into his music keener sensibility in the communication of it, a yet more adroit command of the violin, of the subtleties and the glamours of the tone he draws from it. Intent solely upon his work yet instinctively or reflectively measuring every stroke and detail, he is rare figure of the concert-hall in this mingling of concentration and poise. But for his sedulous regard for euphonies with the orchestra, for his fidelity in almost every measure to Beethoven's clear intent, he might have been summoning the Concerto from himself, from the surrounding air. The pedants of the violin and the music of the violin could find no flaw in the minute perfections of his performance; yet it flowed from period through period as in spontaneous re-creative impulse. Violinist and composer, the speech of the instrument, the speech of the music were as one, illuding a whole audience into as rapt impression.

Beauty and sensibility dwelt hand in hand in Mr. Heifetz's tone. Never dried nor over-refined, never coarsened nor thickened, luminous, edgeless, animate, exquisitely textured to the ear, it gains and maintains a sensuous loveliness that is as the voice of the violin, transfigured, the voice of ordered and songful sound idealized. Merely to hear it as such is to re[illegible]

pure an emotion. As it was yesterday, it was the quintessence of the sensuous be[illegible] that the violin may yield. The sensib[illegible] of Mr. Heifetz's tone falls not a whit [illegible] low this beauty. It is ever in undulant [illegible] tion, unless the music bid an exact e[illegible] ness; light and shadow play as incessa[illegible] over it till it touches the rarest of [illegible] descence; as many accents as there are [illegible] the music this tone commands; it kn[illegible] the ply of twenty textures. Beethoven s[illegible] the violinist to the embroidery of the s[illegible] timental song of the slow movement, a[illegible] Mr. Heifetz's playing wrote shimmer[illegible] arabesques upon the air. Beethoven s[illegible] the violinist to artful "passage-work" [illegible] figure and ornament and Mr. Heifetz gl[illegible] ified it into pattern that fancy drew a[illegible] warm creative impulse glamoured. Mo[illegible] than once, as in transition to the fina[illegible] the music by the lightest of hints anti[illegible] pates the rhythm that is to come a[illegible] Mr. Heifetz's tone as lightly quicken[illegible] with it. There are transitions in the Co[illegible] certo that are as insinuating as creepi[illegible] ght. The violinist was radiant with the[illegible] Given songful measures and he shap[illegible] the curve in unfailing loveliness of li[illegible] while the contents melted from phrase i[illegible] to phrase in limpid beauty. Bright w[illegible] the sport of rhythm in the finale; yet M[illegible] Heifetz's bow never lost deft elegan[illegible] The smallest fancy, the lightest inflecti[illegible] of Beethoven upon the surface of t[illegible] music seemed not once to elude him.

Behind this beauty and this sensibilit[illegible] lay an instinctive sense of style; for M[illegible] Heifetz, prodigy though he was, is hardl[illegible] of the age to evolve such faculty by menta[illegible] process. He understood, he imparted th[illegible] Concerto as an elegant and flowing musi[illegible] skilfully adorned with tonal fancies, wit[illegible] displayful ornament, touched here an[illegible]

there with gentle sentiment or playfu[illegible] zest, music designed to charm, to give in[illegible] gratiating, yet exciting speech to violi[illegible] and violinist. Service, likewise, of th[illegible] beauty and sensibility was Mr. Heifetz' [illegible] caressing command of his instrument [illegible] Seemingly he has passed the day in which [illegible] "technical problems," as the teacher call[illegible] them, at all preoccupying him. Whatever [illegible] he wills, fingers, wrist, bow-arm readily [illegible] accomplish. For him now, there re[illegible] mains to repose upon textures, to multiply [illegible] shadings, to increase susceptibilities, [illegible] heighten expressive quality, to make the [illegible] voice of the violin more penetrating, more [illegible] beautiful, more significant of mood, as it [illegible] sometimes seems in the sensations of the [illegible] moment, than the voice of singing men or [illegible] women.

In few violinists have the qualities of a [illegible] master been so assembled and coördinated [illegible] as they are in Mr. Heifetz—the technical [illegible] skill that works its will upon the instrument; the instinct, the affection that [illegible] divines and draws from it close-held [illegible] secrets; the perceiving sense and the [illegible] achieving hand that compass beauty of [illegible] tone; the responsive and imaginative sensibility to music; the imparting faculty [illegible] glorifying what it transmits; the mental [illegible] oversight, so to say, that designs and [illegible] measures, flowering equally in the poise [illegible] and the concentration that mingle in him. [illegible] As for personality, does not the sum of [illegible] these qualities, as they stood yesterday [illegible] constitute as rare and signal a personality [illegible] as the whole field of executive artistry—[illegible] letters, music, painting—has of late re[illegible] vealed. Our time has disclosed no violin[illegible] ist that gains such ideal beauty of per[illegible] formance. According to the programme [illegible] book, Mr. Heifetz has not yet turned his [illegible] twentieth year; yet Fate has given him [illegible] the highest and finest of human felicities—[illegible] the ability to do one thing supremely well [illegible] for his own pleasure, for the pleasure of [illegible] all within reach of it. Not often is youth [illegible] so crowned as is this reason so to wonder—[illegible] perhaps to tremble—over maturity.

Happily, the halcyon day" neither began nor ended with Beethoven's Concerto and Heifetz's playing of it. Rinshy-Korschow's suite of "Antar" dates from 1868, but still remains as an imaginative, eloquent, stimulating music. He stretches his tonal canvas broadly; he fills it amply; he lays on the color thickly, richly; he opens vistas to enkindled an answering imagination. Writing "Antar" when he was relatively a young man, he is not yet pre-occupied with subtlitier of harmonic and instrumental coloring, with ingenuities of repetition, refinements of atmosphere and suggestions. Eagerly, warmly, he writes a forthright music, that expands succintly from itself, proceeds until clear creative ardor, takes form and speech as by inevitable process, wears its own harmonic and instrumental dress. It were possible to hear "Antar" with little thought of the figure of the Arab hero, the course of the Arab legend behind it and yet find it a warmly invented, resourcefully conducted music, graphic to the ear, enkindling to all the listening faculties. There is no more need to stress its oriental quality which is obvious enough than its occasional "obligation" to Lizt which indebtness is transparent. Even when the third division was played as a mere intermazzo between Russian ballots, with large stride, flashed with candid color—music of the wonderful power of the composer, as well as of the dominion it would symbolize.

So, too, with the wild and rugged music, as it still sounds after fifty years, that in the scheme of the suite would speak of revenge—a virtue not often so frankly celebrated in these altruistic days, and needing, no doubt, the apologetic Oriental background. Yet it still seizes ears, that note no longer strange intervals and progressions, now become familiar, as music of savage force, image, impulse. If it is possible to write a cruel music, here Rimsky-Korsakov has written it. His pictorial imagination in tones speaks out of the Largo of the empty desert, vivid picturing, again after half a century of that process applied to tones, of a vast solitary, empty, ominous place. Strauss in some of his tone-poems dies not more graphically set his tonal scene, evoke the figure of his imagination. Only in the amorous, the semi-sensual music of the final division does "Antar" seem faded. In those days Rinsky-Korschov was less apt of hand, less disposed to dwell imaginatively upon the sensuous suggestion that fills no little of his later "Scheherazade" and "The Golden Cockerel." The amorous Arab melody, with which among the composer's decorations, Antar "dies upon a kiss" seems somewhat all in the day's work for Rimsky-Korsakov. After the music of revenge, the music of power, Antar might bet[illegible]

the arts, moreover, often courts such suggestion.

As Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra were variously graphic and eloquent with "Antar," so were they no less with the far-removed "Spanish Rhapsody" of Ravel. Indeed, it is the clear merit of this objective conducting that it descries and imparts each piece of a given concert in appropriate mood and image. Ravel's purpose in his Suite is seemingly as delineative as Rimsky-Korsakov's in his. The Parisian, no less than the Russian, would summon and sustain an atmosphere, set imaginative suggestion upspringing from it. He bids hearers catch from the music the stillness, the softness and yet the expectant tremor of his fancied Spanish night. A little and he leads them into the nervous rhythmic sensations of his Malaguena—music of the glint and the smoke of Spanish dance. In contrast, he sets beside it the voluptuous and insinuating languors of his Habanera, yet tingling beneath the smooth surface of the music. Then, for the ending, the rhythmic, the harmonic whirl of "The Fair," beating high with hot color, receding as in surfeit, but only to glow again.

Yet how different are Ravel's means of 1908 from Rimsky-Korsakov's of 1868. The Russian is lavish; the Parisian is economical. When the ear has almost forgotten it a figure of Ravel's music fructifies into motive for expanding measures. The Frenchman is as subtle as he is economical. Here a little play with the timbre of his orchestra; there like exercise of harmonic ingenuity; an astute repetition at one moment; an incisive progression at the next. Stroke upon stroke, point laid beside point; a mosaic of sedulous jointure yet always a music that says precisely, yet with imagination; what it is designed to say. Moreover, out of these economies, these subtleties, this "pointillage" and manipulation, rise the imagery, the illusion the Ravel seeks. Who may hear his preludes without sense of the sensuous glow and quiver of the Spanish night, his dance without nervous excitement, or listen to stirred to the riotous flood, ebbing and flowing, of his fair? So to accomplish his ends by a procedure altogether his own, so to make each orchestral piece, the tour de force in kind that the "Spanish Rhapsody" surely is, is the individuality, the genius, almost, of Ravel.

H. T. P.

ltimore, Md.

MS DEC 23

Henri Rabaud

[illegible]baud is the new director of the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra. He will [illegible] second Baltimore appearance [illegible] Lyric the night of January 8. [illegible] Boston Symphony will give its [illegible]al concert of the season. Fred[illegible]dkin, concertmaster of the or[illegible]n, will be the soloist.

[illegible]baud is one of the foremost [illegible]usicians of the day, being dis[illegible] both as a composer and a [illegible]

[illegible]n Symphony concerts must [illegible]ans be forgotten. Everything [illegible]ould be done to stimulate in[illegible] them and to put the orchestra [illegible]he place it formerly occupied [illegible]

[illegible]usicians may not be as well [illegible]s in the old days and in other [illegible] organization may not meas[illegible]o past standards. But for all [illegible]is a great organization and [illegible]hat after M. Rabaud has [illegible] of its destiny for a little while [illegible] there will be no cause for com[illegible] whatever.

[illegible]is a musician of thoroughly soun[illegible]iples, one whose reputation wa[illegible] years ago both as a composer an[illegible] director, and the least that Balt[illegible]ore music-lovers can do is to mak[illegible]im feel that they are glad to welcom[illegible] his visits to Baltimore and are willing [illegible] give him and the body of players und[illegible] him their hearty encouragement a[illegible] support. He has a winning personali[illegible] which is more than can sanely be sa[illegible] of his predecessor, and conducts w[illegible] extreme grace.

Soloists are, unhappily, to all inte[illegible] and purposes, matters of first conside[illegible]tion with orchestra audiences in t[illegible] city, and it might have been bet[illegible] policy had the Boston Symphony—a[illegible] the Philadelphia Orchestra, too, for t[illegible] matter—engaged artists of greater dr[illegible]ing power than those selected.

The Boston Symphony's soloist at [illegible] first concert, Florence Easton, is an [illegible] complished and agreeable singer, [illegible] she was quite unknown here. No sol[illegible] at all was heard at the second conc[illegible] that having been the occasion of M. [illegible]baud's debut, considered of suffic[illegible] importance in itself to warrant [illegible] omission, as in truth it was.

The numbers performed at these [illegible] concerts were Franck's D minor S[illegible]phony, Handel's Concerto Grosso, [illegible]fler's tone poem "La Bonne Chans[illegible] Schubert's "Unfinished Sympho[illegible] Saint-Saens' "Youth of Hercu[illegible] Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier" and B[illegible]din's B minor Symphony.

Frederick Fradkin, the Orches[illegible] new concert master, will be the so[illegible] at the first concert, which will [illegible] place at the Lyric on January 8.

REDUCTION RATIO

16x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

TIMES

New York City

MOST "early works" are putty to the master's mold; a rare few shine with steadfast individuality and self-sufficient beauty, declares a note on D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," which heads the next Boston Symphony program, to be played in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9. Boston found Mr. Rabaud's recent interpretation of the work one of his finest achievements so far. Also listed for Thursday week in New York is the first American work of Mr. Rabaud's choice, Converse's orchestral fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter" of Walt Whitman, as well as a suite arranged by Rabaud himself from English sixteenth century music found in the "Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth," and, finally, Berlioz's overture, "King Lear."

For Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, the Boston men will have Schumann's symphony in D minor and Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," after Lenau's "Faust," which has been played in Boston and San Francisco this season. There are also Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora" No. 3.

m POST

dress: Washington, D. C.

At the Boston symphony concert in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 7, there will be opportunity to hear the new American concert master of 26, Mr. Frederic Fradkin, who is to play the solo part in the concerto, which more than any other music has popularized the name of Mendelssohn. Although Mr. Fradkin's parents were Russian, although he studied in Paris and played everywhere, still he was born in Troy, N. Y., and has lived here most of his life, and one need only talk to him to recognize him as an American first and last. He was the first American violinist to take a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire, was presented with a fine instrument by the French government, studied with Remy and Ysaye, played principally in Paris, Brussels and Vienna, and came to his country as concert master for the Russian ballet in 1915.

EVENING SUN

New York City

Orchestral Plans and Plots

In place of a symphony at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Jan. 9, Mr. Rabaud will conduct D'Indy's early "Wallenstein," a trilogy inspired by Schiller's dramas, depicting the "brouhaha" of Wallenstein's camp, the thwarted loves of the "Piccolomini" and the General's tragic death. Boston found it remarkably charactered and individually conceived work for a composer in his 20s, the more comely for the frank influences of Wagner and Schumann. They also found the ardent reading of Mr. Rabaud one of the best things he has done. Also for Thursday comes the first native work of Mr. Rabaud's choice, Converse's Orchestral Fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter" of Walt Whitman, a startling and triumphant piece of high aspirations; a Suite of sixteenth century music which Mr. Rabaud has arranged from the Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth; finally, Berlioz's Overture, "King Lear."

For Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, is listed Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," which has been played in Boston and San Francisco this season; Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," and Beethoven's Overture to Leonora No. 3.

PUBLIC LEDGER

s Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 1918

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, there will be opportunity to hear the new American concertmaster of twenty-six, Fredric Fradkin, as soloist in the concerto which more than any other music has popularized and perpetuated the name of Mendelssohn. Another matter of interest will be the symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," the first of Mr. Rabaud's own works conducted by him in this country. New York's open-armed reception of Mr. Rabaud on December 5 more than confirmed Philadelphia's opinion of him. As to his marvelous precision and control over the men, his interpretive and emotional power, his results in tone, in massed and individual detail—these were found to glorify even the old standards of the orchestra.

The symphony is to be Schumann's Fourth in D major, and the final number Berlioz's high-spirited and colorful overture to "King Lear."

"RELAXATION IS THE SECRET," SAYS EW SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER

Fradkin, Leader of the Violins, Te ow He Keeps His Nerve

Frederick Fradkin, new concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his happy family. This photo was snapped for the Boston Sunday Post in the famous first violinist's home, while the ladies were playing cards.

BY OLIN DOWNES

Not all virtuosi talk sensibly. Mr. Frederick Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, talked sensibly and like a human being about his music while he was being photographed in his rooms as newspapers insist on photographing artists. He was photographed solo and "en famille," reading, fiddling, card playing. One would have thought he led a most variegated career, but, as a matter of fact, he is a level headed and good-natured soul, who does not devour newspaper critiques for breakfast or practise without eating his dinner.

"I may lack ambition to the necessary extent," he said. "Of course, I prefer to think otherwise, but the fact is that I would not for all the world limit myself as completely to violin practice as many greater violinists than myself do. I really like to monkey with electric wires in the house, tinker with an automobile when it gets out of order, fish and hunt. I like the country, like to loaf and travel about. A corrective to loafing is being concertmaster for an orchestra of the abilities and standards of the Boston Symphony.

"The average man and even music lover doesn't know how much responsibility and strain there is in this position, and how much hard labor, in and out of rehearsals. The preparation of uniform bowings, etc., the carrying, in a way, on your back the doings of the men behind you. This doesn't mean that you are necessarily a better fiddler than anyone else sitting about you, but it does mean that you are held responsible for what your string division accomplishes, and you sometimes get nerves about it.

Feeling the Ear of the Audience

"You feel the least drag, the least indifference of any one of the men in back of you; you feel the eye of the conductor and the ear of the audience a good deal more, perhaps, than the audience realizes. They feel your slightest shortcoming, and echo it. There is strain. You have to meet it. I meet it, I think, with a minimum of wear, for the reason that I can relax nerves and muscles when the time comes to do so.

"'Relaxation' is a war-cry with modern teachers of technic. But it is more than that. It usually solves the problem of physical efficiency, and often of mental strain also. It isn't the boxer who tenses every muscle and glares at his man with every nerve working overtime and pouring out nervous energy whether he is fighting or simply watching his opponent, who does the trick. It is the man who uses his muscles, concentrates his blow, and then 'lets up,' figuratively speaking, until it's time to use the muscle again. Then he pours his energy into that muscle and the blow tells, and he gets ready for the next one, rested and with necessary energy to command. That holds true of every activity."

Muscles and Success

"People usually start entirely wrong at doing any work. They tense all up. Their muscles get in kinks, and these kinks communicate themselves to the mind. The muscle won't obey the command of the brain, the brain is startled and confused at the manner the muscle bungle their task, and confusion goes worse compounded. A majority of those who labor and yearn all their lives for technic are likely to be in some such dilemma, and the condition grows steadily worse instead of better as they go on.

"I sometimes think that more celebrated musicians owe their success to the accident of the muscles of fingers or arms or thread falling into place and instinctively doing team work from the beginning that is often realized. A singer has naturally, we say, a beautiful voice. How many of the great singers, I wonder, really learned to sing from their teachers? I think a great many, at least, were started right by nature, and worked on from the place at which the majority of singers stop. Of course physical facility does not necessarily mean musical expressiveness. It is often the contrary, but I don't see how one can be very musical if muscles and nerves are at cross purposes. What disturbs the muscle disturbs the mind, and what disturbs the mind hinders the necessary absorption in the music.

"I happen to have a facility which I can say in all frankness may have been the cause of my having been a concert master instead of a soloist pure and simple. Technic comes on the whole rather readily to me. For example, while I of course practise industriously as everybody who plays, I do not care whom must do—I very seldom trouble to mark by bowings, as most violinists. There is the Brahms concerto, which is very hard, unviolinistic, and which I do not like. But I have played it. Do you see a marking? I can look at a technical problem freshly every time my eye rests on the page. I do most things in the way in which I began doing them, but often alter a bowing or fingering on the spot, because I see instantly in my mind the shorter and more direct way to do it, and I can alter the method that quickly, if I have to."

He showed me many of his scores. They all were clean, new-looking, not the pencilled, dirty pages of the student or artist who figures out, as most of us must, every move he makes in performance. As for a man who does not finger and bow everything in the Brahms concerto, and plan it is carefully as General Foch plans every move of an offensive—whoever has tried to play an instrument will know what such technical self-reliance and facility means.

"I don't say for an instant," went on Mr. Fradkin, "that preparedness is not as advisable in concert as on a battle-

The widespread smile of Frederick Fradkin, erstwhile violinist, and now concertmaster of the Boston Symp Orchestra, is most infectious. And he can play better than he can smile.

fiel con cles me sup sud not kne bee fal sul
You
You pra sou mu ale any

H oth tic pia not ltat few vio
a l was inst
hav an viol any hav

H sai neg way ist
"q ans Loo ped ina can did to wil for

M nai
ing vel mo see it a doe pla ten wh it thi

A wo is
"
sha aft mu a f ar fir sen ric mu cha the
"
we ent me
I h
I p.
Go no w wi ti ce

n what does preparedness ppose you teach your mus- ote, to do a thing—'finger as it has been called. Then a minute of nervousness you commence to think note by hat you are doing? Do you the very fingers which have ed to do a certain task in- e the fingers which, under a expected crisis, will fail you? destroyed their initiative. gotten them out of the working intelligently and re- That is a danger of too ing, too much practising ways. It is easy to push harmful extremes."

t he wished he played an- ent than the violin—par- wished that he played the use a violin is only one l. "Its literature has lim- with the exception of a hatas and such things for which not one person in understands, you have al- e some other instrument or to help you out. I must st a piano, and preferably n, to get all I can from my t pianists—they can play anything they think of, and he harmony there."

laying the Piano

going on that way, when I think how horrible a piano nds, and the uninteresting -nine out of a hundred pianmatter of the pianist," he "not the fault of the piano. ts resources. Look at its w can anyone with imag- to get something from it? I play this instrument, for I gin to do so until too late ut I have accompanied my she sings, and it was fun ot for her."

lkin, under another stage sung in many cities in lead- light opera, and is now de- n extensive repertory of a s character. "You ought to y," she said. "He doesn't do to approved method, but he things that few pianists I can do as easily. He will e in octaves, and other mat- t kind. I think a musician echnical ability usually has st any instrument, and I true of my husband."

Mr. Fradkin said that he wish to be a musician who ave to his instrument.

violinists," he said, "who gingerly because they are hing will happen to the eir fingers. Others refuse nnis for fear of their bow that sort of thing. In the think much of it is non- he second place, if that is will sacrifice a little tech- to enjoy my life and my uld never enjoy it if I were a violin 12 hours out of at my music I try to intelligently. When I do. That is better for erformances and pupils. ealth, which makes life n it is for many, and I oy the health that I have. personally, and for one's wledge and interest in on about you; a little then, in other lines than ession, are, I think, ex- musicians."

Mr. Fradkin's appointment to the post of concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has placed him as a young man in one of the most important orchestral positions in the world. He makes his Boston debut as soloist with the orchestra in the near future.

He was born in Troy, N.Y., took a first prize for violin playing at the Paris Conservatoire, and was soloist under Pennquin at the age of 18. In January, 1911, he was soloist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Mahler. From there he went to London, and also played under Landon Ronald in Birmingham. In 1912 he was soloist at Vienna, after which he came back to America as first violinist of the orchestra of the Russian Ballet under Monteux.

Mr. Fradkin was frank to say that he thought the marvellous spectacles and performances of the Russian Ballet were, on the whole, considerably in advance of the artistic conceptions of this period and would have to wait a few years for complete public appreciation. He also thought that the Russian Ballet was grossly and intentionally mismanaged from New York in order to prove to a generous and public-spirited man who had fathered the en that such a thing was bound to b ing but a financial failure.

"I was there at the beginni end," he said, "of an unsu though admirable enterprise, and nessed the mismanagement tha not possibly have been less tha tional, in routes, in travelling a ments, and all the rest of it. day will come when the pro shown by the Russian Ballet welcomed and insisted on by accustomed to their genius and and determined to have such ances frequent and accessible."

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1919

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

SAINT-SAENS AS COMPOSER OF THE HOUR

Present Vogue of His Pieces Through American Concert-Halls, and Possible Reason for It—No Western Tour for the Symphony Orchestra—Roussel Revealed—Items, Incidents and Opinions

SAINT-SAENS, when he made his American tour in the autumn of 1906, came twelve years too early. Even for him, the sprightliest of old men, travel is probably out of the question in his present eighties, but otherwise he should have waited until the present season when his music is enjoying a vogue in American concert-halls that the longest memory may not recall. True, he was abundantly feted on that half-forgotten visit; but as it seemed at the time, one and another of his pieces was "resurrected" to grace festal occasion. Now, of a sudden, they are the fashion of the musical day. Violinists, young and middle-aged, may not be parted from his concerto in B minor; no more will the pianists be divorced from his concerto in G minor; while his "organ" symphony stands on many an orchestral programme and Mr. Damrosch has lately added thereto one of his earlier and usually neglected symphonies. As for his tone-poems—"The Youth of Hercules," "Phaeton," "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and the rest—they pop up on every hand; while the violinist or the pianist is careless who does not find Saëns's abundant trifles. Before long, if the mode holds firm, the directors of the Metropolitan and the Chicago opera companies will be fingering restlessly the pages of "Etienne Marcel," "Phryne," "L'Alcetre." For Saint-Saëns has written other operas (after their manner) besides the perennial "Samson and Delilah."

Fashions are fashions with music as with everything else and usually there is no explaining them. Yet one reason for this present vogue of Saint-Saëns up and down our concert-halls does seemingly appear. Every conductor of an orchestra in America, every wandering violinist or pianist, believes that for the time he must play much French music because of the present American liking and deference for all things French. On the other hand, the American public quickly hears enough of Debussy, Ravel, Roger-Ducasse, Schmitt and the other Parisian "modernists," even to the delicate and eclectic Fauré. In vain the conductor or the virtuoso seeks some long line of French "classicists" amongst whom he can choose as with German music, he picks from Bach through Brahms. He finds—only Saint-Saëns and the scanty Franck; for Berlioz remains intrinsically a romantic composer, an isolated individual, almost, in the course of music Hence, plausibly, the present frequency of Saint-Saëns upon any and all programmes. Often his music pleases the listeners; sometimes it stimulates a conductor as it plainly kindles Mr. Rabaud; almost always it is agreeable medium for pianist or violinist. Yet with the rising vogue of it rises no less the resentment of those, especially in the younger generation, who count it no more than polished and eclectic mechanics and artfully artificial mood or picture.

Here in Boston

For various reasons, the chief of which is the cost of the journey, the Symphony Orchestra will make no visit to the Middle West during the first week of February. Instead, on Friday afternoon, Feb. 7, and Saturday evening, Feb. 8, it will be heard as usual at Symphony Hall, replacing by this pair of concerts the omitted pair of Oct. 18 and 19 last. Thus, the series will end as usual on the first Friday and the first Saturday of May.

When the orchestra returns from its present journey southward, several former players in it will rejoin the band, having completed in the course of the current week the formalities by which they become citizens of the United States. Among them are three horn-players, so that the orchestra will again contain eight horns—a highly desirable increase, since the five who have been carrying the horn-part through the season have been showing plain signs of over-work. The newcomer from the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris are also to be expected soon.

The probability now is that Mr. Hofmann at his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 26, will repeat the piano-pieces by American composers to the played by him the day before in New York for the first time in public. They fill a whole programme and, in the main, are fresh and interesting work of the younger generation.

n WORLD

ress New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT NOT UP TO THE HIGH MARK

Conductor Rabaud Gives Schumann's Work the Dryest Reading Heard Here in a Long Time.

Admirers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not find in yesterday's Carnegie Hall matinee concert the same degree of excellence which prevailed at the first two programmes Henri Rabaud conducted last month.

The new musical leader gave one of the dryest readings of Schumann's D minor symphony New York has heard in a long time. With the exception of the sherzo, which had life and lightness, the performance appeared as having been carefully measured and blocked out with mathematical exactness.

M. Rabaud conducted his own symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," based on the Lena poem. The work is moderately good descriptive music which suggests in its very tonal quietude such a procession as the poet wrote about.

The programme also contained the delightful and picturesque "Rapsodie Espagnole" of Rovel and the No. 3 "Leonore" overture of Beethoven.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

TIMES

New York City

MOST "early works" are putty to the master's mold; a rare few shine with steadfast individuality and self-sufficient beauty, declares a note on D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," which heads the next Boston Symphony program, to be played in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9. Boston found Mr. Rabaud's recent interpretation of the work one of his finest achievements so far. Also listed for Thursday week in New York is the first American work of Mr. Rabaud's choice, Converse's orchestral fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter" of Walt Whitman, as well as a suite arranged by Rabaud himself from English sixteenth century music found in the "Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth," and, finally, Berlioz's overture, "King Lear."

For Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, the Boston men will have Schumann's symphony in D minor and Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," after Lenau's "Faust," which has been played in Boston and San Francisco this season. There are also Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora" No. 3.

m POST

dress: Washington, D. C.

At the Boston symphony concert in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 7, there will be opportunity to hear the new American concert master of 26, Mr. Frederic Fradkin, who is to play the solo part in the concerto, which more than any other music has popularized the name of Mendelssohn. Although Mr. Fradkin's parents were Russian, although he studied in Paris and played everywhere, still he was born in Troy, N. Y., and has lived here most of his life, and one need only talk to him to recognize him as an American first and last. He was the first American violinist to take a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire, was presented with a fine instrument by the French government, studied with Remy and Ysaye, played principally in Paris, Brussels and Vienna, and came to his country as concert master for the Russian ballet in 1915.

EVENING SUN

s New York City

DEC 21

Orchestral Plans and Plots

In place of a symphony at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Jan. 9, Mr. Rabaud will conduct D'Indy's early "Wallenstein," a trilogy inspired by Schiller's dramas, depicting the "brouhaha" of Wallenstein's camp, the thwarted loves of the "Piccolomini" and the General's tragic death. Boston found it remarkably charactered and individually conceived work for a composer in his 20s, the more comely for the frank influences of Wagner and Schumann. They also found the ardent reading of Mr. Rabaud one of the best things he has done. Also for Thursday comes the first native work of Mr. Rabaud's choice, Converse's Orchestral Fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter" of Walt Whitman, a startling and triumphant piece of high aspirations; a Suite of sixteenth century music which Mr. Rabaud has arranged from the Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth; finally, Derlioz's Overture, "King Lear."

For Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, is listed Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," which has been played in Boston and San Francisco this season; Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," and Beethoven's Overture to Leonora No. 3.

PUBLIC LEDGER

s Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 29 1918

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, there will be opportunity to hear the new American concertmaster of twenty-six, Fredric Fradkin, as soloist in the concerto which more than any other music has popularized and perpetuated the name of Mendelssohn. Another matter of interest will be the symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," the first of Mr. Rabaud's own works conducted by him in this country. New York's open-armed reception of Mr. Rabaud on December 5 more than confirmed Philadelphia's opinion of him. As to his marvelous precision and control over the men, his interpretive and emotional power, his results in tone, in massed and individual detail—these were found to glorify even the old standards of the orchestra.

The symphony is to be Schumann's Fourth in D major, and the final number Berlioz's high-spirited and colorf overture to "King Lear."

"RELAXATION IS THE SECRET," SAYS EW SYM

Fradkin, Leader of the Violins, Te ow He Keeps

Frederick Fradkin, new concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his happy family. This photo was snapped for the Boston Sunday Post in the famous first violinist's home, while the ladies were playing cards.

BY OLIN DOWNES

Not all virtuosi talk sensibly. Mr. Frederick Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, talked sensibly and like a human being about his music while he was being photographed in his rooms as newspapers insist on photographing artists. He was photographed solo and "en famille," reading, fiddling, card playing. One would have thought he led a most variegated career, but, as a matter of fact, he is a level headed and good-natured soul, who does not devour newspaper critiques for breakfast or practise without eating his dinner.

"I may lack ambition to the necessary extent," he said. "Of course, I prefer to think otherwise, but the fact is that I would not for all the world limit myself as completely to violin practice as many greater violinists than myself do. I really like to monkey with electric wires in the house, tinker with an automobile when it gets out of order, fish and hunt. I like the country, like to loaf and travel about. A corrective to loafing is being concertmaster for an orchestra of the abilities and standards of the Boston Symphony.

"The average man and even music lover doesn't know how much responsibility and strain there is in this position, and how much hard labor, in and out of rehearsals. The preparation of uniform bowings, etc., the carrying, in a way, on your back the doings of the men behind you. This doesn't mean that you are necessarily a better fiddler than anyone else sitting about you, but it does mean that you are held responsible for what your string division accomplishes, and you sometimes get nerves about it.

Feeling the Ear of the Audience

"You feel the least drag, the least indifference of any one of the men in back of you; you feel the eye of the conductor and the ear of the audience a good deal more, perhaps, than the audience realizes. They feel your slightest shortcoming, and echo it. There is strain. You have to meet it. I meet it, I think, with a minimum of wear, for the reason that I can relax nerves and muscles when the time comes to do so.

"'Relaxation' is a war-cry with modern teachers of technic. But it is more than that. It usually solves the problem of physical efficiency, and often of mental strain also. It isn't the boxer who tenses every muscle and glares at his man with every nerve working overtime and pouring out nervous energy whether he is fighting or simply watching his opponent, who does the trick. It is the man who uses his muscles, concentrates his blow, and then 'lets up,' figuratively speaking, until it's time to use the muscle again. Then he pours his energy into that muscle and the blow tells, and he gets ready for the next one, rested and with necessary energy to command. That holds true of every activity."

"People usually start entirely wrong at doing any work. They tense all up. Their muscles get in kinks, and these kinks communicate themselves to the mind. The muscle won't obey the command of the brain, the brain is startled and confused at the manner the muscles bungle their task, and confusion gets worse confounded. A majority of those who labor and yearn all their lives for technic are likely to be in some such dilemma, and the condition grows steadily worse instead of better as they go on.

Muscles and Success

"I sometimes think that more celebrated musicians owe their success to the accident of the muscles of fingers or arms or throat falling into place and instinctively doing team work from the beginning than is often realized. A singer has naturally, we say, a beautiful voice. How many of the great singers, I wonder, really learned to sing from their teachers? I think a great many; at least, were started right by nature, and worked on from the place at which the majority of singers stop. Of course physical facility does not necessarily mean musical expressiveness. It is often the contrary, but I don't see how one can be very musical if muscles and nerves are at cross purposes. What disturbs the muscle disturbs the mind, and what disturbs the mind hinders the necessary absorption in the music.

"I happen to have a facility which I can say in all frankness may have been the cause of my having been a concert master instead of a soloist pure and simple. Technic comes on the whole rather readily to me. For example, while I of course practise industriously—as everybody who plays, I do not care whom, must do—I very seldom trouble to mark by bowings, as most violinists. Here is the Brahms concerto, which is very hard, unviolinistic, and which I do not like. But I have played it. Do you see a marking? I can look at a technical problem freshly every time my eye rests on the page. I do most things in the way in which I began doing them, but often alter a bowing or fingering on the spot, because I see instantly in my mind the simpler and more direct way to do it, and I can alter my method that quickly, if I have to."

He showed me many of his scores. They all were clean, new-looking, not the pencilled, dirty pages of the student or artist who figures out, as most of us must, every move he makes in performance. As for a man who does not finger and bow everything in the Brahms concerto, and plan it is carefully as General Foch plans every move of an offensive—whoever has tried to play an instrument will know what such technical self-reliance and facility means.

"I don't say for an instant," went on Mr. Fradkin, "that preparedness is not as advisable in concert as on a battlefiel ...n what does preparedness con ...uppose you teach your mus- cle ...note, to do a thing—finger me ...as it has been called. Then sup ...a minute of nervousness you sud ...commence to think note by not ...hat you are doing? Do you kno ...the very fingers which have bee ...ed to do a certain task in- fal ...e the fingers which, under a sud ...expected crisis, will fail you? You ...destroyed their initiative. You ...gotten them out of the pra ...working intelligently and re- sou ...That is a danger of too mu ...ing, too much practising alo ...ways. It is easy to push any ...harmful extremes."

H ...t he wished he played an- oth ...ment than the violin—par- ticu ...wished that he played the pia ...use a violin is only one not ...d. "Its literature has lim- itat ...with the exception of a few ...natas and such things for viol ...which not one person in a ...understands, you have al- way ...e some other instrument or inst ...to help you out. I must hav ...st a piano, and preferably an ...a, to get all I can from my viol ...t pianists—they can play any ...anything they think of, and hav ...he harmony there."

laying the Piano

H ...going on that way, when I said ...think how horrible a piano usu ...nds, and the uninteresting way ...-nine out of a hundred pian- ists ...

"...matter of the pianist," he ans ...not the fault of the piano. Loo ...s resources. Look at its ped ...ow can anyone with imag- ina ...to get something from it? I can ...play this instrument, for I did ...gin to do so until too late to ...ut I have accompanied my wif ...she sings, and it was fun for ...not for her."

M ...lkin, under another stage nam ...sung in many cities in lead- ing ...light opera, and is now de- vel ...n extensive repertory of a mo ...s character. "You ought to see ...," she said. "He doesn't do it a ...to approved method, but he doe ...things that few pianists I hav ...can do as easily. He will pla ...e in octaves, and other mat- ter ...t kind. I think a musician wh ...echnical ability usually has it ...ost any instrument, and I thi ...true of my husband."

A ...Mr. Fradkin said that he wo ...wish to be a musician who is ...ave to his instrument.

"...iolinists," he said, "who sha ...gingerly because they are afr ...hing will happen to the nu ...ir fingers. Others refuse a ...nnis for fear of their bow arm ...that sort of thing. In the firs ...think much of it is non- sen ...he second place, if that is nec ...will sacrifice a little tech- nic ...to enjoy my life and my mu ...uld never enjoy it if I were cha ...a violin 12 hours out of the ...

"...at my music I try to wo ...intelligently. When I can ...do. That is better for me ...erformances and pupils. I h ...ealth, which makes life p ...n it is for many, and I G ...oy the health that I have. ne ...personally, and for one's w ...wledge and interest in w ...on about you; a little w ...then, in other lines than ti ...ession, are, I think, ex- ce ...musicians."

The wide

Mr. Frac of concert phony Or young ma tant orche He makes with the He was prize for v servatoire, nequin at 1911, he wa Philharmo From there played un

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1919

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

SAINT-SAENS AS COMPOSER OF THE HOUR

Present Vogue of His Pieces Through American Concert-Halls, and Possible Reason for It—No Western Tour for the Symphony Orchestra—Roussel Revealed—Items, Incidents and Opinions

SAINT-SAENS, when he made his American tour in the autumn of 1906, came twelve years too early. Even for him, the sprightliest of old men, travel is probably out of the question in his present eighties, but otherwise he should have waited until the present season when his music is enjoying a vogue in American concert-halls that the longest memory may not recall. True, he was abundantly feted on that half-forgotten visit; but as it seemed at the time, one and another of his pieces was "resurrected" to grace festal occasion. Now, of a sudden, they are the fashion of the musical day. Violinists, young and middle-aged, may not be parted from his concerto in B minor; no more will the pianists be divorced from his concerto in G minor; while his "organ" symphony stands on many an orchestral programme and Mr. Damrosch has lately added thereto one of his earlier and usually neglected symphonies. As for his tone-poems—"The Youth of Hercules," "Phaeton," "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and the rest—they pop up on every hand; while the violinist or the pianist is careless who does not find Saëns's abundant trifles. Before long, it the mode holds firm, the directors of the Metropolitan and the Chicago opera companies will be fingering restlessly the pages of "Etienne Marcel," "Phryne," "L'Alcetre." For Saint-Saëns has written other operas (after their manner) besides the perennial "Samson and Delilah."

Fashions are fashions with music as with everything else and usually there is no explaining them. Yet one reason for this present vogue of Saint-Saëns up and down our concert-halls does seemingly appear. Every conductor of an orchestra in America, every wandering violinist or pianist, believes that for the time he must play much French music because of the present American liking and deference for all things French. On the other hand, the American public quickly hears enough of Debussy, Ravel, Roger-Ducasse, Schmitt and the other Parisian "modernists," even to the delicate and eclectic Fauré. In vain the conductor or the virtuoso seeks some long line of French "classicists" amongst whom he can choose as with German music, he picks from Bach through Brahms. He finds—only Saint-Saëns and the scanty Franck; for Berlioz remains intrinsically a romantic composer, an isolated individual, almost, in the course of music Hence, plausibly, the present frequency of Saint-Saëns upon any and all programmes. Often his music pleases the listeners; sometimes it stimulates a conductor as it plainly kindles Mr. Rabaud; almost always it is agreeable medium for pianist or violinist. Yet with the rising vogue of it rises no less the resentent of those, especially in the younger generation, who count it no more than polished and eclectic mechanics and artfully artificial mood or picture.

Here in Boston

For various reasons, the chief of which is the cost of the journey, the Symphony Orchestra will make no visit to the Middle West during the first week of February. Instead, on Friday afternoon, Feb. 7, and Saturday evening, Feb. 8, it will be heard as usual at Symphony Hall, replacing by this pair of concerts the omitted pair of Oct. 18 and 19 last. Thus, the series will end as usual on the first Friday and the first Saturday of May.

When the orchestra returns from its present journey southward, several former players in it will rejoin the band, having completed in the course of the current week the formalities by which they become citizens of the United States. Among them are three horn-players, so that the orchestra will again contain eight horns—a highly desirable increase, since the five who have been carrying the horn-part through the season have been showing plain signs of over-work. The newcomers from the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris are also to be expected soon.

The probability now is that Mr. Hofmann at his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 26, will repeat the piano-pieces by American composers to be played by him the day before in New York for the first time in public. They fill the whole programme and, in the main, are fresh and interesting work of the younger generation.

n WORLD

ress New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT NOT UP TO THE HIGH MARK

Conductor Rabaud Gives Schumann's Work the Dryest Reading Heard Here in a Long Time.

Admirers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not find in yesterday's Carnegie Hall matinee concert the same degree of excellence which prevailed at the first two programmes Henri Rabaud conducted last month.

The new musical leader gave one of the dryest readings of Schumann's D minor symphony New York has heard in a long time. With the exception of the sherzo, which had life and lightness, the performance appeared as having been carefully measured and blocked out with mathematical exactness.

M. Rabaud conducted his own symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," based on the Lena poem. The work is moderately good descriptive music which suggests in its very tonal quietude such a procession as the poet wrote about.

The programme also contained the delightful and picturesque "Rapsodie Espagnole" of Rovel and the No. 3 "Leonore" overture of Beethoven.

ATION IS THE SECRET," SAYS EW SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER

Fradkin, Leader of the Violins, Te ow He Keeps His Nerve of Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his happy family. This photo was snapped for the Boston Sunday Post in the famous first violinist's home, while the ladies were playing cards.

"The average man and even music lover doesn't know how much responsibility and strain there is in this position, and how much hard labor, in and out of rehearsals. The preparation of uniform bowings, etc., the carrying, in a way, on your back the doings of the men behind you. This doesn't mean that you are necessarily a better fiddler than anyone else sitting about you, but it does mean that you are held responsible for what your string division accomplishes, and you sometimes get nerves about it.

Feeling the Ear of the Audience

"You feel the least drag, the least indifference of any one of the men in back of you; you feel the eye of the conductor and the ear of the audience a good deal more, perhaps, than the audience realizes. They feel your slightest shortcoming, and echo it. There is strain. You have to meet it. I meet it, I think, with a minimum of wear, for the reason that I can relax nerves and muscles when the time comes to do so.

"'Relaxation' is a war-cry with modern teachers of technic. But it is more than that. It usually solves the problem of physical efficiency, and often of mental strain also. It isn't the boxer who tenses every muscle and glares at his man with every nerve working overtime and pouring out nervous energy whether he is fighting or simply watching his opponent, who does the trick. It is the man who uses his muscles, concentrates his blow, and then 'lets up,' figuratively speaking, until it's time to use the muscle again. Then he pours his energy into that muscle and the blow tells, and he gets ready for the next one, rested and with necessary energy to command. That holds true of every activity."

"People usually start entirely wrong at doing any work. They tense all up. Their muscles get in kinks, and these kinks communicate themselves to the mind. The muscle won't obey the command of the brain, the brain is startled and confused at the manner the muscles bungle their task, and confusion gets worse confounded. A majority of those who labor and yearn all their lives for technic are likely to be in some such dilemma, and the condition grows steadily worse instead of better as they go on.

Muscles and Success

"I sometimes think that more celebrated musicians owe their success to the accident of the muscles of fingers or arms or throat falling into place and instinctively doing team work from the beginning than is often realized. A singer has naturally, we say, a beautiful voice. How many of the great singers, I wonder, really learned to sing from their treachers? I think a great many, at least, were started right by nature, and worked on from the place at which the majority of singers stop. Of course physical facility does not necessarily mean musical expressiveness. It is often the contrary, but I don't see how one can be very musical if muscles and nerves are at cross purposes. What disturbs the muscle disturbs the mind, and what disturbs the mind hinders the necessary absorption in the music.

"I happen to have a facility which I can say in all frankness may have been the cause of my having been a concert master instead of a soloist pure and simple. Technic comes on the whole rather readily to me. For example, while I of course practise industriously—as everybody who plays, I do not care whom, must do—I very seldom trouble to mark by bowings, as most violinists. Here is the Brahms concerto, which is very hard, unviolinistic, and which I do not like. But I have played it. Do you see a marking? I can look at a technical problem freshly every time my eye rests on the page. I do most things in the way in which I began doing them, but often alter a bowing or fingering on the spot, because I see instantly in my mind the simpler and more direct way to do it, and I can alter my method that quickly, if I have to."

He showed me many of his scores. They all were clean, new-looking, not the pencilled, dirty pages of the student or artist who figures out, as most of us must, every move he makes in performance. As for a man who does not finger and bow everything in the Brahms concerto, and plan it is carefully as General Foch plans every move of an offensive—whoever has tried to play an instrument will know what such technical self-reliance and facility means.

"I don't say for an instant," went on Mr. Fradkin, "that preparedness is not as advisable in concert as on a battlefiel n what does preparedness co uppose you teach your muscl ote, to do a thing—'finger m as it has been called. Then su a minute of nervousness you s commence to think note by n hat you are doing? Do you k the very fingers which have b ed to do a certain task in- f e the fingers which, under a s xpected crisis, will fail you? Y destroyed their initiative. Y gotten them out of the pr working intelligently and re- so That is a danger of too mu ing, too much practising ale ways. It is easy to push an harmful extremes."

H t he wished he played an- oth ent than the violin—par- tic wished that he played the pia use a violin is only one not t. "Its literature has lim- ita with the exception of a few natas and such things for vio which not one person in a understands, you have al- way e some other instrument or inst to help you out. I must hav st a piano, and preferably an a, to get all I can from my vio t pianists—they can play any anything they think of, and hav he harmony there."

laying the Piano

H going on that way, when I said think how horrible a piano usi unds, and the uninteresting way -nine out of a hundred pian- ists

" matter of the pianist," he ana "not the fault of the piano. Lo ts resources. Look at its ped w can anyone with imag- ina to get something from it? I can play this instrument, for I did gin to do so until too late to ut I have accompanied my wi she sings, and it was fun for not for her."

M lkin, under another stage na sung in many cities in lead- ing light opera, and is now de- vel n extensive repertory of a mo us character. "You ought to see y," she said. "He doesn't do it to approved method, but he doe things that few pianists I hav can do as easily. He will pla e in octaves, and other mat- ter t kind. I think a musician wh echnical ability usually has it ost any instrument, and I thi true of my husband."

A Mr. Fradkin said that he wo wish to be a musician who is ave to his instrument.

" iolinists," he said, "who sha gingerly because they are afr thing will happen to the nu eir fingers. Others refuse a s nnis for fear of their bow arr that sort of thing. In the firs think much of it is non- sen he second place, if that is nec will sacrifice a little tech- nic to enjoy my life and my mu uld never enjoy it if I were chi a violin 12 hours out of the " k at my music I try to wo intelligently. When I can do. That is better for me erformances and pupils. ealth, which makes life n it is for many, and I oy the health that I have. personally, and for one's wledge and interest in on about you; a little then, in other lines than ession, are, I think, ex- musicians."

The widespread smile of Frederick Fradkin, erstwhile violinist, and now concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is most infectious. And he can play better than he can smile.

Mr. Fradkin's appointment to the post of concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has placed him as a young man in one of the most important orchestral positions in the world. He makes his Boston debut as soloist with the orchestra in the near future.

He was born in Troy, N.Y., took a first prize for violin playing at the Paris Conservatoire, and was soloist under Pennequin at the age of 18. In January, 1911, he was soloist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Mahler. From there he went to London, and also played under Landon Ronald in Birmingham. In 1912 he was soloist at Vienna, after which he came back to America as first violinist of the orchestra of the Russian Ballet under Monteux.

Mr. Fradkin was frank to say that he thought the marvellous spectacles and performances of the Russian Ballet were, on the whole, considerably in advance of the artistic conceptions of this period and would have to wait a few years for complete public appreciation. He also thought that the Russian Ballet was grossly and intentionally mismanaged from New York in order to prove to a generous and public-spirited man who had gathered the enterprise that such a thing was bound to be nothing but a financial failure.

"I was there at the beginning and end," he said, "of an unsuccessful though admirable enterprise, and I witnessed the mismanagement that could not possibly have been less than intentional, in routes, in travelling arrangements, and all the rest of it. But the day will come when the productions shown by the Russian Ballet will be welcomed and insisted on by a public accustomed to their genius and beauty and determined to have such performances frequent and accessible."

DAY, JANUARY 8, 1919

Saëns's abundant trifles. Before long, if the mode holds firm, the directors of the Metropolitan and the Chicago opera companies will be fingering restlessly the pages of "Etienne Marcel," "Phryne," "L'Alcetre." For Saint-Saëns has written other operas (after their manner) besides the perennial "Samson and Delilah."

Fashions are fashions with music as with everything else and usually there is no explaining them. Yet one reason for this present vogue of Saint-Saëns up and down our concert-halls does seemingly appear. Every conductor of an orchestra in America, every wandering violinist or pianist, believes that for the time he must play much French music because of the present American liking and deference for all things French. On the other hand, the American public quickly hears enough of Debussy, Ravel, Roger-Ducasse, Schmitt and the other Parisian "modernists," even to the delicate and eclectic Fauré. In vain the conductor or the virtuoso seeks some long line of French "classicists" amongst whom he can choose as with German music, he picks from Bach through Brahms. He finds—only Saint-Saëns and the scanty Franck; for Berlioz remains intrinsically a romantic composer, an isolated individual, almost, in the course of music Hence, plausibly, the present frequency of Saint-Saëns upon any and all programmes. Often his music pleases the listeners; sometimes it stimulates a conductor as it plainly kindles Mr. Rabaud; almost always it is agreeable medium for pianist or violinist. Yet with the rising vogue of it rises no less the resentent of those, especially in the younger generation, who count it no more than polished and eclectic mechanics and artfully artificial mood or picture.

Here in Boston

For various reasons, the chief of which is the cost of the journey, the Symphony Orchestra will make no visit to the Middle West during the first week of February. Instead, on Friday afternoon, Feb. 7, and Saturday evening, Feb. 8, it will be heard as usual at Symphony Hall, replacing by this pair of concerts the omitted pair of Oct. 18 and 19 last. Thus, the series will end as usual on the first Friday and the first Saturday of May.

When the orchestra returns from its present journey southward, several former players in it will rejoin the band, having completed in the course of the current week the formalities by which they become citizens of the United States. Among them are three horn-players, so that the orchestra will again contain eight horns—a highly desirable increase, since the five who have been carrying the horn-part through the season have been showing plain signs of over-work. The newcomers from the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris are also to be expected soon.

The probability now is that Mr. Hofmann at his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 26, will repeat the piano-pieces by American composers to be played by him the day before in New York for the first time in public. They fill a whole programme and, in the main, are fresh and interesting work of the younger generation.

---

n WORLD

ress New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT NOT UP TO THE HIGH MARK

Conductor Rabaud Gives Schumann's Work the Dryest Reading Heard Here in a Long Time.

Admirers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not find in yesterday's Carnegie Hall matinee concert the same degree of excellence which prevailed at the first two programmes Henri Rabaud conducted last month.

The new musical leader gave one of the dryest readings of Schumann's D minor symphony New York has heard in a long time. With the exception of the sherzo, which had life and lightness, the performance appeared as having been carefully measured and blocked out with mathematical exactness.

M. Rabaud conducted his own symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," based on the Lena poem. The work is moderately good descriptive music which suggests in its very tonal quietude such a procession as the poet wrote about.

The programme also contained the delightful and picturesque "Rapsodie Espagnole" of Rovel and the No. 3 "Leonore" overture of Beethoven.

HERALD JANUARY 4

DESERT MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Orchestra Plays "Antar" of Rimsky-Korsakoff at Tenth Concert

MR. HEIFETZ IS SOLO VIOLINIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Antar," Symphony No. 2; Beethoven, Violin Concerto; Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole. Mr. Heifetz was the solo violinist.

It would be an interesting experiment to put "Antar" and Scheherazade" on a program in illustration of Rimsky-Korsakoff's orientalism. "Antar" was composed in 1868, "Scheherazade" in 1888, when the composer's technic was fully developed. Of the two, "Scheherazade" is undeniably the more popular, not only because it has been heard often and is associated with its incongruous use for a ballet; it appeals more intimately to the average hearer. Yet "Antar" is the more imaginative work. "Scheherazade," for the most part, suggests the harem. It is true, there is the storm music, with the shock and the fury of the billows; the composer had heard one of the Kalandars telling his wondrous tale; but the excursions from the harem are short and few. The greater number of pages are odorous with

Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit,
And perfume the swart kings tread under foot
For pleasure when their minds wax amorous,
Charred frankincense and grated sandal-root.

There is freer, purer air in "Antar"; there is the thought of the desert and its majestic loneliness. The mood of the hero, who might have stalked gloomily with Lara or any other Byronic hater of mankind, is at once established; it is powerfully maintained. The descriptive, or pictorial, episode of the pursued gazelle is graphic, not grotesque, although the composer here risked a disconcerting fall into the ludicrous. The two movements that follow, expressing in turn the delights of revenge and of power are splendidly barbaric, invoking scenes of ravaging and murderous hordes, exulting, furious, rushing onward to the wild sounds of strange instruments, ruthless, defiant, indomitable, while the love-music of the finale is sensuously languorous.

In this symphony we find the cruelty and the sensuality of the east, frank, unabashed, magnificent. And all is so largely expressed! There is here no miniature painting, as is found too frequently in "Scheherazade"; the colors in "Antar" are often bold and glaring; the palette knife takes the place of the brush. The thought of the composer is more than fanciful; it is imaginative.

Mr. Rabaud was so fortunate in his interpretation of this Symphony that it is to be hoped he will find it convenient during the season to let us hear Balakireff's Symphony, played here some years ago, and the same composer's "Thamar," which, as we believe, has not yet received full justice in Symphony Hall. Then there is the first Symphony of Borodin, which Mr. Nikisch brought out here 28 years ago for the first time in this country. These composers are more in favor with the French than is Tschaikowsky. Perhaps the frequent bursts of platitudes and coarseness, the vociferous outcries of despair that at times degenerate into a personal whine, disturb the Parisians, yet we should like to hear his fourth Symphony, to our mind the most characteristically Russian of Tschaikowsky's work in the symphonic field, played under Mr. Rabaud's direction.

He was equally fortunate in his interpretation of Ravel's tonal pictures of Spain, which yesterday were more glowing and spirited than ever before. The nocturnal prelude had fuller significance, a more poetic feeling. How brilliant the reading of the Malaguena, the Habanera and the finale with its delirious revel! The reading of the Rhapsody was distinguished by subtlety as well as dash. Those who thought that Mr. Rabaud might be an "academic" conductor have learned that neither Beethoven nor Ravel, Schumann nor Berlioz, Converse nor Saint-Saens is misunderstood or underappreciated by this musician of broad sympathies, kindly authority and the spirit that blazes when the music makes demand.

Mr. Heifetz, who played yesterday for the first time with this orchestra, gave an uncommonly fine performance of Beethoven's Concerto. His technical proficiency, which is almost incredible in a man of his years, his amazing facility, his poise—one might say—his imperturbability—already known to all, were again conspicuous, as were the beauty of his tone and the sureness of his intonation. But since he first played here, he has gained in warmth and depth of expression, so that his selection of the too familiar concerto was well advised. The cadenzas, which, we are told, are by Leopold Auer, were musically uninteresting.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for Jan. 17-18 is as follows: Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5; Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto (Mr. Fradkin, violinist); Saint-Saens, "Phaeton," symphonic poem; Lalo, Rhapsody.

NEW YORK HERALD, JANUARY 10,

AMERICAN MUSIC PLAYED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, gave the third evening concert of its thirty-third New York season at Carnegie Hall last night before an audience so large that the evidence that this famous orchestra had lost none of its wonted drawing powers with New York concertgoers was conclusive.

A programme made up of compositions by Berlioz, Vincent D'Indy, Rabaud himself and one of our best American composers, Frederick S. Converse, promised so well that I looked forwaard to a concertevening of both interest and enjoyment; but somehow, whether it was my mod or not, this promise was not fulfilled, and the programme in performance struck me on the whole as somehow lacking in point and convincing effect.

I remember very well the first time heard d'Indy's trilogy "Wallenstein" at Lamoureux concert in Paris in the early nineties, being tremendously interested and impressed; last night, for some reason, was neither. The work has movement, varied emotional interest and contrast, effectively scored for orchestra and has passages of both power and effective pictorial illustration of both mood and incident.

But I felt it last night as lacking in the nobility, poetry, dramatic force and interest of the poem of Schiller, which it is supposed to illustrate. After a hearing of the work, first played in New York at one of Seidl's concerts at Steinway Hall in 1888, and certainly not played here in recent years, I felt strongly that either the "Istar" variations or the "Symphony of a Mountaineer," by the same composer, was far superior to this work in inspirational qualities, originality and orchestral effect.

Mr. Converse's Fantasy.

Mr. Rabaud, ably seconded by the orchestra, now playing with wonted effect in spite of certain roughness of technique, like the passage of the bassoons, which describes the Capucin's sermon, gave full effect and value in interpretation to all the descriptive quality of the work, which, as I thought, in spite of all did not impress the audience any more than it did me, although there was hearty applause and recalls for Mr. Rabaud at the close.

Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," after the poem of Walt Whitman, was first played in New York at the second concert of the new Music Society of America in Carnegie Hall in April, 906, and so far as I know, and of memory serves, has not been played here since. After hearing this thoroughly musicianly, well scored work, truly poetic in conception and thoroughly masterly in execution, the thought occurred to me why this effective composition by one of our best trained American musicians and composers has not appeared oftener on concert programmes.

I think beyond doubt that it is one of the best things that Mr. Converse has done from the standpoint of both inspiration and technical craftsmanship; and yet somehow it fails to convincing effect. Of course the Whitman poem, with its mystery and peace, love, war, humiliation and final joy, is definitely subtle in suggestion, and perhaps Mr. Converse's music being so thoroughly in accord with the spirit and inner psychology of the poem, soars a little above the heads of the average concertgoer. One feels, perhaps, too, a lack of salient melody, a lack of concrete form; for it is not till the last section illustrating the final joyous mood of the poet's thought that we arrive at something quite definite in melody that is formal and not, as heretofore, only emotionally suggested. The work was read carefully and evidently con amore by Mr. Rabaud and played by the orchestra with all possible effect and attention; and the first trumpet is certainly to be congratulated on his almost impossible high notes.

Suite by Mr. Rabaud.

After that we heard for the first time a "Suite of the Sixteenth Centnry," arranged by Mr. Rabaud from music derived from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, by Farnaby and anonymous English composers. This suite was arranged from music that Mr. Rabaud provided for the performances of Lucien Nepoty's version of Shakespeare's comedy, "The Merchant of Venice," at the Theatre Antoine, in Paris, in the season of 1916-17.

Although arranged for instruments that are not anachronictic—oboes, bassoons, trumpets, harps, organ and strings—with due cleverness and proper attention to the color of music of the period, I found this music, which is in five short numbers, rather stilted in style and monotoned in color. The third movement, allegro, had a good old English sweep, and was both spirited and effective, and the fourth, andante, by an anonymous composer, had real quality of emotion and decide contrast, but as a whole I do not think when divorced from the drama which it was intended to accompany and illustrate, that this music possesses great value or interest for concert use.

The programme closed with an effective performance of Berlioz's seldom heard overture to "King Lear," an ouvrage de jeunesse, rather pompour, rather empty and showing the composer has not yet quite settled in his mind as to his musical thought, the form and expression of it or the way it could best be illustrated orchestrally. The overture was first performed in New York in 1846 and, as far as my experience goes, I had never heard it performed in this country before, although it is frequently played in Paris.

There was a tiresome and unnecessarily long intermission after the D'Indy number, and, on the whole, I found the programme a little recondite and, truth to tell, a little tiresome and lacking in bright lights of interest and effect.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the Academy of Music Monday evening, January 6, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, with Mr. Fredric Fradkin, the new concertmaster, as soloist; Berlioz's Overture, "King Lear," and Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne" after Lenau's "Faust." After the performances of this work in Boston the audience rose in appreciation of its masterly beauty. Mr. Philip Hale wrote the following, and the other critics were even more enthusiastic: "It shows the sensitive, impressionable nature of an accomplished musician, an imaginative composer whose technical skill allows him to create at once a mood, to maintain it without inducing monotony. The effects are gained by artfully simple means, a sober use of musical material, but the sobriety is not for a moment academic * * * The audience was quick to appreciate the charm of the music and the perfection of the performance."

THE SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, JANUARY 12, 1919.

Music for Everyo

Edited by KATHARINE LYONS

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR MEMBER OF THE "INSTITUTE OF FRANCE"

Henri Rabaud.

Theodore Dubois.

Gustave Charpentier.

Gabriel Faure.

Some interesting new members have been placed among the "Immortals" in the venerable "Institute of France," fount of knowledge and authority: Gens. Joffre, Foch, Premier Clemenceau, and Henri Rabaud, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The discrepancy between the careers of Mr. Rabaud and the others is accounted for by the assortment of academies, submerged by the French Revolution and united in 1806 under a new head—the "Institut." The generals and the premier qualified for the Academie Francaise by their writings; Mr. Rabaud qualified for the Academie des Beaux Arts by his merits as a composer, being the only conductor to hold the honor. In this academy there are 40 chairs, representing the various arts, and among them six are held by composers, the august occupants keeping them for life and choosing their successors. They judge the Prix de Rome, appoint professors, and the like. The present six are Saint-Saens, Dubois, Charpentier, Paladilhe, Gabriel Faure, and now Rabaud, who replaces Widor, who in turn has become Secretaire Perpetuel. The musical correspondents are Glazounoff, Lacombe, Cui and Sgambati (until they died), Humperdinck and Bruch until (poor old souls) the war came and they were "dishonorably annulled." Taking his chair, Mr. Rabaud adds one to the following line of descent since the Revolution: Gossec, Auber, Masse, Delibes, Widor. The most distinguished of the other five chairs were Boieldieu, Gounod, Cherubini, Massenet, Gretry, Spontini, Thomas, Berlioz, Adam, David.

What Berlioz thought of the Academy is indicated in his Memoirs, when, as a pupil of Cherubini, he competed for a prize, solely for the much needed money it would bring, and the small gold medal which would admit him into theatres and concert halls.

Berlioz at least became the best of friends with the old doorkeeper, Pingard. When he learned that he had missed the first prize by two votes, and taken the second, he said:

"Come, Pingard, calm down a bit and tell me about today."

"Well, when M. Dupont had finished singing your cantata they began writing their verdicts, and I brought the urn. There was a musician close by whispering to the architect. 'Don't give him your vote, he's no good at all, and never will be. He is gone on that eccentric creature, Beethoven, and we shall never get him right again.' 'Really,' said the architect. 'Yet—well, ask Cherubini. You will take his word, won't you? He will tell you that Beethoven has turned the fellow's head.' 'I beg pardon,' said Pingard, 'but who is this M. Beethoven? He doesn't belong to the academy, and yet everyone seems to be talking of him."

"No, no! He's a German—Go on."

"There isn't much more. When I passed the urn to the architect I saw that he gave his vote to No. 4 instead of to you. Suddenly, one of the musicians said, 'Gentlemen, I think you ought to know that, in the second part of the score we have just heard, there is an exceedingly clever and effective piece of orchestration to which the piano cannot do justice. This ought to be taken into consideration.' 'Don't tell us another cock-and-bull story like that,' cried another musician. 'Your pupil has broken the rules and written two quick arias instead of one, and he has put in an extra prayer. We cannot allow rules to be set at naught like this; it would be establishing a precedent.' 'Oh, this is too ridiculous! What says the secretary?' 'I think that we might pardon a certain amount of license, and that the jury should distinctly understand that passage that you say cannot be properly given by the piano.' 'No, no!' cried Cherubini, 'It's all nonsense. There is no such clever piece of work. It is a regular jumble, and would be abominable for the orchestra.'

"Then on all sides rose the architects, painters, sculptors, etc., saying 'Gentlemen, for pity's sake, agree somehow! We can only judge by what we hear, and if you will not agree—' And all began to talk at once, and it became distinctly a bore; so M. Regnault and two others marched out without voting. They counted the votes. You only got second prize."

Perhaps the old world thinks more of "Academicians" than we do. Their traditions are stronger, and they are more prone to recognize that there must be a stabilizing force to the kite as well as the tail which dashes it about and keeps it alive. Yet apprehension is felt lest Clemenceau rebels, when he is formally taken in, against the green uniform with golden oak leaves, the splendid sabbard, and the plumed hat—an outfit which costs the wearer far more than the yearly salary.

Since Richelieu and Louis XIV. fastened upon a small clique of litterateurs in 1635, and at once glorified and exasperated them by making them a public and imperial institution, the "Academie Francaise," which must of course adulate king and candinal, there has always been a sentiment of discontent within, contempt mingled with jealousy without. The powers were at first restricted to "the embellishment, the ornamentation and the augmentation of the language," but the element of artistic discussion was always with it. Wrote Voltaire: "The 'Academie Francaise' is the secret love of all men of letters. She is a mistress at whom they hurl verses and epigrams until they have won her favor; they slight her only until they possess her."

GLOBE-JANUARY 18,

BROTHER OF SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR DIES IN FRANCE

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received cable news shortly before yesterday's concert of the death of his brother, Maurice.

He was a captain of the French Infantry, aged 50, had been seriously ill, and succumbed as the result of an operation.

HERALD JANUARY 4

DESERT MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Orchestra Plays "Antar" of Rimsky-Korsakoff at Tenth Concert

MR. HEIFETZ IS SOLO VIOLINIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Antar," Symphony No. 2; Beethoven, Violin Concerto; Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole. Mr. Heifetz was the solo violinist.

It would be an interesting experiment to put "Antar" and Scheherazade" on a program in illustration of Rimsky-Korsakoff's orientalism. "Antar" was composed in 1868, "Scheherazade" in 1888, when the composer's technic was fully developed. Of the two, "Scheherazade" is undeniably the more popular, not only because it has been heard often and is associated with its incongruous use for a ballet; it appeals more intimately to the average hearer. Yet "Antar" is the more imaginative work. "Scheherazade," for the most part, suggests the harem. It is true, there is the storm music, with the shock and the fury of the billows; the composer had heard one of the Kalandars telling his wondrous tale; but the excursions from the harem are short and few. The greater number of pages are odorous with

Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit,
And perfume the swart kings tread under foot
For pleasure when their minds wax amorous,
Charred frankincense and grated sandal-root.

There is freer, purer air in "Antar"; there is the thought of the desert and its majestic loneliness. The mood of the hero, who might have stalked gloomily with Lara or any other Byronic hater of mankind, is at once established; it is powerfully maintained. The descriptive, or pictorial, episode of the pursued gazelle is graphic, not grotesque, although the composer here risked a disconcerting fall into the ludicrous. The two movements that follow, expressing in turn the delights of revenge and of power are splendidly barbaric, invoking scenes of ravaging and murderous hordes, exulting, furious, rushing onward to the wild sounds of strange instruments, ruthless, defiant, indomitable, while the love-music of the finale is sensuously languorous.

In this symphony we find the cruelty and the sensuality of the east, frank, unabashed, magnificent. And all is so largely expressed! There is here no miniature painting, as is found too frequently in "Scheherazade"; the colors in "Antar" are often bold and glaring; the palette knife takes the place of the brush. The thought of the composer is more than fanciful; it is imaginative.

Mr. Rabaud was so fortunate in his interpretation of this Symphony that i is to be hoped he will find it convenien during the season to let us hear Balakireff's Symphony, played here some year ago, and the same composer's "Thamar," which, as we believe, has not yet received full justice in Symphony Hall. Then there is the first Symphony o Borodin, which Mr. Nikisch brought ou here 28 years ago for the first time i this country. These composers are mor in favor with the French than is Tschaikowsky. Perhaps the frequent bursts o platitudes and coarseness, the vociferou outcries of despair that at times degenerate into a personal whine, disturb the Parisians, yet we should like to hea his fourth Symphony, to our mind the most characteristically Russian o Tschaikowsky's work in the symphonic field, played under Mr. Rabaud's direction.

He was equally fortunate in his interpretation of Ravel's tonal pictures o Spain, which yesterday were more glowing and spirited than ever before. The nocturnal prelude had fuller significance a more poetic feeling. How brilliant the reading of the Malaguena, the Habanera and the finale with its delirious revel The reading of the Rhapsody was distinguished by subtlety as well as dash Those who thought that Mr. Rabau might be an "academic" conductor hav learned that neither Beethoven no Ravel, Schumann nor Berlioz, Conver nor Saint-Saens is misunderstood or u appreciated by this musician of broa sympathies, kindly authority and t spirit that blazes when the music mak demand.

Mr. Heifetz, who played yesterday for the first time with this orchestra, gave an uncommonly fine performance of Beethoven's Concerto. His technical proficiency, which is almost incredible in a man of his years, his amazing facility, his poise—one might say—his imperturbability—already known to all, were again conspicuous, as were the beauty of his tone and the sureness o 's intonation. But since he first played e, he has gained in warmth and h of expression, so that his selec- of the too familiar concerto was advised. The cadenzas, which, told, are by Leopold Auer, were musically uninteresting.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for Jan. 17-18 is as follows: Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5; Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto (Mr. Fradkin, violinist); Saint-Saens, "Phaeton," symphonic poem; Lalo, Rhapsody.

NEW YORK HERALD, JANUARY 10,

AMERICAN MUSIC PLAYED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, gave the third evening concert of its thirty-third New York season at Carnegie Hall last night before an audience so large that the evidence that this famous orchestra had lost none of its wonted drawing powers with New York concertgoers was conclusive.

A programme made up of compositions by Berlioz, Vincent D'Indy, Rabaud himself and one of our best American composers, Frederick S. Converse, promised so well that I looked forwaard to a concertevening of both interest and enjoyment; but somehow, whether it was my mod or not, this promise was not fulfilled, and the programme in performance struck me on the whole as somehow lacking in point and convincing effect.

I remember very well the first time heard d'Indy's trilogy "Wallenstein" at Lamoureux concert in Paris in the ear nineties, being tremendously interested ar impressed; last night, for some reason, was neither. The work has movemen varied emotional interest and contrast, effectively scored for orchestra and ha passages of both power and effective pic torial illustration of both mood and inci dent.

But I felt it last night as lacking in th nobility, poetry, dramatic force and interest of the poem of Schiller, which it is supposed to illustrate. After a hearing of the work, first played in New York at one o Seidl's concerts at Steinway Hall in 1888 and certainly not played here in recent years, I felt strongly that either the "Istar" variations or the "Symphony of a Mountaineer," by the same composer, was far superior to this work in inspirational qualities, originality and orchestral effect.

Mr. Converse's Fantasy.

Mr. Rabaud, ably seconded by the orchestra, now playing with wonted effect in spite of certain roughness of technique, like the passage of the bassoons, which describes the Capucin's sermon, gave full effect and value in interpretation to all the descriptive quality of the work, which, as I thought, in spite of all did not impress the audience any more than it did me, although there was hearty applause and recalls for Mr. Rabaud at the close.

Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," after the poem of Walt Whitman, was first played in New York at the second concert of the new Music Society of America in Carnegie Hall in April, 906, and so far as I know, and of memory serves, has not been played here since. After hearing this thoroughly musicianly, well scored work, truly poetic in conception and thoroughly masterly in execution, the thought occurred to me why this effective composition by one of our best trained American musicians and composers has not appeared oftener on concert programmes.

I think beyond doubt that it is one of the best things that Mr. Converse has done from the standpoint of both inspiration and technical craftsmanship; and yet somehow it fails to convincing effect. Of course the Whitman poem, with its mystery and peace, love, war, humiliation and final joy, is definitely subtle in suggestion, and perhaps Mr. Converse's music being so thoroughly in accord with the spirit and inner psychology of the poem, soars a little above the heads of the average concertgoer. One feels, perhaps, too, a lack of salient melody, a lack of concrete form; for it is not till the last section illustrating the final joyous mood of the poet's thought that we arrive at something quite definite in melody that is formal and not, as heretofore, only emotionally suggested. The work was read carefully and evidently con amore by Mr. Rabaud and played by the orchestra with all possible effect and attention; and the first trumpet is certainly to be congratulated on his almost impossible high notes.

Suite by Mr. Rabaud.

After that we heard for the first time a "Suite of the Sixteenth Centnry," arranged by Mr. Rabaud from music derived from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, by Farnaby and anonymous English composers. This suite was arranged from music that Mr. Rabaud provided for the performances of Lucien Nepoty's version of Shakespeare's comedy, "The Merchant of Venice," at the Theatre Antoine, in Paris, in the season of 1916-17.

Although arranged for instruments that are not anachronictic—oboes, bassoons, trumpets, harps, organ and strings—with due cleverness and proper attention to the color of music of the period, I found this music, which is in five short numbers, rather stilted in style and monotoned in color. The third movement, allegro, had a good old English sweep, and was both spirited and effective, and the fourth, andante, by an anonymous composer, had real quality of emotion and decide contrast, but as a whole I do no think when divorced from the drama which it was intended to accompany an illustrate, that this music possesses grea value or interest for concert use.

The programme closed with an effectiv performance of Berlioz's seldom hear overture to "King Lear," an ouvrage d jeunesse, rather pompour, rather empt and showing the composer has not ye quite settled in his mind as to his musica thought, the form and expression of it o the way it could best be illustrated or chestrally. The overture was first per formed in New York in 1846 and, as fa as my experience goes, I had never hear it performed in this country before, al though it is frequently played in Paris.

There was a tiresome and unnecessaril long intermission after the D'Indy number, and, on the whole, I found the programme a little recondite and, truth tell, a little tiresome and lacking in h lights of interest and effect.

PUBLIC LEDGER

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the Academy of Music Monday evening, January 6, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, with Mr. Fredric Fradkin, the new concertmaster, as soloist; Berlioz's Overture, "King Lear," and Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne" after Lenau's "Faust." After the performances of this work in Boston the audience rose in appreciation of its masterly beauty. Mr. Philip Hale wrote the following, and the other critics were even more enthusiastic: "It shows the sensitive, impressionable nature of an accomplished musician, an imaginative composer whose technical skill allows him to create at once a mood, to maintain it without inducing monotony. The effects are gained by artfully simple means, a sober use of musical material, but the sobriety is not for a moment academic * * * The audience was quick to appreciate the charm of the music and the perfection of the performance."

THE SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, JANUARY 12, 1919.

Music for Everyo

Edited by KATHARINE LYONS

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR MEMBER OF THE "INSTITUTE OF FRANCE"

Henri Rabaud.

Theodore Dubois.

Gustave Charpentier.

Gabriel Faure.

Some interesting new members have been placed among the "Immortals" in the venerable "Institute of France," fount of knowledge and authority: Gens, Joffre, Foch, Premier Clemenceau, and Henri Rabaud, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The discrepancy between the careers of Mr. Rabaud and the others is accounted for by the assortment of academies, submerged by the French Revolution and united in 1896 under a new head—the "Institut." The generals and the premier qualified for the Academie Francaise by their writings; Mr. Rabaud qualified for the Academie des Beaux Arts by his merits as a composer, being the only conductor to hold the honor. In this academy there are 40 chairs, representing the various arts, and among them six are held by composers, the august occupants keeping them for life and choosing their successors. They judge the Prix de Rome, appoint professors, and the like. The present six are Saint-Saens, Dubois, Charpentier, Paladilhe, Gabriel Faure, and now Rabaud, who replaces Widor, who in turn has become Secretaire Perpetuel. The musical correspondents are Glazounoff, Lacombe, Cui and Sgambati (until they died), Humperdinck and Bruch until (poor old souls) the war came and they were "dishonorably annulled." Taking his chair, Mr. Rabaud adds one to the following line of descent since the Revolution: Gossec, Auber, Masse, Delibes, Widor. The most distinguished of the other five chairs were Boieldieu, Gounod, Cherubini, Massenet, Gretry, Spontini, Thomas, Berlioz, Adam, David.

What Berlioz thought of the Academy is indicated in his Memoirs, when, as a pupil of Cherubini, he competed for a prize, solely for the much needed money it would bring, and the small gold medal which would admit him into theatres and concert halls.

Berlioz at least became the best of friends with the old doorkeeper, Pingard. When he learned that he had missed the first prize by two votes, and taken the second, he said:

"Come, Pingard, calm down a bit and tell me about today."

"Well, when M. Dupont had finished singing your cantata they began writing their verdicts, and I brought the urn. There was a musician close by whispering to the architect. 'Don't give him your vote, he's no good at all, and never will be. He is gone on that eccentric creature, Beethoven, and we shall never get him right again.' 'Really,' said the architect. 'Yet—well, ask Cherubini. You will take his word, won't you?' He will tell you that Beethoven has turned the fellow's head.' 'I beg pardon,' said Pingard, 'but who is this M. Beethoven? He doesn't belong to the academy, and yet everyone seems to be talking of him.'

"No, no! He's a German—Go on."

"There isn't much more. When I passed the urn to the architect I saw that he gave his vote to No. 4 instead of to you. Suddenly, one of the musicians said, 'Gentlemen, I think you ought to know that, in the second part of the score we have just heard, there is an exceedingly clever and effective piece of orchestration to which the piano cannot do justice. 'This ought to be taken into consideration.' 'Don't tell us another cock-and-bull story like that,' cried another musician. 'Your pupil has broken the rules and written two quick arias instead of one, and he has put in an extra prayer. We cannot allow rules to be set at naught like this; it would be establishing a precedent.' 'Oh, this is too ridiculous! What says the secretary?' 'I think that we might pardon a certain amount of license, and that the jury should distinctly understand that passage that you say cannot be properly given by the piano.' 'No, no!' cried Cherubini, 'It's all nonsense. There is no such clever piece of work. It is a regular jumble, and would be abominable for the orchestra.'

"Then on all sides rose the architects, painters, sculptors, etc., saying 'Gentlemen, for pity's sake, agree somehow! We can only judge by what we hear, and if you will not agree—' And all began to talk at once, and it became distinctly a bore; so M. Regnault and two oth marched out without voting. The counted the votes. You only got second prize."

Perhaps the old world thinks more of "Academicians" than we do. Their tradions are stronger, and they are more prone to recognize that there must be stabilizing force to the kite as well as the tail which dashes it about and keeps it alive. Yet apprehension is felt lest Clemenceau rebels, when he is formally taken in, against the green uniform with golden oak leaves, the splendid cabbard, and the plumed hat—an outfit which costs the wearer far more than the yearly salary.

Since Richelieu and Louis XIV. fastened upon a small clique of litterateurs in 1635, and at once glorified and exasperated them by making them a public and imperial institution, the "Academie Francaise," which must of course adulate king and candinal, there has always been a sentiment of discontent within, contempt mingled with jealousy without. The powers were at first restricted to "the embellishment, the ornamentation and the augmentation of the language," but the element of artistic discussion was always with it. Wrote Voltaire: "The 'Academie Francaise' is the secret love of all men of letters. She is a mistress at whom they hurl verses and epigrams until they have won her favor; they slight her only until they possess her."

GLOBE-JANUARY 18,

BROTHER OF SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR DIES IN FRANCE

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received cable news shortly before yesterday's concert of the death of his brother, Maurice.

He was a captain of the French Infantry, aged 50, had been seriously ill, and succumbed as the result of an operation.

RECORD, JANUARY 18

MABEL GARRISON SYMPHONY SOLOIST FOR THIS WEEK END

MABEL GARRISON.

Mabel Garrison, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Co., will be the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. Her appearance has been anticipated on other occasions this winter but has not materalized. Once she was prevented from appearing by an attack of influenza; once by engagements at the opera in New York.

She will sing two numbers at the concerts this week, Mozart's aria, "Mia Speranza Adorata" and Edgar Stillman-Kelly's "A Californai Idyl."

Charles De Mailly, the first flute player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been ill for some time with congestion of the lungs and therefore out of the orchestra, returns to work this week. He expects to play in the concerts of Friday and Saturday.

Louis Speyer, the excellent oboeist, who was heard here when the French band gave a special performance at the Pops last summer, will soon join the Boston orchestra. He has been playing with the band on its tour with the understanding that he is to join the orchestra at the earliest possible

BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Rabaud Conducts Third Concert, With Frederic Fradkin as Soloist

With Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster of the organization, as soloist, and conducted for the second time locally by Henri Rabaud, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening. Mr. Fradkin was heard in the Mendelssohn concerto, while the novelty of the program was Mr. Rabaud's own composition, "La Procession Nocturne." The other numbers were Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120, and Berlioz's "King Lear" overture.

The Schumann work is not the most beautiful of symphonies. Even so splendidly played as it was last evening, it seems at times heavy and lacking in the more radiating phases of melodization; but it is a noble composition, with an appealing romanza, and much that is grandiose and impressive. It served to show that the Boston Orchestra is getting back into its best form, with Mr. Rabaud acquiring familiarity with his players and bringing out not only the best that is in them, but in himself as well.

In his own symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," conductor rivalled composer in the estimation of the audience, which obviously admired both work and writer. The music is distinctly "modern French." It cannot escape being pronounced "Debussy-like," despite the originality and the inspiration that distinguishes it. It is written after Nicolaus Lenau's poem of "Faust," and is descriptive of Faust's wanderings in the gloomy forest.

Picturesque it is, in theme and development—somewhat of a monotone in the first part, but rising to a more dramatic expressiveness in the passing of the procession of children, virgins and the old in sombre garments, the martial strains dying away as the light of the torches glimmers out and the shadows again enshroud the lonely Faust, who falls into bitter tears. All this is graphically depicted in Rabaud's admirable tonal elucidation, which did not fail deeply to impress last night's audience.

There was also a liberal amount of appreciation for the concertmaster, for his skillful and sympathetic interpretation of the Mendelssohn concerto. This work, to be sure, is an old story, having already been heard at least two or three times this season, but it charms anew when so well played as it was last evening.

Mr. Fradkin is short and plump and pleasant looking, his personality being of the ingratiating sort. His playing might be improved by more repose, but he shows fine command of his instrument, produces a pure and limpid, if rather light, tone, and the lovely andante of the Mendelssohn work came with alluring sweetness from his bow, while the difficult cadenza and the rapid measures of the vivace finale enabled him to display a plenitude of technical facility. The audience liked him and gave him unmistakable assurance of the fact. The Berlioz overture brought to a dramatic close the notable program. The orchestra's next concert will take place on Wednesday evening, February 5, when Arthur Rubinstein, pianist, will be the soloist.

HERALD, JANUARY 18

SYMPHONY IN 11TH CONCERT

Impressive Interpretation of Beethoven Given by Mr. Rabaud

METROPOLITANOPERA STAR IS SOLOIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C minor; Mozart, Recitative, "Mia Speranza Adorata" and Rondo, "Ah! non sai qual pena sai": Saint-Saens, "Phaeton," symphonic poem No. 2; Kelley, "A California Idyl" for coloratura soprano and orchestra; Lalo, Rhapsody in A major for orchestra. Mabel Garrison of the Metropolitan Opera Company was the soprano.

Mr. Rabaud at the head of a responsive, euphonious and plastic orchestra—an orchestra that now need not fear a rival—gave a remarkably impressive interpretation of the Fifth Symphony. We do not remember one that has equalled it in dramatic intensity and in nobility. Some conductors, as Mr. Nikisch, gave a theatrical reading, giving portentous significance to the opening phrases, prolonging holds in a spectacular manner with quivering arm upraised until the hearers were tempted to cry out "Let go of it, and proceed with the music," hunting out inner voices and giving them undue importance. Others, deploring these extravagances, gave what are called "intellectual," "academic" interpretations, euphemistic terms for the word "dull." Mr. Rabaud, believing that this symphony is the "summit of music"—to quote his own words—did not have to depart from Beethoven's text or inject a foreign spirit into the symphony to gain magnificent effects. Again he revealed himself as a born and accomplished musician among conductors, as a skilful and imaginative conductor among musicians. His reverence for Beethoven was not obsequious. He did not turn the concert hall into a theatre. So-called absolute music may be more passionate and dramatic than an exciting opera, and suggests milder and higher thoughts in the breast of the hearer than any invoked by a composition that has a program or is a tonal translation of epic or lyric poem. It would not be easy to say which movement, as played yesterday, moved most the soul of the audience; yet the Scherzo had a new meaning; the wonderful transition to the tumultuous joy of the Finale was managed in masterly manner, and—O crowning triumph!—the interest in the Finale never flagged after the first glorious outburst.

"Phaeton" had not been performed at these concerts for twenty years. It did not deserve this long neglect. Here again Saint-Saens shows his sound sense, his lucid musical mind. He does not ride in the chariot by the side of the arrogant Phaeton; he sees him mount, watches him, almost with a smile, foreseeing his end. If Liszt had treated this sun myth he would have insisted on taking the reins himself. How skilfully the insolent ride is portrayed! Nor does Saint-Saens represent Jupiter as wrecking the world when he launched the bolt that saved it. What a pother a modern German composer would have made with a formidable orchestra in hurling Phaeton from his car!

Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsody was also new to the majority of hearers. It is a brilliant composition, with entertaining thematic material, richly and ingeniously orchestrated. The modern French learned much from Lalo and Chabrier. They sometimes helped themselves with both hands from the scores of these predecessors, and without the grace of acknowledgment.

Mme. Garrison was pleasantly remembered here by her singing at a symphony concert last season and by her singing the extremely difficult music of the Princess in "Coq d'Or" at the Boston Opera House in April. The Rondo of Mozart, which she sang yesterday, was written for his sister-in-law, Aloysia, in a day. It is more or less perfunctory music in the manner of the period, as if Mozart, teased for a long time by Aloyais for a new aria, had tossed it off and said to her: "There you are; don't bother me again." Mr. Kelley wrote his Idyl when he was lecturing in California. He completed it at Oxford, Ohio, where he lives. Remenyi, inspired by far western scenery, wrote a "Hymn to Mount Shasta" for the fiddle. Mr. Kelley was less ambitious: he contented himself with a lively allegro, an invitation for someone's love to come forth, when hills are green and the sky is blue and hearts of love are beating true. When Artemus Ward heard young men beneath his window singing "Come, where my love lies dreaming," he did not go. "I did not think it would be proper." But Mr. Kelley's invitation is purely lyrical, not erotic, an idyl that might be assigned to Vermont of North Carolina as well as to California. The music is appropriately cheerful in rather commonplace fashion, with an orchestral accompaniment that is at times too thick for the advantage of the singer. Mme. Garrison sang accurately and easily, and in Mozart's Recitative with a pretty show of sentiment.

Just before the concert Mr. Rabaud received news by cable of the death of his brother Maurice as the result of an operation. He surely has the sympathy of all. The wonder is that he was able to conduct so brilliantly.

The orchestra is now materially strengthened by the coming of men from the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory. The names of Messrs. Laurent, first flute; L. Speyer, oboe and English horn; Adam, trombone, appear in the program book. It was a pleasure to note the return of Mr. Jaenicke, the horn player. There are now eight horns in the list of the personnel.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Hadley, Symphonic Fantasia (first time at these concerts); Bach, Suite in D major, No. 3; Franck, Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra; d'Indy, Symphony "On a Mountain Air" for orchestra and pianoforte. Alfred Cortot will be the pianist.

GLOBE- JANUARY 18

RABAUD CONDUCTS BEETHOVEN'S FIFTH

Mabel Garrison Sings Delightfully

Mr Rabaud is making known from week to week his conception of Beethoven—the man, the thinker of great thoughts, the great pathbreaker of romanticism. First the "Eroica," then the "little" symphony, in which Beethoven autographed his portrait on a sunny day. Yesterday it was the fifth.

Music for supermen, who yet have a pulse, this Homeric score is merciless in exposing a supine lack of nobility or the bombast which some have offered in its place. It endures less well than any of the first eight of the symphonies, at least, an interpretation wherein the conductor claims only the scant virtue of being "academic," "traditional," safely "conservative."

At times gloriously rebellious against laws, orders, the cosmos, it craves the answering metal of individuality, of creative germ, even abandon. To touch a score, every note of which the world knows as by heart, with a flame like into its own and to continue re-creation without all but burning up the world as Saint-Saens' young hero who followed, is to have achieved greatly.

Mr Rabaud certainly did this in no small measure, particularly in the last movement. When have its first measures, leaping winged from the scherzo, been as electrical, as fitting a tribute to a victorious army returned, to the triumph of a great principle, as noble a proclamation of liberty?

The reading throughout was that of a man who had pondered upon the many sides of genius. There was reflection, repose, tenderness; there was the sinister humor, consuming, terrible, of the fugal subject given out by the contrabasses, a passage at Mr Rabaud's tempo calling for a supreme virtuosity, and there was the note of battle as when the forces of Nature contend. Both conductor and players were given an ovation.

Mme Mabel Garrison is the most interesting of the younger singers. Success has not marred her womanly simplicity or sincerity of manner. Her growth in her art is steady, rational, well balanced. The voice itself is warmer throughout its wide compass. But high notes do not make the artist, and there was little occasion yesterday to be reminded in the air "Ah, non sai qual pena sia," which Mozart wrote with its preceding recitative for Aloysia Weber, cousin to Carl Maria, that she was singing repeatedly the high E flat. Aloysia was said to sing with ease to the F above, and Mozart turned one of the roulades in the air over on that note, a phrase which Mme Garrison slightly alters.

The Gildas, who mount the interpolated arpeggio to the high E, or even F flat, in "Rigoletto," as they mount the stairs by candle light, are to be taken with much indulgence during the feat and relief after it. But Mme Garrison employs an unusual upper voice as she does the medium—as a means of expression. She is not disturbed by the serenity of Mozart, but apparently enjoys the limpidity of his melody, the transparent grace or the patrician elegance of his ornaments. The voice is not huge, and therefore some, yesterday, may have seemed perplexed to know in how far she merited their applause.

Edgar Stillman Kelley's "A California Idyl" for coloratura soprano and orchestra, heard for the first time here, is a sympathetic setting of verses by Charles Keeler, rhapsodical of nature in a somewhat uneven manner. There was opportunity for lyric and occasionally merely decorative song, to the demands of which Mme Garrison was equal, ending on a triumphant high D, carrying easily over the orchestra.

Saint-Saens' second of his four symphonic poems, in order of their composition, "Phaeton," with its galloping horses and chariot of fire, now 46 years old, sounds fresh today compared with Lalo's rhapsody, of the following year, with its monotonous use of the Norwegian dance tune. Both were brilliantly pla dress Springfield, Mass.

REPUBLICAN

te

The Boston symphony orchestra gave a program of national airs at its concert on Monday. "Strange to say there were many vacant seats in the second balcony," writes Philip Hale. But a miscellaneous program of national airs and music on patriotic subjects might not appeal to the enthusiastic concert-goer, and the second balcony, one believes, is the domain of the enthusiasts. Even the seats of subscribers were filled by others. And Mr Hale admits that "The concert as a whole was tame and a disappointment." Perhaps this was foreseen. The irregular time for holding it, Monday afternoon, was possibly a further adverse consideration.

POST, JANUARY 18

BEETHOVEN EXALTED BY SYMPHONY

Remarkable Performance of the Great Fifth

BY OLIN DOWNES

The feature of yesterday afternoons concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, was the performance of Beethoven's Fifth symphony. There were other interesting performances; the Boston Symphony has, in the past, given many notable performances of Beethoven's work; but seldom has this work been so noble and so thrilling, at the hands of any conductor, whether visiting at the head of another orchestra or officiating at the regular series of concerts in Symphony Hall, as it was yesterday at the hands of Mr. Rabaud.

The Fifth Symphony is over 100 years old. It is probably the most popular symphony, even today, in the orchestral repertory. It is very hard to perform such a work, over familiar to conductor and men, without the suspicion of routine, of a task perfunctorily executed. A good conductor will of course rehearse such a work scrupulously, however often it has been played. He will give reverent attention to each detail and concentrate anew on the meaning of the music, yet he may well fail to produce the effect produced yesterday.

This symphony has been gospel to generations. How many musicians have sat with the score, at desk or piano, and listened with the inner ear to performances more ideal than any orchestra could give? Doubtless there have been thousands who never heard the work played by an orchestra, and were yet profoundly moved by the printed music. The conductors are not always the most zealous interpreters. Years ago we knew a Swiss musician, a man of brilliant accomplishments, condemned to the hard labor of piano teaching. We shall never forget the awful sounds and the profound feeling, the tears rolling down his cheeks, with which he played the Fifth Symphony to us one day on the piano. For he was as sincere and intelligent a lover of his art as he was a miserable failure as a virtuoso.

Fulfilment of Dreams

Mr. Rabaud's performance of yesterday had the dramatic fire, the exalted faith, the consuming ecstasy, of that piano performance we remember so well. It had also the tonal balance and beauty, the technical sufficiency, the overwhelming orchestral sonorities only to be attained when a great instrumental body and a conductor of artistic sensibility and noble character meet. On such an occasion, the conductor is doing more than he knows. He is the hero who accomplishes for the humble dreamers and those to whom the reward of accomplishment is not given, the fulfilment of their dreams.

The orchestra responded fully to Mr. Rabaud's wishes. The men, too, were inspired. The gesture of thanks which the conductor made after the performance was the acknowledgment of a kind of co-operation which cannot be commanded. The interpretation was a model of musicianship and taste, in addition to its more overpowering qualities. There was no extravagance. The great strength of it was the strength which is felt the more because of poise and control.

Do Understand Beethoven

Perhaps there were those in the audience, accustomed to an almost unbroken succession of conductors of the German school, who had thought that a French conductor would not understand the Beethoven "fermatas"—those long-sustained chords, vibrated by the instruments as though two planets had met headlong in space and were locked together in a grip that would never give way. The "fermatas" of the first movement, the rugged power of its rythms, the volcanic passion of the music, were understood by Mr. Rabaud as by all the players in the orchestra, which now includes a much greater number of Frenchmen than before. Who should understand the music of a great spirit better? Beethoven has been reverently studied, understood, adored, for many years in France, and it may be said here that no orchestra has played the famous passage for the double basses in the scherzo of the fifth symphony as the double-basses of the orchestra of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire played this symphony a few months ago in the same hall, under the direction of Andre Messager.

As a whole, however, Mr. Rabaud's performance was by far the more moving of the two. It was not distinguished by unheard-of subtleties, and it is possible to be too subtle and sophisticated as many conductors of the day show with this symphony. It simply told the story of the man who fights with fate and conquers his stars with the ruggedness and the irresistible expressive power of the titan of composers. Only in such a spirit and in such a manner could the wildly exultant finale have been made so uplifting.

Music Born Again

To the conductor who can lead this movement as Mr. Rabaud led it yesterday, words are hardly adequate tribute. The audience was deeply stirred. The music was born again. Under less gifted men one has suspected signs of approaching age in this monumental work, but yesterday the fifth symphony seemed no less adequate a greeting to the new spirit of the 20th century and humanity after the world war than it must have seemed to the young generation of the 19th century in the turmoil and the birth of new ideals which followed the French revolution. How many composers could be measured by such a scale?

A word for the new flutist, Mr. Laurent. His tone is uncommonly clear and brilliant. He is evidently an accomplished virtuoso and an authoritative musician.

Miss Garrison Singing

The concert aria of Mozart, "Ah non sai qual pena sia," sung by Miss Mabel Garrison, is not for us a very distinguished or dramatic piece of music. Nor did it find Miss Garrison at her vocal best, admirable musician as she is, and also a finished technician. That she has the vocal range and dexterity needed for such music, that she knows how to phrase and what the art of diction means, was apparent to everyone, but there is surely more interesting material for a singer. Nor can we commend on the score of composition Edgar-Stillman-Kelley's "California Idyl." The poem, which is full of rills and trills, could hardly inspire exalted treatment.

The music is prettily conventional, and the mention of bird songs and the like is made the moment for many vocal ornaments and extravaganzas of the soloist. Probably Mr. Kelley took the thing no more seriously. He has certainly written much more distinctive music. In this song Miss Garrison distinguished herself as a vocalist.

Saint-Saens' "Phaeton"

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton," has seldom been played in Boston. Perhaps for this reason, one wishes one could hear it a little oftner, and other of Saint-Saens' symphonic poems a little less. It is very dexterous, piquent Gallic. Saint-Saens is always spoken of as the one who inaugurated the symphonic poem of the Liszt type in France, and one of the first to understand its possibilities. Well, if he understood them, he did not exploit them. The Saint-Saens symphonic poems are less "symphonic poems" as Lizst conceived the form than they are sublimated piano etudes, arranged for orchestra. One persistent figure, designed to suggest a spinning wheel, or a grave yard dance, or, as yesterday, the chariot of "Phaeton," is made the basis for entertaining variations. The symphonic poems of Lizst and Strauss are far deeper, more dramatic, plastic in form, symphonic in character.

Lalo's rhapsody in A major brought the concert to a brilliant conclusion.

MONITOR, JANUARY 18

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Mr. Rabaud made a more profound impression on a Friday afternoon audience at the eleventh program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the afternoon of Jan. 17, than he has achieved at any previous afternoon concert this season. He did it in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which he read not alone with authority but with a freedom from convention, though always within the strict bounds of good taste, which has not always marked his Beethoven readings hitherto. The orchestra responded nobly to the conductor's mood. For the first time, Mr. Laurent, the new first flute, and Mr. Adam, the new first trombone, were in their places, to the noticeable improvement of the tone quality of their respective divisions. Both come from the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. Miss Mabel Garrison, who, aside from the quality of her voice, always sings so well that it is a pleasure to hear her, was the soloist, giving a Mozart recitative, "Mia Speranza Adorata," and rondo, "Ah! non sai qual pena sia" (K. 416) and "A California Idyl" by Edgar Stillman Kelley, which is a setting to verses by Charles Keeler. Mr. Kelley wrote this aria for Miss Garrison especially, but he quite evidently did not consult with the lady first, for the orchestration receives far more attention than the voice, and a singer must breathe sometimes. It is to be hoped that Mr. Kelley, who was in the audience, may realize the necessity of fitting music and words a little more closely together. The program also included Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "Phaëton" and Lalo's rhapsody in A major.

Fredric Fradkin, the new concert master of the Boston Orchestra, made his first local appearance as soloist in the fourth concert of the series which the orchestra gives in Cambridge each year, playing Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor, op. 64. The young man's tone is engaging though not large, but a certain restlessness in his posture communicates itself to his tempi so that his rhythm is somewhat uneven. His tremolo is a little inclined to stiffness and rapidity, but his technique has reached the point where it is sufficient for any demands that the violin repertory makes on a concert player. He hurls himself headlong into a tempestuous passage sure that he will come out all right but leaving conductor and orchestra to follow as best they can. It is to his credit that he played the sugary andante movement of the concerto without sentimentality. A second hearing of the Suite of Sixteenth Century English music, arranged by Mr. Rabaud, confirms the excellent impression the first hearing made. An admirable restraint in orchestration preserves the atmosphere of the early English music. Likewise a second hearing of F. S. Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter" fantasy strengthens the impression gained of the admirable qualities of this work.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. RABAUD PROVES UNSUSPECTED POWERS

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in a Performance of Signal Eloquence — Saint-Saens's "Phæton" and a Rhapsody of Lalo for Contrasting Pieces—Miss Garrison Sings Ill-Chosen Numbers — The Orchestra, with Full Forces and Sundry Newcomers, on Its Mettle Again

BY signs from stage and programme-book yesterday, the Symphony Orchestra has at last been reconstituted, as it will continue through the present season and, substantially, for a season or more to come. Familiar figures, missing since last spring from familiar places, notably among the horns, have now resumed them; while two or three recent recruits have begun work with the band. The familiar figures were once Austrian or German subjects. When the orchestra was reorganized last summer to accord with the conditions of wartime, they were permitted to keep their posts because they were then on the way to American citizenship. They could not occupy them, however, until they had completed the necessary legal formalities, actually finished a week or more ago. There was happy evidence in the playing of the orchestra on Friday that change of nationality does not alter the abilities that originally brought them into the band and have made them valuable to it. The new recruits were gathered from the orchestra of the Parisian Conservatory now at the end of its American tour. One is a first flute, the body and the brightness of whose tone commend him no less than his fluent technical skill; another reënforces the trombones with material gain in smooth sonority; while a third will play at need, either the oboe or the English horn.

Thus, the orchestra now stands at full complement again; with eight horn-players, from which to draw four, none will be overworked; while the new flutist and the new trombonist promise well for the wood-wind and the brass choirs. Similarly Mr. Rabaud's assiduous pains at rehearsal, as he and the orchestra become more and more accustomed and responsive each to each; the increasing familiarity of the men in work one with another and choir with choir, a perceptibly rising esprit de corps are bettering the general and the particular quality of performance. Yesterday, for example, there were richer sonorities, warmer flow and larger pliancy of tone in the playing of Beethoven's symphony in C minor than the reorganized orchestra has often achieved. Finesse of detail and agreeable euphonies were not lacking in the instrumental voices to Saint-Saëns's tone-poem of "Phaeton"; while in Lalo's rhapsody, remade for orchestra from his "Norwegian Fantasy" for violin, the band renewed its rhythmic verve, recovered its élan of colorful performance in showy music. As signs now run before the end of the season the Symphony Orchestra will be near to its old self and no subject for the condescensions of our neighbors in New York.

Beyond all anticipation among the merely neutral, to the surprise even of the conductor's warmest partisans, Mr. Rabaud succeeded with Beethoven's symphony in C minor. In the two months of his leadership he has not gained such eloquence with any classic piece and with only two or three modern numbers. For the first time, almost, he seemed to conduct with clear emotional as well as mental reaction to the music in hand, at moments even with a veritable passion of response to it. Once more he was lucid of exposition, at the golden mean of a disclosing and animating pace, never too fast and never too slow, just in his distribution of accent and color, less moulding phrase than helping it into large flow into Beethoven's ample design. Now, however, under the ardor that the music plainly kindled in him, these admirable qualities gained warmth, vitality. True, there were moments in which he was only vigorously straightforward with measures he might have modulated imaginatively and moments again in which he seemed to shorten Beethoven's intentionally dramatic pauses. On the other hand, he surpassed himself in fine energies of rhythm, in large ascents over long gradients of tone, in fervor of transition, in the vivid emphasis of significent phrase or progression.

Above all, Mr. Rabaud caught, and transmitted the power, the exaltation of this symphony—the note that Beethoven strikes at the very beginning; that he—and yesterday the conductor with him—sustains to the end. The contrasting tumults of the first movement rose and fell as in a tragic passion of tonal speech, yet with a puissant splendor of music as it addresses the ear alone. Large were the fervors, noble the accent, luminous the progress of Beethoven's instrumental song, as conductor and orchestra spoke it from the slow movement. The scherzo passed from the voice of vigor to the voice of mystery; the celebrated transition to the finale wrought the familiar thrill and, for once, deepened it; while the finale itself was Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra in magniloquent progress through Beethoven's nearly endless exultations. Again they renewed the tonal, the emotional power they had gained in the first movement but clothed it now in a glowing magnificance of sound and motion. For once, an audience heard Beethoven not only impassioned but epic, knew his depths of mood, his mighty exaltations of speech, knew also the white heats of creation whereby he makes the means, the matter, the procedure of music so speak from man to men. It was rare experience; it was, as yet, Mr. Rabaud's one half hour of glowing inspiration. An audience too impressed to be fully articulate, might have given him more applause. He had held it, as he had held the orchestra in the hollow of his fervid will.

The rest of the programme offered less stimulating matter, less transcended usual conditions of performance. Of Saint-Saëns's symphonic poems, "The Youth of Hercules" is well devised matter for music, brought not merely to well-considered but often imaginative voice; the "Danse Macabre" does not lack occasional graphic and fantastic quality; even "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" has charm of fancy. But is "Phaëton," revived yesterday afternoon, much more than artificial contrivance, disclosing Saint-Saëns's dexterity in a musical narrative, so to say, ill suited to music? Phaëton drives across the heavens the coursers of the sun, soon escaping from a hand unmeet to guide them. The fiery chariot, tossing through the upper air, threatens to consume the earth. With a thunderbolt, Jupiter stays it. There is lament for the youth, daring and dead, the lament of nymphs, perhaps, who earlier in the tonal tale, have watched forebodingly Phaëton's peril. Thereby Saint-Saëns gains opportunity for the songful, gentler measures that shall set contrast to the measures of the coursers and chariot. His tone-picturing of the ride with rhythm, now insistent, now broken, with suggestion of the youth's failing hand and the fitful flight of his horses, remains expert technical feat; but no more than narrative prose to the listening imagination. Pale, too, is the catastrophe, pale, prepared, meditated; while as for the mourning nymphs, they are decorous, tasteful Not a little of Saint-Saëns's music well abides the years; but they have withered this "Phaëton" because, though it concerns the sun, there is little life or heat in the tone-poem. From first measure to last it is thought and facture, not the imagery or the poetry of tones.

Akin to the tone-poem, as curious coincidence of the day would have it, were the two pieces sung by Miss Garrison, the "assisting artist" of the day, though they were as far apart in matter and in manner as are Mozart of Vienna in 1783 from Edgar Stillmann Kelley of Oxford, Ohio, 1918. Mozart's recitative and rondo, "Mia Speranza Adorata," is routine mechanics for the display of an ornate soprano voice and no whit more, even his illustrious name does sign it. Mr. Kelley's "California Idyll" seems written for no other purpose and with like use of convenient commonplaces sometimes none too skilfully disposed; while Miss Garrison, as ill fortune would have it, sang neither with her usual brightness of tone and animation of mood. In Mozart's piece, she was the skilful singer taking careful thought of the contour of each phrase, of her method with each ornament, of the touches of sentiment the music here and there exacted. In Mr. Kelley's "Idyll" she was similarly cauptious with his plentiful florid passages, wary of the moments when her voice must pierce her clouding orchestra. In a sense she was expert with both pieces, but through neither played the charm, the glow usually animating her singing. It suggested fatigue and a reluctant spirit. The more welcome, then, was Lalo's version for orchestra alone of his Nouvegran Fantasia for violin and orchestra. Admittedly, it is a displayful piece, mor manner than matter, but there is warmtl of invention in the motives, clear play o vivifying mood, lively imagination an graphic effect in play of rhythm, harmo nies, instrumental color. Again Mr. Ra baud and the orchestra struck fire, an after the pathos of Mozart, Kelley. Mis Garrison and Saint-Saëns, it was good hear music "sound." But the symphon of the beginning and the performance o the symphony still haunted many an ear

H. T. P.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
ess: New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

Henri Rabaud, New French Conductor of Famous Orchestra, Delights Great Audience.

D'INDY TRILOGY THE FEATURE

Rejuvenated Organization Electrifies Hearers With Highly Diversified Program.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

The third concert of the thirty-third season in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Carnegie Hall before a splendid and I thought, pleasantly surprised audience. Conductor Henri Rabaud, the French master of the orchestral baton and composer of "Marouf" and other more or less grand music dramas, has not only lifted the famous Boston band out of its old and beaten paths of sturdy conservatism and overmethodical musical efficiency, but he seems to have transfigured the organization into an unaccustomed access of vivacity, esprit and almost sprightly responsiveness. If the reorganization and revivificaton of the Boston orchestra were drected upon Parisian Gallic lines, the material at hand when M. Rabaud took charge must have been of the most adaptable and plastic quality, for at last evening's glittering recital there were no traces of the stodgy solemnity, of the almost overwhelming inevitableness of the performances of these Bostonians under the Muck leadership.

And the program, inescapably indicative of the tastes and intentions of the new conductor, was electrifying in its eventful diversities, its wealth of successive "story music," its pervasive pictorial effects, its gorgeous—almost bizarre—color contrasts, and its unfailing and triumphant reference to the dramatic, the "actionable," the illustrative and the emotional potentialities of the orchestral instrument. In a precise and, perhaps, narrow sense, it was hardly an ideal symphonic program, for its salient feature was D'Indy's Trilogy of "Wallenstein," an almost narrative-poetic sequence after the stately and almost theatric poem by Schiller.

Dazzling Orchestral Tapestries.

The rejuvenated Boston Symphony Orchestra proclaimed its newly absorbed vivacity in the introductory number of this highly colored and boldly punctuated trilogy, "Wallenstein's Camp," an ingeniously and gallantly painted musical mural which is of tenuous and cohesive structure in spite of the fact that its numerous military and emotive themes are not developed along symphonic lines. This was played with amazing mechanical nicety, contagious enthusiasm, tempo of music and temperament of conductor sweeping like prairie fire through the responsive sections and the keenly alert choirs of the orchestra.

This must be "the only way" to play the D'Indy trilogy, but in the old days the Boston orchestra did not much adventure into such bonny fields of musical enterprise and I know of no other symphony orchestra that could play either the camp number or the yet more splendidly pictorial second part. (The Piccolomini) better than Rabaud's men played it last evening. "The Death of Wallenstein," which concludes the trilogy, is rich in umbrous and ostentatious melodic splendors, momentous, too, with the big, epical romanticism of the hero; and M. Rabaud read it like that, pouring out all of the great resources of his now wonderfully adjusted and responsive instrument "for all it was worth."

Audience Immensely Pleased.

Probably it doesn't matter at all what the criticasters and the cognoscenti say about the apotheosized Boston Symphony Orchestra and the galvanic program which it played last evening, because the packed audience showed more spontaneous and audible delight throughout the evening than any symphony audience I have observed for some time. I hope that such programs are not so pleasant, so unqualifiedly delightful as to incur the pontifical condemnation of the ultra-conservatives and the pietistical connoisseurs of immortal musical miseries. And if they do incur such anathemas, I hope Henri Rabaud will pay no attention to them.

"The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse, which opened the second half of the program, is an orchestral fantasy which proved a logical and commendable sequence to the first half. Its compositional argument is after the poem of that name by Walt Whitman, and it is vividly vocal of the tempestuously imaginative philosophy of the Good Gray Poet. That, too, met with the impressive approbation of the audience, as did the Sixteenth Century Suite by Farnaby and anonymous English composers which M. Renaud has arranged for his now buoyantly spirited band and which, as played last evening, is a capital model of orchestral resourcefulness and enterprising leadership. The concert closed with Berlioz's noble overture from "King Lear," splendidly played.

HERALD
New York City
JAN 10 1919

nant Marshall G. Peabody, Lieutenant rthur L. Engels, Cadet Wayles B. Brady, Jr.; Private Danforth B. Ferguson and rgeant Richard D. Hamilton, Jr.

The annual report of the club and of the thletic Committee indicate, now that the ar is over, that a very complete and teresting programme has been arranged r the coming year. The club will resume s athletics in every way and the athletes gain will be permitted to represent the the championships, and it will be the

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, gave the third evening concert of its thirty-third New York season at Carnegie Hall last night before an audience so large that the evidence that this famous orchestra had lost none of its wonted drawing powers with New York concertgoers was conclusive.

A programme made up of compositions by Berlioz, Vincent D'Indy, Rabaud himself and one of our best American composers, Frederick S. Converse, promised so well that I looked forward to a concert evening of both interest and enjoyment; but somehow, whether it was my mood or not, this promise was not fulfilled, and the programme in performance struck me on the whole as somehow lacking in point and convincing effect.

I remember very well the first time I heard D'Indy's trilogy "Wallenstein," at a Lamoureux concert in Paris in the early nineties, being tremendously interested and impressed; last night, for some reason, I was neither. The work has movement, varied emotional interest and contrast; is effectively scored for orchestra and has passages of both power and effective pictorial illustration of both mood and incident.

But I felt it last night as lacking in the nobility, poetry, dramatic force and interest of the poem of Schiller which it is supposed to illustrate. After a hearing of the work, first played in New York at one of Seidl's concerts at Steinway Hall in 1888, and certainly not played here in recent years, I felt strongly that the "Istar" variations and the "Symphony of a Mountaineer," by the same composer, were far superior to this work in inspirational qualities, originality and orchestral effect.

Mr. Converse's Fantasy.

Mr. Rabaud, ably seconded by the orchestra, now playing with wonted effect in spite of certain roughnesses of technique, like the passage of the bassoons which describes the Capucin's Sermon, gave full effect and value in interpretation to all the descriptive quality of the work which, as I thought, in spite of all, did not impress the audience any more than it did me, although there were hearty applause and recails for Mr. Rabaud at the close.

Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasy "The Mystic Trumpeter," after the poem of Walt Whitman, was first played in New York at the second concert of the new Music Society of America in Carnegie Hall in April, 1906, and so far as I know, and if memory serves, has not been played here since. After hearing this thoroughly musicianly, well scored work truly poetic in conception and thoroughly masterly in execution, the thought occurred to me why this effective composition by one of our best trained American musicians and composers has not appeared oftener on concert programmes.

I think beyond doubt that it is one of the best things that Mr. Converse has done from the standpoint of both inspiration and technical craftsmanship; and yet somehow it falls of convincing effect. Of course the Whitman poem, with its mystery and peace, love, war, humiliation and final joy, is definitely subtle in suggestion, and perhaps Mr. Converse's music being so thoroughly in accord with the spirit and inner psychology of the poem soars a little above the heads of the average concertgoer. One feels, perhaps, too, a lack of salient melody, a lack of concrete form; for it is not till the last section illustrating the final joyous mood of the poet's thought that we arrive at something quite definite in melody that is formal and not, as heretofore, only emotionally suggested. The work was read carefully and evidently con amore by Mr. Rabaud and played by the orchestra with all possible effect and attention; and the first trumpet is certainly to be congratulated on his almost impossible high notes.

Suite by Mr. Rabaud.

After that we heard for the first time "Suite of the Sixteenth Century," arranged by Mr. Rabaud from music derived from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, by Farnaby and anonymous English composers. This suite was arranged from music that Mr. Rabaud provided for the performance of Lucien Nepoty's version of Shakespeare's comedy "The Merchant of Venice," at the Théâtre Antoine, in Paris in the season of 1916-17.

Although arranged for instruments that are not anachronistic—oboes, bassoons, trumpets, harps, organ and strings—with due cleverness and proper attention to the color of music of the period, I found this music, which is in five short numbers, rather stilted in style and monotoned in color. The third movement, allegro, had a good old English sweep, and was both spirited and effective, and the fourth, andante, by an anonymous composer, had real quality of emotion and decided contrast, but as a whole I do not think when divorced from the drama which it was intended to accompany and illustrate, that this music possesses great value or interest for concert use.

The programme closed with an effective performance of Berlioz's seldom heard overture to "King Lear," an ouvrage de jeunesse, rather pompous, rather empty and showing the composer has not yet quite settled in his mind as to his musical thought, the form and expression of it and the way it could best be illustrated orchestrally. The overture was first performed in New York in 1846 and, as far as my experience goes, I had never heard it performed in this country before, though it is frequently played in Paris.

There was a tiresome and unnecessarily long intermission after the D'Indy number, and, on the whole, I found the programme a little recondite and, I tell, a little tiresome and lacking in points of interest.

TRIBUNE
New York City

Music

Historical Excursion With Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall

By H. E. Krehbiel

The music which M. Rabaud brought to the hearing of his audience at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night brought memories flocking into the mind of a veteran recorder of musical doings. First, there was the "Wallenstein" trilogy by Vincent d' Indy, which was recalled as probably the first composition by a composer now comparatively well known and heard in New York when Anton Seidl brought it forward at a concert in Steinway Hall thirty years ago the first of last month.

Next came Frederick Converse's fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," which was new music when given at a concert of the New York Music Society, one of the many short-lived organizations called into being for the purpose of giving hearings to the works of American composers, in April, 1906.

Some orchestral settings of English dances dating back to the Elizabethan period, made by M. Rabaud out of material drawn from the famous collection of harpsichord music now known as the "Fitzwilliam Virginal Book," but long called "Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book" because of the belief that it had once been the property of England's Virgin Queen. Unfortunately this amiable theory was destroyed by the discovery made by unsentimental and iconoclastic critics that some of the music in it was not composed until seventeen years after Queen Elizabeth's death.

Historically the thesaurus is nevertheless invaluable and local historians ought to take pride in the fact that a similar collection which is still in manuscript, and which we judge to be a product of the seventeenth century is preserved in our own public library being a part of the collection made by Dr. Rimbault and bought by Joseph W. Drexel for his library in 1877. Some day some man of wealth who wishes to do a service to musical history may commission an antiquarian scholar to transcribe this collection so that it may be collated with the Fitzwilliam book. There may have been an inkling of its treasures in the delightful music which M. Rabaud presented to us in orchestral garb last night.

The last number on the programme was the overture "Roi Lear," by Berlioz, which some of The Tribune's readers may have listened to with interest heightened by amused curiosity, since it figured as evidence in the argument advanced by this writer two or three weeks ago that the present régime was not coextensive with the cultivation or appreciation of French music in New York. Berlioz's overture to Shakespeare's tragedy was first performed here seventy-two years ago and has been in local lists ever since, though not so extensively as some other works by the composer of a more popular appealing character.

The only absolutely novel pieces, therefore, were the transcriptions of the Elizabethan dances, reverently and tastefully made by M. Rabaud. The music was a delightful echo of the time when "state and ancientry" prevailed in England's music as well as her politics and literature; when, though she borrowed some of her social and other fashions from the Continent, she sent her musicians to many of the continental courts and had the proud distinction of maintaining a school of virginalists incomparably more vigorous and interesting than the Italian, French and German. France did not take the lead with her Rameau and Couperin and Germany with her Bach till a century later.

It may be set down to the credit of the music written by d'Indy to illustrate Schiller's trilogy (there are three movements of symphonic scope and manner, one for each of the dramas "Wallenstein's Lager," "Die Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Tod") that it did not require a reference to the records of the past to recall some of the impressions made by the music when Seidl performed it in Steinway Hall. The riotous dances of the soldiery in the first part and the rude humor of the Capuchin's sermon had left their mark, though it must confessed that the thematic material seemed tawdry.

There is a lyric flight in the second movement, designed to portray the trials and love of Thekla and Max Piccolomini, which at its first hearing made it seem to us the finest and most spontaneous portion of the work, and in its climaxes a real expression of passionate pathos, but last night our interest was held more firmly by the last movement, possibly because of its finer thematic and orchestral workmanship. But of the feeling of Schiller we experienced little. After all it seemed fabricated music. It was interesting to note as a personal experience that instrumental colors and tridulous harmonies which we thought veils for a paucity of pregnant themes thirty years ago, seemed not at all strange. Possibly M. Rabaud was less eager to rasp our nerves than Mr. Seidl used to be at times. In fact, the revolutionary of a generation back seemed almost academic.

Mr. Converse spoke a much more interesting and more modern language and the sonority of his band was much greater. This American composer's translation into tones of what he calls in an explanatory note "the elemental phases" of Walt Whitman's poem—"mystery and peace, love, war or struggle, humiliation and finally joy"—had an unhappy first production here twelve years ago, grouped as it was with much unripe music precipitated upon a weary public with insufficient preparation, but even then it compelled recognition of the fact that it had in it a nature of excellence which made it worth while, to perform and to hear, irrespective of its origin. We said then that it was not likely to be neglected and could not have been thought more interesting or charming if it had come to us from France or Germany instead of Boston.

If composers and concert-givers would but bear in mind that therein lies the final test, the wise well-wishers of American music would less often have reason to feel discouraged by the outlook and indignant over the parade of self-seeking and effrontery under the guise of patriotism in art. The music is narrative and clings a little too slavishly, perhaps, to the text of the poem, but it has a noble imaginative quality even if it was necessary to recognize the fleeting quotation from "Marching Through Georgia" as determination of its national character.

How did the orchestra play? Eloquently, of course, else it could not have prompted this hurried and somewhat lengthy disquisition.

AMERICAN
ess: New York City

RABAUD PROVES MUSIC MASTER

Conductor Delights Audience with Recital of Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Henri Rabaud gave its third concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The orchestra presented D'Indy's trilogy "Wallenstein" at the head of the program instead of the customary symphony. That Rabaud is a master in the art of program-building, was evidenced by the other two numbers on the program, Mendelssohn's "Concerto for Violin," which introduced Frederic Fradkin, concert-master, as soloist, and Converse's archestral fantasy on Walt Whitman's "The Mystic Trumpeter."

The "Dallenstein" trilogy after the dramatic poem of Schiller includes three episodes in the life of the hero, "Wallenstein," the first of which depicts, in brilliant colors, flashes of warrior camp life, second the beautiful and tuneful love theme which hints of the tragic end of the lovers, and third, the death theme. The trilogy ends sonorously with the introduction used as a foundation.

Mr. Fradkin who played the solo part of the Mendelssohn Concerto, gave a brilliant and intellectual reading of this work and was enthusiastically recalled by the delighted audience.

The "Mystic Trumpeter" concluded the program. The latter number though composed fourteen years ago is the essence of what is enjoyed by the modern audience. The beauty of tone color, abundance of melody and ecstatic climaxes brought forth a storm of applause.

SYMPHONIC HYPNOGENY.

If Henri Rabaud wishes to retain the favor which he won so quickly and so legitimately at his first two concerts with the Boston Symphonic Orchestra in New York he will have to offer programmes more exhilarating than the one he "put over" last night in Carnegie Hall, when he returned to Manhattan with his disciples from the Hub.

Under his vigorous and compelling guidance, to be sure, the visiting organization once more played in a manner that left little to be desired. B... leadlier combination of compositions than he presented for hearing on this occasion has rarely been forced on an audience made up of intelligent music-lovers. Out of the thousands of masterpieces which the literature of music affords the distinguished French maestro could surely have made a better choice than the following: D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy; Converse's Orchestral Fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter"; his own Sixteenth Century Suite, and Berlioz's "King Lear" Overture.

Any one of these works, it is true, would have been welcome. The first two movements of D'Indy's early work (orchestral expositions of episodes from Schiller's dramatic poem, the one denominated "Wallenstein's Camp," the other "Max and Thekla") may be counted among the most spontaneous and inspiriting efforts of the scholarly composer. Converse's lengthy setting of Walt Whitman's poem is a thoroughly meritorious piece of instrumental prose, despite its obvious Wagnerian idiom and absolute lack of originality. Monsieur Rabaud's arrangements of music by Giles Farnaby and anonymous English composers found in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth are agreeable enough, if quite innocuous. And Berlioz's "Grand Overture" to "King Lear" needs no comment.

But what are we to say of a Boston Symphony concert without a single composition of great and ...ding value? Verily, Monsieur ...'d broke all records in this ... Bitterly did some persons ... from beginning to end to a performance of "Oberon" that had opened with so masterful a reading of the overture by Arthur Bodanzky.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
ess: New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

Henri Rabaud, New French Conductor of Famous Orchestra, Delights Great Audience.

D'INDY TRILOGY THE FEATURE

Rejuvenated Organization Electrifies Hearers With Highly Diversified Program.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

The third concert of the thirty-third season in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Carnegie Hall before a splendid and I thought, pleasantly surprised audience. Conductor Henri Rabaud, the French master of the orchestral baton and composer of "Marouf" and other more or less grand music dramas, has not only lifted the famous Boston band out of its old and beaten paths of sturdy conservatism and overmethodical musical efficiency, but he seems to have transfigured the organization into an unaccustomed access of vivacity, esprit and almost sprightly responsiveness. If the reorganization and revivificaton of the Boston orchestra were drected upon Parisian Gallic lines, the material at hand when M. Rabaud took charge must have been of the most adaptable and plastic quality, for at last evening's glittering recital there were no traces of the stodgy solemnity, of the almost overwhelming inevitabieness of the performances of these Bostonians under the Muck leadership.

And the program, inescapably indicative of the tastes and intentions of the new conductor, was electrifying in its eventful diversities, its wealth of successive "story music," its pervasive pictorial effects, its gorgeous—almost bizarre—color contrasts, and its unfailing and triumphant reference to the dramatic, the "actionable," the illustrative and the emotional potentialities of the orchestral instrument. In a precise and, perhaps, narrow sense, it was hardly an ideal symphonic program, for its salient feature was D'Indy's Trilogy of "Wallenstein," an almost narrative-poetic sequence after the stately and almost theatric poem by Schiller.

Dazzling Orchestral Tapestries.

The rejuvenated Boston Symphony Orchestra proclaimed its newly absorbed vivacity in the introductory number of this highly colored and boldly punctuated trilogy, "Wallenstein's Camp," an ingeniously and gallantly painted musical mural which is of tenuous and cohesive structure in spite of the fact that its numerous military and emotive themes are not developed along symphonic lines. This was played with amazing mechanical nicety, contagious enthusiasm, tempo of music and temperament of conductor sweeping like prairie fire through the responsive sections and the keenly alert choirs of the orchestra.

This must be "the only way" to play the D'Indy trilogy, but in the old days the Boston orchestra did not much adventure into such bonny fields of musical enterprise and I know of no other symphony orchestra that could play either the camp number or the yet more splendidly pictorial second part, (The Piccolomini) better than Rabaud's men played it last evening. "The Death of Wallenstein," which concludes the trilogy, is rich in umbrous and ostentatious melodic splendors, momentous, too, with the big, epical romanticism of the hero; and M. Rabaud read it like that, pouring out all of the great resources of his now wonderfully adjusted and responsive instrument "for all it was worth."

Audience Immensely Pleased.

Probably it doesn't matter at all what the criticasters and the cognoscenti say about the apotheosized Boston Symphony Orchestra and the galvanic program which it played last evening, because the packed audience showed more spontaneous and audible delight throughout the evening than any symphony audience I have observed for some time. I hope that such programs are not so pleasant, so unqualifiedly delightful as to incur the pontifical condemnation of the ultra-conservatives and the pietistical connoisseurs of immortal musical miseries. And if they do incur such anathemas, I hope Henri Rabaud will pay no attention to them.

"The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse, which opened the second half of the program, is an orchestral fantasy which proved a logical and commendable sequence to the first half. Its compositional argument is after the poem of that name by Walt Whitman, and it is vividly vocal of the tempestuously imaginative philosophy of the Good Gray Poet. That, too, met with the impressive approbation of the audience, as did the Sixteenth Century Suite by Farnaby and anonymous English composers which M. Renaud has arranged for his now buoyantly spirited band and which, as played last evening, is a capital model of orchestral resourcefulness and enterprising leadership. The concert closed with Berlioz's noble overture from "King Lear," splendidly played.

HERALD
New York City
JAN 10 1919

AMERICAN MUSIC PLAYED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, gave the third evening concert of its thirty-third New York season at Carnegie Hall last night before an audience so large that the evidence that this famous orchestra had lost none of its wonted drawing powers with New York concertgoers was conclusive.

A programme made up of compositions by Berlioz, Vincent D'Indy, Rabaud himself and one of our best American composers, Frederick S. Converse, promised so well that I looked forward to a concert evening of both interest and enjoyment; but somehow, whether it was my mood or not, this promise was not fulfilled, and the programme in performance struck me on the whole as somehow lacking in point and convincing effect.

I remember very well the first time I heard D'Indy's trilogy "Wallenstein," at a Lamoureux concert in Paris in the early nineties, being tremendously interested and impressed; last night, for some reason, I was neither. The work has movement, varied emotional interest and contrast; is effectively scored for orchestra and has passages of both power and effective pictorial illustration of both mood and incident.

But I felt it last night as lacking in the nobility, poetry, dramatic force and interest of the poem of Schiller which it is supposed to illustrate. After a hearing of the work, first played in New York at one of Seidl's concerts at Steinway Hall in 1888, and certainly not played here in recent years, I felt strongly that the "Istar" variations and the "Symphony of a Mountaineer," by the same composer, were far superior to this work in inspirational qualities, originality and orchestral effect.

Mr. Converse's Fantasy.

Mr. Rabaud, ably seconded by the orchestra, now playing with wonted effect in spite of certain roughnesses of technique, like the passage of the bassoons which describes the Capucin's Sermon, gave full effect and value in interpretation to all the descriptive quality of the work which, as I thought, in spite of all, did not impress the audience any more than it did me, although there were hearty applause and recalls for Mr. Rabaud at the close.

Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasy "The Mystic Trumpeter," after the poem of Walt Whitman, was first played in New York at the second concert of the new Music Society of America in Carnegie Hall in April, 1906, and so far as I know, and if memory serves, has not been played here since. After hearing this thoroughly musicianly, well scored work, truly poetic in conception and thoroughly masterly in execution, the thought occurred to me why this effective composition by one of our best trained American musicians and composers has not appeared oftener on concert programmes.

I think beyond doubt that it is one of the best things that Mr. Converse has done from the standpoint of both inspiration and technical craftsmanship; and yet somehow it falls of convincing effect. Of course the Whitman poem, with its mystery and peace, love, war, humiliation and final joy, is definitely subtle in suggestion, and perhaps Mr. Converse's music being so thoroughly in accord with the spirit and inner psychology of the poem soars a little above the heads of the average concertgoer. One feels, perhaps, the lack of salient melody, a lack of concrete form; for it is not till the last section illustrating the final joyous mood of the poet's thought that we arrive at something quite definite in melody that is formal and not, as heretofore, only emotionally suggested. The work was read carefully and evidently con amore by Mr. Rabaud and played by the orchestra with all possible effect and attention; and the first trumpet is certainly to be congratulated on his almost impossible high notes.

Suite by Mr. Rabaud.

After that we heard for the first time "Suite of the Sixteenth Century," arranged by Mr. Rabaud from music derived from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, by Farnaby and anonymous English composers. This suite was arranged from music that Mr. Rabaud provided for the performance of Lucien Nepoty's version of Shakespeare's comedy "The Merchant of Venice," at the Théâtre Antoine, in Paris in the season of 1916-17.

Although arranged for instruments that are not anachronistic—oboes, bassoons, trumpets, harps, organ and strings—with due cleverness and proper attention to the color of music of the period, I found this music, which is in five short numbers, rather stilted in style and monotoned in color. The third movement, allegro, had a good old English sweep, and was both spirited and effective, and the fourth, andante, by an anonymous composer, had real quality of emotion and decided contrast, but as a whole I do not think when divorced from the drama which it was intended to accompany and illustrate, that this music possesses great value or interest for concert use.

The programme closed with an effective performance of Berlioz's seldom heard overture to "King Lear," an ouvrage de jeunesse, rather pompous, rather empty and showing the composer has not quite settled in his mind as to his music thought, the form and expression of it the way it could best be illustrated chestrally. The overture was first performed in New York in 1846 and, as as my experience goes, I had never heard it performed in this country before, though it is frequently played in Paris.

There was a tiresome and unnecessarily long intermission after the D'Indy number, and, on the whole, I found the programme a little recondite and lacking in tell, a little tiresome and lacki[illegible] points of inter[illegible]

[illegible] beginning [illegible] end to a performance of "Ob[illegible]ron" that had opened with so ma[illegible]sterful a reading of the overture by Arthur Bodanzky.

TRIBUNE
New York City

[illegible] at Carnegie Hall

By H. E. Krehbiel

The music which M. Rabaud broug[illegible] to the hearing of his audience at t[illegible] concert of the Boston Symphony O[illegible]chestra in Carnegie Hall last nig[illegible] brought memories flocking into t[illegible] mind of a veteran recorder of music[illegible] doings. First, there was the "Walle[illegible]stein" trilogy by Vincent d' Indy, whi[illegible] was recalled as probably the first co[illegible]position by a composer now compar[illegible]tively well known and heard in N[illegible] York when Anton Seidl brought it f[illegible]ward at a concert in Steinway H[illegible] thirty years ago the first of last mon[illegible]

Next came Frederick Converse's fa[illegible]tasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," whi[illegible] was new music when given at a conc[illegible] of the New York Music Society, one [illegible] the many short-lived organizatio[illegible] called into being for the purpose [illegible] giving hearings to the works of Ame[illegible]can composers, in April, 1906.

Some orchestral settings of Engli[illegible] dances dating back to the Elizabeth[illegible] period, made by M. Rabaud out of m[illegible]terial drawn from the famous collecti[illegible] of harpsichord music now known as t[illegible] "Fitzwilliam Virginal Book," but lo[illegible] called "Queen Elizabeth's Virgi[illegible] Book" because of the belief that it h[illegible] once been the property of Englan[illegible] Virgin Queen. Unfortunately t[illegible] amiable theory was destroyed by [illegible] discovery made by unsentimental a[illegible] iconoclastic critics that some of t[illegible] music in it was not composed un[illegible] seventeen years after Queen Elizabet[illegible] death.

Historically the thesaurus is nev[illegible]theless invaluable and local historia[illegible] ought to take pride in the fact tha[illegible] similar collection which is still [illegible] manuscript, and which we judge to [illegible] a product of the seventeenth centu[illegible] is preserved in our own public libra[illegible] being a part of the collection made [illegible] Dr. Rimbault and bought by Joseph [illegible] Drexel for his library in 1877. So[illegible] day some man of wealth who wishes [illegible] do a service to musical history m[illegible] commission an antiquarian scholar [illegible] transcribe this collection so that [illegible] may be collated with the Fitzwilli[illegible] book. There may have been an inkl[illegible] of its treasures in the delightful mu[illegible] which M. Rabaud presented to us [illegible] orchestral garb last night.

The last number on the program[illegible] was the overture "Roi Lear," by B[illegible]lioz, which some of The Tribune's re[illegible]ers may have listened to with inter[illegible] heightened by amused curiosity, si[illegible] it figured as evidence in the argum[illegible] advanced by this writer two or th[illegible] weeks ago that the present régime [illegible] not coextensive with the cultivation [illegible] appreciation of French music in N[illegible] York. Berlioz's overture to Sha[illegible]speare's tragedy was first perform[illegible] here seventy-two years ago and [illegible] been in local lists ever since, tho[illegible] not so extensively as some other wo[illegible] by the composer of a more popula[illegible] appealing character.

The only absolutely novel pieces [illegible] therefore, were the transcriptions o[illegible] the Elizabethan dances, reverently and tastefully made by M. Rabaud. The music was a delightful echo of the time when "state and ancientry" prevailed in England's music as well as her politics and literature; when, though she borrowed some of her social and other fashions from the Continent, she sent her musicians to many of the continental courts and had the [illegible]

[illegible] and distinction of maintaining a [illegible]ool of virginalists incomparably [illegible]e vigorous and interesting than [illegible] Italian, French and German. France [illegible] not take the lead with her Ra[illegible]u and Couperin and Germany with [illegible] Bach till a century later.

[illegible] may be set down to the credit of [illegible] music written by d'Indy to illus[illegible]e Schiller's trilogy (there are three [illegible]ovements of symphonic scope and [illegible]ner, one for each of the dramas [illegible] "Wallenstein's Lager," "Die Piccolo[illegible]mini" and "Wallenstein's Tod") that [illegible] did not require a reference to the [illegible]ecords of the past to recall some of [illegible]he impressions made by the music [illegible]hen Seidl performed it in Steinway [illegible]all. The riotous dances of the sol[illegible]iery in the first part and the rude [illegible]umor of the Capuchin's sermon had [illegible]ft their mark, though it must con[illegible]essed that the thematic material [illegible]eemed tawdry.

There is a lyric flight in the second [illegible]ovement, designed to portray the [illegible]rials and love of Thekla and Max [illegible]iccolomini, which at its first hearing [illegible]ade it seem to us the finest and most [illegible]pontaneous portion of the work, and [illegible] its climaxes a real expression of [illegible]assionate pathos, but last night our [illegible]nterest was held more firmly by the [illegible]st movement, possibly because of its [illegible]ner thematic and orchestral work[illegible]anship. But of the feeling of Schiller [illegible] experienced little. After all it [illegible]eemed fabricated music. It was in[illegible]eresting to note as a personal experi[illegible]nce that instrumental colors and [illegible]ridulous harmonies which we thought [illegible]ils for a paucity of pregnant themes [illegible]irty years ago, seemed not at all [illegible]range. Possibly M. Rabaud was less [illegible]ger to rasp our nerves than Mr. [illegible]idl used to be at times. In fact, the [illegible]volutionary of a generation back [illegible]emed almost academic.

Mr. Converse spoke a much more in[illegible]resting and more modern language [illegible]nd the sonority of his band was much [illegible]reater. This American composer's [illegible]ranslation into tones of what he calls [illegible] an explanatory note "the elemental [illegible]hases" of Walt Whitman's poem—[illegible]ystery and peace, love, war or strug[illegible]le, humiliation and finally joy"—had [illegible] unhappy first production here [illegible]welve years ago, grouped as it was [illegible]ith much unripe music precipitated [illegible]pon a weary public with insufficient [illegible]reparation, but even then it compelled [illegible]ecognition of the fact that it had in [illegible] a nature of excellence which made [illegible] worth while, to perform and to hear, [illegible]respective of its origin. We said [illegible]en that it was not likely to be neg[illegible]cted and could not have been thought [illegible]ore interesting or charming if it had [illegible]ome to us from France or Germany [illegible]stead of Boston.

If composers and concert-givers [illegible]ould but bear in mind that therein [illegible]es the final test, the wise well-wish[illegible]rs of American music would less often [illegible]ave reason to feel discouraged by the [illegible]outlook and indignant over the parade [illegible] self-seeking and effrontery under [illegible]he guise of patriotism in art. The [illegible]music is narrative and clings a little [illegible]too slavishly, perhaps, to the text of [illegible]the poem, but it has a noble imagina[illegible]tive quality even if it was necessary [illegible] recognize the fleeting quotation from "Marching Through Georgia" as de[illegible]termination of its national character.

How did the orchestra play? Elo[illegible]quently, of course, else it could not [illegible]ave prompted this hurried and some[illegible]what lengthy disquisition.

AMERICAN
ess: New York City

SYMPHONIC HYPNOGENY.

If Henri Rabaud wishes to retain the favor which he won so quickly and so legitimately at his first two concerts with the Boston Symphonic Orchestra in New York he will have to offer programmes more exhilarating than the one he "put over" last night in Carnegie Hall, when he returned to Manhattan with his disciples from the Hub.

Under his vigorous and compelling guidance, to be sure, the visiting organization once more played in a manner that left little to be desired. [illegible] leadlier combination of compositions than he presented for hearing on this occasion has rarely been forced on an audience made up of intelligent music-lovers. Out of the thousands of masterpieces which the literature of music affords the distinguished French maestro could surely have made a better choice than the following: D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy; Converse's Orchestral Fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter"; his own Sixteenth Century Suite, and Berlioz's "King Lear" Overture.

Any one of these works, it is true, would have been welcome. The first two movements of D'Indy's early work (orchestral expositions of episodes from Schiller's dramatic poem, the one denominated "Wallenstein's Camp," the other "Max and Thekla") may be counted among the most spontaneous and inspiriting efforts of the scholarly composer. Converse's lengthy setting of Walt Whitman's poem is a thoroughly meritorious piece of instrumental prose, despite its obvious Wagnerian idiom and absolute lack of originality. Monsieur Rabaud's arrangements of music by Giles Farnaby and anonymous English composers found in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth are agreeable enough, if quite innocuous. And Berlioz's "Grand Overture" to "King Lear" needs no comment.

But what are we to say of a Boston Symphony concert without a single composition of great and [illegible]ding value? Verily, Monsieur [illegible] broke all records in this [illegible] Bitterly did some persons [illegible]

[illegible] 18
SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. RABAUD PROVES UNSUSPECTED POWERS

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in a Performance of Signal Eloquence — Saint-Saens's "Phæton" and a Rhapsody of Lalo for Contrasting Pieces—Miss Garrison Sings Ill-Chosen Numbers — The Orchestra, with Full Forces and Sundry Newcomers, on Its Mettle Again

BY signs from stage and programme-book yesterday, the Symphony Orchestra has at last been reconstituted, as it will continue through the present season and, substantially, for a season or more to come. Familiar figures, missing since last spring from familiar places, notably among the horns, have now resumed them; while two or three recent recruits have begun work with the band. The familiar figures were once Austrian or German subjects. When the orchestra was reorganized last summer to accord with the conditions of wartime, they were permitted to keep their posts because they were then on the way to American citizenship. They could not occupy them, however, until they had completed the necessary legal formalities, actually finished a week or more ago. There was happy evidence in the playing of the orchestra on Friday that change of nationality does not alter the abilities that originally brought them into the band and have made them valuable to it. The new recruits were gathered from the orchestra of the Parisian Conservatory now at the end of its American tour. One is a first flute, the body and the brightness of whose tone commend him no less than his fluent technical skill; another reënforces the trombones with material gain in smooth sonority; while a third will play at need, either the oboe or the English horn.

Thus, the orchestra now stands at full complement again; with eight horn-players, from which to draw four, none will be overworked; while the new flutist and the new trombonist promise well for the wood-wind and the brass choirs. Similarly Mr. Rabaud's assiduous pains at rehearsal, as he and the orchestra become more and more accustomed and responsive each to each; the increasing familiarity of the men in work one with another and choir with choir, a perceptibly rising esprit de corps are bettering the general and the particular quality of performance. Yesterday, for example, there were richer sonorities, warmer flow and larger pliancy of tone in the playing of Beethoven's symphony in C minor than the reorganized orchestra has often achieved. Finesse of detail and agreeable euphonies were not lacking in the instrumental voices to Saint-Saëns's tone-poem of "Phaeton"; while in Lalo's rhapsody, remade for orchestra from his "Norwegian Fantasy" for violin, the band renewed its rhythmic verve, recovered its élan of colorful performance in showy music. As signs now run before the end of the season the Symphony Orchestra will be near to its old self and no subject for the condescensions of our neighbors in New York.

Beyond all anticipation among the merely neutral, to the surprise even of the conductor's warmest partisans, Mr. Rabaud succeeded with Beethoven's symphony in C minor. In the two months of his leadership he has not gained such eloquence with any classic piece and with only two or three modern numbers. For the first time, almost, he seemed to conduct with clear emotional as well as mental reaction to the music in hand, at moments even with a veritable passion of response to it. Once more he was lucid of exposition, at the golden mean of a disclosing and animating pace, never too fast and never too slow, just in his distribution of accent and color, less moulding phrase than helping it into large flow into Beethoven's ample design. Now, however, under the ardor that the music plainly kindled in him, these admirable qualities gained warmth, vitality. True, there were moments in which he was only vigorously straightforward with measures he might have modulated imaginatively and moments again in which he seemed to shorten Beethoven's intentionally dramatic pauses. On the other hand, he surpassed himself in fine energies of rhythm, in large ascents over long gradients of tone, in fervor of transition, in the vivid emphasis of significent phrase or progression.

Above all, Mr. Rabaud caught, and transmitted the power, the exaltation of this symphony—the note that Beethoven strikes at the very beginning; that he—and yesterday the conductor with him—sustains to the end. The contrasting tumults of the first movement rose and fell as in a tragic passion of tonal speech, yet with a puissant splendor of music as it addresses the ear alone. Large were the fervors, noble the accent, luminous the progress of Beethoven's instrumental song, as conductor and orchestra spoke it from the slow movement. The scherzo passed from the voice of vigor to the voice of mystery; the celebrated transition to the finale wrought the familiar thrill and, for once, deepened it; while the finale itself was Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra in magniloquent progress through Beethoven's nearly endless exultations. Again they renewed the tonal, the emotional power they had gained in the first movement but clothed it now in a glowing magnificance of sound and motion. For once, an audience heard Beethoven not only impassioned but epic, knew his depths of mood, his mighty exaltations of speech, knew also the white heats of creation whereby he makes the means, the matter, the procedure of music so speak from man to men. It was rare experience; it was, as yet, Mr. Rabaud's one half hour of glowing inspiration. An audience too impressed to be fully articulate, might have given him more applause. He had held it, as he had held the orchestra in the hollow of his fervid will.

The rest of the programme offered less stimulating matter, less transcended usual conditions of performance. Of Saint-Saëns's symphonic poems, "The Youth of Hercules" is well devised matter for music, brought not merely to well-considered but often imaginative voice; the "Danse Macabre" does not lack occasional graphic and fantastic quality; even "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" has charm of fancy. But is "Phaëton," revived yesterday afternoon, much more than artificial contrivance, disclosing Saint-Saëns's dexterity in a musical narrative, so to say, ill suited to music? Phaëton drives across the heavens the coursers of the sun, soon escaping from a hand unmeet to guide them. The fiery chariot, tossing through the upper air, threatens to consume the earth. With a thunderbolt, Jupiter stays it. There is lament for the youth, daring and dead, the lament of nymphs, perhaps, who earlier in the tonal tale, have watched forebodingly Phaëton's peril. Thereby Saint-Saëns gains opportunity for the songful, gentler measures that shall set contrast to the measures of the coursers and chariot. His tone-picturing of the ride with rhythm, now insistent, now broken, with suggestion of the youth's failing hand and the fitful flight of his horses, remains expert technical feat; but no more than narrative prose to the listening imagination. Pale, too, is the catastrophe, pale, prepared, meditated; while as for the mourning nymphs, they are decorous, tasteful Not a little of Saint-Saëns's music well abides the years; but they have withered this "Phaëton" because, though it concerns the sun, there is little life or heat in the tone-poem. From first measure to last it is thought and facture, not the imagery or the poetry of tones.

Akin to the tone-poem, as curious coincidence of the day would have it, were the two pieces sung by Miss Garrison, the "assisting artist" of the day, though they were as far apart in matter and in manner as are Mozart of Vienna in 1783 from Edgar Stillmann Kelley of Oxford, Ohio, 1918. Mozart's recitative and rondo, "Mia Speranza Adorata," is routine mechanics for the display of an ornate soprano voice and no whit more, even his illustrious name does sign it. Mr. Kelley's "California Idyll" seems written for no other purpose and with like use of convenient commonplaces sometimes none too skilfully disposed; while Miss Garrison, as ill fortune would have it, sang neither with her usual brightness of tone and animation of mood. In Mozart's piece, she was the skilful singer taking careful thought of the contour of each phrase, of her method with each ornament, of the touches of sentiment the music here and there exacted. In Mr. Kelley's "Idyll" she was similarly cauptious with his plentiful florid passages, wary of the moments when her voice must pierce her clouding orchestra. In a sense she was expert with both pieces, but through neither played the charm, the glow usually animating her singing. It suggested fatigue and a reluctant spirit. The more welcome, then, was Lalo's version for orchestra alone of his Nouvegrani Fantasia for violin and orchestra. Admittedly, it is a displayful piece, more manner than matter, but there is warmth of invention in the motives, clear play of vivifying mood, lively imagination and graphic effect in play of rhythm, harmonies, instrumental color. Again Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra struck fire, and after the pathos of Mozart, Kelley, Miss Garrison and Saint-Saëns, it was good to hear music "sound." But the symphony of the beginning and the performance of the symphony still haunted many an ear.

H. T. P.

om HERALD
ddress Washington, D. C
ate

RABAUD PROVES MUSIC MASTER

Conductor Delights Audience with Recital of Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Henri Rabaud gave its third concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The orchestra presented D'Indy's trilogy "Wallenstein" at the head of the program instead of the customary symphony. That Rabaud is a master in the art of program-building, was evidenced by the other two numbers on the program, Mendelssohn's "Concerto for Violin," which introduced Frederic Fradkin, concert-master, as soloist, and Converse's archestral fantasy on Walt Whitman's "The Mystic Trumpeter."

The "Dallenstein" trilogy after the dramatic poem of Schiller includes three episodes in the life of the hero, "Wallenstein," the first of which depicts, in brilliant colors, flashes of warrior camp life, second the beautiful and tuneful love theme which hints of the tragic end of the lovers, and third, the death theme. The trilogy ends sonorously with the introduction used as a foundation.

Mr. Fradkin who played the solo part of the Mendelssohn Concerto, gave a brilliant and intellectual reading of this work and was enthusiastically recalled by the delighted audience.

The "Mystic Trumpeter" concluded the program. The latter number though composed fourteen years ago is the essence of what is enjoyed by the modern audience. The beauty of tone color, abundance of melody and ecstatic climaxes brought forth a storm of applause.

EVENING GLOBE
ss: New York City

Music.

Two Orchestral Concerts—

The Boston Symphony programme opened with the "Wallenstein" trilogy of Vincent d'Indy. That work has been played here so little that of its three sections the present writer had previously heard only the first, "Wallenstein's Camp," and that at a concert earlier this season of the visiting orchestra from the Paris Conservatoire. This first section may have sounded rude and boisterous in 1880. To-day it persuades one that the Wallenstein cantonment was a very merry place, with an admirably appointed hostesses' house and bevies of young girls of the first families to dance in decorous jollity with the well-bred and well-behaved soldier laddies. To be sure, some canting bassoons do try to sermonize, but they are soon caught up and silenced in the joyous round, as all such richly deserve to be!

"Max and Thekla" ("The Piccolomini") depicts tragic love with real eloquence and beauty. But the most impressive portion of the trilogy to-day is the final section, "The Death of Wallenstein," music that is impressive in substance and sumptuous in scoring. Nor need the reference to "Peer Gynt" in the opening measures give offense. The "Wallenstein" trilogy was composed in the course of the years from 1873 to 1881. In spite of this long gestation, it is more spontaneous, less tormented, than the later works of d'Indy, though it cannot claim the importance of the "Istar" variations or the symphony in B flat. It was good to hear the trilogy in its entirety and played with such sympathy as under the devoted lead of Mr. Rabaud.

Next came another work that has been neglected here for a goodly number of years, though it was composed only in 1903-4—"The Mystic Trumpeter," an orchestral fantasy after the poem of Walt Whitman by Mr. F. S. Converse of Boston and vicinity. Meantime less deserving works have been played often. "The Mystic Trumpeter" is unquestionably one of the best orchestral compositions as yet made in America. True, it is Wagner and Richard Strauss done into good New England pewter, but there is consolation in knowing that Wagner and Richard Strauss can be written so well in Boston and vicinity. Mr. Converse shows himself a pewterer of intelligence and responsive fancy, a master of the sonorous Straussian orchestra of 1903-4.

Then came Mr. Rabaud himself with a suite of sixteenth century English pieces that he had chosen, arranged, and orchestrated from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book. Mr. Rabaud has taken three suites from music he so prepared for the performances of "The Merchant of Venice" in a French version given at the Théâtre Antoine in Paris in the season of 1916-17. This is the third suite. Of the four original pieces in it two are by Farnaby, two anonymous. All are delightful in their several ways. Mr. Rabaud's scoring touches both archaism and modernism right graciously.

A programme that erred on the side of length ended with the "King Lear" overture of Berlioz. This overture to-day has little interest aside from the historical, but the historical is sufficient to entitle it to an occasional performance. Then it should be played in the spirit of Théophile Gautier's red waistcoat and the romantics of 1830—in short, as led by Mr. Rabaud yesterday.

As for the band, the first violins have not yet regained the crystalline purity and fire of other days, but the second are better than of old, and last evening the first horn and the first trumpet covered themselves with glory. The basses are always superb, incomparable. The very large audience was singularly undemonstrative. It might have been a Boston audience!

PITTS SANBORN.

EVENING MAIL
s: New York City

NEW YORK'S friendly respect is growing into something like affection for Henri Rabaud, of Paris and Boston, if the temperature of last night's audience at the Boston Symphony concert is a genuine indication of the condition of its emotional pulses.

After his conducting of D'Indy's impressive "Wallenstein" trilogy, no one can accuse Mr. Rabaud of being merely a scholarly Frenchman, correct, precise and discreet. He has fire, too, and the smooth loveliness with which the orchestra played left little room for that host of invidious comparisons between the present Boston band of musicians and the old organization. Particularly he made glorious use of his horns, especially in the second movement of the "Wallenstein," with its battles and sudden death.

Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter" is like the little box of remnants at the end of a ribbon counter. There are pastel shades and a few vivid colors, but none of them match, and none of them bear any actual relation to each other.

But Mr. Rabaud's "Sixteenth Century Suite" is a delicious potpourri of old-fashioned tunes, dainty with powdered wigs and patches and sometimes sturdy with the rollicking song of a French market woman. He played it with a dash and insouciance that entirely captivated listeners who are by no means easily bewitched.

Berlioz's "King Lear" at the end left people wishing for one other selection and more than that few orchestral concerts ever achieve.

TRIBUNE
New York City
JAN 12 1919

Music

A Notable Composition by the Conductor of the Boston Orchestra

By H. E. Krehbiel

The final concert of the Boston Orchestra's third visit to New York in this season was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The music and performance were varied and changeful, like Byron's dying dolphin

"whom each pang imbues
With a new color as it gasps away,
The last still loveliest."

Somewhat disappointing was the symphony—Schumann's fourth—its triumphant progress clogged by the rude and heavy-footed tempo of its jocose movement. Also its colors were drab, but for this the composer, not the conductor, was to blame. Brighter orchestral tints, although the theme was sombre, glowed in M. Rabaud's "Nocturnal Procession," music new to us, but prismatic hues flashed and radiated from Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" to the confusion almost of our senses. Then, at the last came Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, which in every respect like

"The setting sun, and music at the close,
As the last taste of sweets," was the sweetest last. With music like "Marôuf" at the Opera House and the symphonic poem which we heard yesterday in the concert room, we must needs give as large a meed of our admiration to M. Rabaud the composer as to M. Rabaud the conductor. A larger meed, indeed, for his creative imagination seems capable of loftier and more sustained flights than his reproductive fancy. The "Nocturnal Procession" is a profoundly beautiful piece of music. With it M. Rabaud challenged comparison with Liszt, who in the first of his two "Episodes from Lenan's 'Faust'" treated the same subject. The French composer will never have need to regret the challenge. Even the greatest devotees of Liszt among our conductors have systematically passed his "Nächtlicher Zug" by and contented themselves with its companion, the so-called "Mephisto Waltz." Yet the episode in Lenan's "Faust" fragment holds out beseeching hands to music. The poem is alternately epic and dramatical, and the scene which M. Rabaud has delineated is in the first category. It pictures Faust, Goethe's yearning, inquiring, knowledge-hungry philosopher, but tainted with the melancholy which wrecked the poet's mind, lost—brooding in the depths of a wood through which breathe the odors of a Spring night. Suddenly his attention is arrested by flickering flashes and the sounds of song. Illuminated by the light of torches a procession passes by: white-robed children carrying wreaths of flowers, black-robed nuns, venerable monks bearing crucifixes. It is St. John's Eve and all chant a pious canticle as they move solemnly along the forest road. They pass out of sight and hearing, and Faust, crushed by the mingled voices of dawning life and approaching death, buries his face in the mane of his horse and weeps the bitterest tears he has ever wept. Here is matter for the musical psychologist and the painter of words as well as pictures. Very deeply indeed does M. Rabaud seem to have penetrated into the heart of the poem. Introspective is all the music, even the song in which childish trebles and grave basses are blended in what is apparently the Gregorian melody of a "Kyrie eleison." It is not alone chant and march of pious worshippers passing through the night which we hear. We hear also the vocal pulsations of a doubt-racked soul. Solemn beauty dwells in this music—solemn beauty and deep pathos. The audience yesterday honored itself in testifying to its appreciation of its value by round after round of applause.

Ravel's "Rhapsodie espagnole" was not wholly a novelty—i. e., not a novelty to all who heard it. It was yet quite fresh from its composer's fancy when Mr. Walter Damrosch brought it forward at a concert of the Symphony Society in the New Theatre on November 21, 1909, a week after it had had its first performance on this side of the Atlantic in Chicago. It is an amazing study in orchestration and also in rhythmical and harmonic effects. It is not an evocation of the spirit of Spanish music like the familiar examples of Chabrier, Glinka, Tschaikoffsky, Bizet and Massenet.

Their pieces are palpable—things of musical flesh and blood and bone and muscle. Ravel's rhapsodic suite is a sort of aural mirage, in which elements of Spanish music, fragmentary, elusive, distorted by a light that never was on sea or land, float about in a haze shot through with iridescent lights. It is not like Dr. Norman McLeod's musical picture of Spain: "A hot night disturbed by a guitar." It is a flocculent, fleeting fancy, a musical poet's dream of Spain. Spanish life in nuce: the Spain of the Cid and of the slums; of Moorish glory and modern misery; of dancing and delving. But of little joy.

The Beethoven overture was marvellously played. One could feel the tense grasp which it held on the conductor's heartstrings and which he passed on to the players in the band. No one stopped to inquire into the source of its beauty and power. No one needed to. It spoke with a voice that thrilled.

HERALD
New York City
JAN 2 1919

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS MR. RABAUD'S SYMPHONIC POEM AND RAVEL'S SUITE

"La Procession Nocturne," by French Conductor, Heard Here for the First Time at Yesterday's Concert—"Rhapsodie Espagnol" Admirably Rendered.

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

I am frank to say that I found the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Henri Rabaud at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon more sympathetic, more atmospheric, more interesting and, on the whole, more admirably orchestral than that of Thursday night.

I also must confess to a certain degree of surprise that any composer who could express himself so mystically, so poetically and with such artistic appreciation of sentiment and surroundings as Mr. Rabaud did in his own composition, played in New York, so far as I know, for the first time, should have read Schumann so dryly and unemotionally.

Schumann's D minor Symphony, now known as No. 4, op. 120, was originally composed immediately after his first symphony in B flat major, in 1841. Not satisfied with his work, Schumann revised the symphony in 1851, when, two other symphonies having been composed between these dates, it became No. 4 instead of No. 2. Played according to the composer's wish, without pauses between the movements, this symphony contains not a little that is new in symphonic form and development, and while a little dry in melodic material in the first movement, in the Romanza, Scherzo and Finale, gives us much that is romantic in true Schumann fashion, much that is strongly rhythmic and forceful in the Scherzo and several new symphonic developments in the way of unexpected themes at unexpected moments in the Finale—the whole forming a work which, if not as melodic as some others of the great master's compositions, symphonic or otherwise, is unusually well made, thematically interesting and orchestrally more carefully worked out than is usual with this composer. There was plenty of force, plenty of rhythm and varied color in Mr. Rabaud's reading of the work, to which the orchestra at all times responded competently. Yet, I found the real Schumann spirit of romance decidedly lacking, and I felt inclined to agree with a friend of mine who said that he has never heard anything dryer out of a woodbox.

Mr. Rabaud's Symphonic Poem.

Mr. Rabaud's symphonic poem, "Procession Nocturne" (after Lenau), of which the last previous performance in America was given at San Francisco by the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra under Alfred Hertz in November, 1918, struck me as having been inspired under the influence of "Parsifal" and developed under that of Cesar Franck. It is definitely and poetically atmospheric, mystical in thought and treatment, and largely illustrative of the poem which represents Faust in a darksome wood watching a solemn procession on St. John's Eve of multitudes of children and virgins with crowns in their hands, each bearing a cross upon their shoulder, passing by his leafy retreat.

I confess I did not hear the children's voices; I confess that the procession, as musically interpreted, struck me as shadowy, elusive and indeterminate. And yet one can hardly quarrel with an artist's poetic interpretation of any poetic incident, and while not convincingly impressive, the work undoubtedly possessed and expressed poetic feeling, mystic charm and a certain vague sentiment of the aetherial and the unknown which had individual charm and pictorial effect. The sweetness and slight of Mr. Rabaud's personality shone out beyond question in these measures, and the applause which greeted the work showed that his artistic intent was not lost on the audience.

Had the name of Ravel not been signed to the following "Rhapsodie Espagnole," which is an orchestra suite in four movements—Prelude a la Nuit, Malaguena, Habanera, Feria (the Fair)—I should have said that it was Debussy; for the work breathed forth all his characteristic harmonic fancies, suggested rather than expressed atmospheric color, and very fragile, exquisite and recondite melodic thought, with always appropriate, very precious and unwonted orchestral illustration.

Attractive Work Seldom Heard.

I am surprised that this most interesting and attractive work has not appeared more frequently on recent concert programmes here and elsewhere. It was admirably played by the orchestra yesterday, and I noticed particularly Mr. Fradkin's interesting treatment of the small solo passages. Mr. Rabaud gave the necesary picturesqueness, color and variety of phrase and nuance in his reading, and I found it altogether fragrant, suggestive and delightful.

After the somewhat highly scented atmosphere of this subtle and super-personal composition of Ravel's, Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3 came nobly, like a broad, fresh wind from the mountains, breathing of great spaces and lofty aspirations, the convincing voice of the highest and broadest artistic inspiration. Barring some slight uncertainties in the woodwind and an occasional over insistence of trumpets, the work was interpreted by Mr. Rabaud and played by the orchestra with a breadth and certainty of interpretation of the real romantic and highly dramatic feeling of this great overture which impressed me mightily. I have seldom heard a finer and more satisfying performance of this noble work.

In view of the present discussion about Wagner, it may be noted that Mr. Rabaud included both Beethoven and Brahms on his great German classical masters, while for evident reasons still withholding Wagner.

n POST
ress: Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

"Mystic Trumpeter," Work of Massachusetts Man, Well Received.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, gave its third concert of this season yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, with the charming violinist, Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra, as soloist. The orchestra played but two numbers, opening with D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, opus 12, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, and closing with "The Mystic Trumpeter," an orchestral fantasy, by Frederick Shepherd Converse, of Massachusetts, written after the poem of Walt Whitman.

The Boston Orchestra, formerly known for its perfection of tone and ensemble, has awakened to something more, and plays with spirit as well as poetic expression and finish. They have, however, lost some little of the mellow tone in the first violins. The two numbers of the orchestra were slightly marred to many in the large audience, owing to a few thoughtless persons going to their seats while the number was in progress, and in the last number by that same class of persons, who did not remain to the end.

"The Mystic Trumpeter" is an unusual composition, embued with "atmosphere" both mystic and fantastic. It is written in five sections, connected so as to make it all one. Mr. Converse is a young American composer, still in his forties. It is refreshing to have American music on symphony programs, and although this composition seemed a bit long at the end of a program, it was enthusiastically received.

Mr. Fradkin, not entirely a stranger to a Washington audience, although this is his first season with the Boston Symphony, made a pronounced success, and was recognized before he completed the beautiful Mendelssohn concerto in E minor, opus 64, that he is a player of much talent and ability. He has a clean, sparkling technic and a fresh, clear, pure tone, of warmth and color, and plays with finish and much brilliance. A pleasant feature of his playing is his great refinement of style. His tempo in the last movement of the concerto was a whirling one, and the greater part of the time the orchestra failed to keep up with it perfectly. K. B.

TIMES
s: New York City
JAN 12 1919

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

A Boston Symphony Matinee.

The matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday at Carnegie Hall was more interesting than the Thursday evening concert, principally because the program contained less of warmed-over Wagner, also because the band played with more "ginger," alias temperament. Mr. Rabaud placed Beethoven's third Leonore overture at the end of his musical scheme, possibly fearing that the mighty utterance of Beethoven would annul lesser voices; which was rather modest of the composer of "Marouf," as he had a number of his own on the program; but, then, Mr. Rabaud is a modest man, and one that outwardly does not resemble in the least his compositions, although he conducts as he looks, academically. Schumann's fourth Symphony in D minor (the second in the order of composing) was indifferently read, indifferently played. It contains lovely music, lyric, poetic, suave, even Mendelssohnian; yet it has flashes of fire, if not fury, and not a spark was there in evidence. Technically there was a lack of co-ordination in massed attack. Inspiring the conductor was not. He redeemed himself in the Beethoven overture, which had some excellent moments, particularly the last half.

We have often wondered why sundry writers on music have accused Brahms of "muddy orchestration" when Robert Schumann was the real offender. This same D minor symphony is more suite than symphony; the ideas are gracious, are picturesque, and cry for the happy labels he gave his piano music. The Romanza—what a wonderful picture it makes, with its veiled melancholy, surely Keltic or Slavic, and what a title Schumann must have had for it. But he was timid in larger forms as he was bold in smaller: the songs, the piano literature. Not precisely muddy, rather lustreless, he is in his orchestration, and it thereby suffers. But music hot from the heart, all of it.

An agreeable novelty was from the pen of Rabaud, an early composition, opus 6, dating back to 1899. Entitled "La Procession Nocturne," it is a symphonic poem based on the verse of the pessimistic Hungarian poet, Nicolaus Lenau, (1802-1850.) The mood is a dark one. Faust in a wild wood at midnight watches a procession of children carrying torches. Veiled virgins pass. They solemnly intone. His weary heart is touched by this apparition of the Spring of Life. The procession vanishes. Faust is alone. He weeps. The composer depicts the two moods: profound disillusionment and hopeless yearning. As he is in a forest after dark, he naturally enough appropriates the Siegfried wood-weaving and idyll, as Mr. Henderson, in a memorable epigram, once remarked of Baron Franchetti and his opera "Azrael," (1890.) The contrasting mood-picture is in the mode ecclesiastic. Brass and woodwind are skillfully juxtaposed; strophie and antistrophie; responses antiphonal. The muted despair returns, and with hardly a fortissimo climax the piece closes.

Not original, it is yet sincere music-making because of the wholly admirable blending of matter and manner, ideas and their instrumental garb. Rabaud, need we tell any one who has heard "Marouf," is a master of the orchestral palette. The mood tone is preserved out "La Procession Nocturne," we mean the texture which is woven in accordance with the sentiment. Mr. Brownell has said in one of his early volumes on French art that the artist in France, whether painter, poet, sculptor, or composer, has before him certain methods for the treatment of any subject. He does not consider them as arbitrary, but as standards of taste, of throughout "La Procession Nocturne." We mean the texture which is woven in accordance with the sentiment. Mr judgment; the genius of French art is taste incarnate. Mr. Rabaud is eminently Gallic in this quality. His music is worth listening to if only for the appeal to the ear. There are other things, of course. The symphonic poem was well received by a large gathering.

It was followed by Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnol," and curiously enough we were shown—we say shown advisedly, for this Frenchman aims at the optical nerve in his musical visualizations—another nocturnal picture, a "prélude à la nuit. What a difference! Faust torn by doubts, the moodiest of dreamers, weeps as innocence sheds a white radiance on his shadowed soul. Ravel overhears the noises and rustling things in a Spanish night, grotesque, alluring, monotonous and mediocre. The starlight is remote, and the deadly castanet next door. Soon the Malaguena is sounded, the Habanera, and the transition to the Fair and its vulgar, vivid, glaring bustle is easy. However, it is all more individual, more masterly than the Rabaud music. Also more subtle; the prickly pear and the pimento are not absent. Music for the nerves, not the imagination; in Beethoven's "Lenore" there is every attribute of the brain and soul transfused in a noble synthesis. He does not amuse, astonish, assault the senses like these new young chaps; he is the captain of our soul lighting it to imagination's heights on the pinions of his immortal song

The Boston Orchestra, with the aforesaid exception in the Schumann symphony, demonstrated the careful technical drill of Mr. Rabaud. Its playing was both brilliant and eloquent.

AMERICAN
New York City.

RABAUD CONDUCTS AGAIN.

In a concert distinctly more enlivening than the one of Thursday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's excellent new conductor, Henri Rabaud, came forward yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall not only as a wielder of the baton but also as composer. The work of his making heard on this occasion was a symphonic poem, after Lenau's "Faust," entitled "La Procession Nocturne." It was preceded on the programme by Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, opus 120, and followed by Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole," with Beethoven's "Lenore" No 3 overture as a fitting climax.

When "La Procession Nocturne" had its first performance at a Colonne Concert in Paris in 1899 (was it not on January 8 instead of on January 15, as announced in Phillip Hale's programme notes?) it excited the immediate interest of critics. The work is, indeed, especially remarkable if one bears in mind that it marks the earliest effort of the composer.

Original the score cannot be called. Faust peeking through the bosky thickets at the solemn procession reminds one of Siegfried, when he first gazes on the sleeping Bruennhilde at the break of day. However, Monsieur Rabaud's themes, if they do have the Wagnerian cut, are expressive and well characterized, and the composition as a whole is not only clearly and firmly wrought but finely orchestrated.

Rabaud gives a well-defined and poetically suggestive exposition of the Lenau poem. The grief of Faust is movingly set forth in the sombre introduction and conclusion. In the middle part we hear the chanting of the pilgrims, as they approach in a crescendo and depart in diminuendo, voiced in ecclesiastic octaves by the wood-wind.

In this and in the fascinating Ravel music the orchestra was heard to decidedly better advantage than in the Schumann symphony and the Beethoven overture. In the former number, in fact, there was some ragged playing, especially among the violins in the trio of the Scherzo, in spite of Monsieur Rabaud's energetic efforts to keep his men in hand.

Of the "Lenore No. 3 Overture" the conductor gave a satisfactory reading along well established lines, although his tempi were somewhat faster than some of his predecessors'. But it was by no means as brilliant and dramatically gripping an interpretation as we have heard in the Metropolitan Opera House under the leadership of Artur Bodanzky.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 7 1919

ractive chorus.

RABAUD'S FINE ART

Conductor of Boston Orchestra Wins Favor—Fradkin's Playing.

The splendid impression made by Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his first appearance here, was renewed in the program conducted last night by him at the Academy of Music.

The orchestral tone is fuller, richer and more resonant than in former seasons, while musically the leadership of Rabaud cannot fail to bring the achievements of the orchestra to an even higher plane than that occupied heretofore. His conducting is marked by great vigor and vitality. It is not the type of power that results in over-strenuous tone, but, rather, in a very live, fresh tone and one susceptible of great variation. Another feature of the Rabaud direction is the tremendous speed he attains, although he never sacrifices clarity to that end, but creates a dazzling brilliancy with his dashing style. His Schumann D minor Symphony was quite a different reading from those generally heard. The first movement, revealing the richness and power of the orchestra, was done so brilliantly that it lost all the thinness of orchestration usually too noticeable and became a vigorous, vital work that dazzled while it charmed.

A more beautiful and poetic Romanza it would be impossible to conjure, while the subtlety and grace of the Scherzo were truly Schumannesque.

If Rabaud likes to lead his orchestra a fast pace, he has a concertmeister who can outdistance in fleetness anyone who ever attempted to play the Mendelssohn E minor Concerto. Frederic Fradkin, new as a concertmeister as well as a soloist, made a great impression, and one that was rather a surprise. Occupying his chair during the symphony and doing some notably beautiful rhythmic work in the scherzo, he stepped forth a stranger and ended a firm friend of all who enjoy really fine violin playing coupled with an entire absence of pose. He was delightfully ingenuous and engaging, and revealed himself, artistically, as the peer of any of the well-known players. The great charm of his playing lies in a rather delicate, sweet tone, fine style and a technique that can grow to such spread that it fairly flies. The final movement of the concerto, with its intricate staccato passages, was a dream of light, fairylike playing. Fradkin was given an overwhelming reception, and he will always be sure of an eager audience in Philadelphia.

The novelty of the evening was Raboud's symphonic poem "La Procession Nocturne," inspired by Lenau's "Faust" poem. While it was a perfect picture and contained a great deal of beauty of theme and form, it was a rather dull offering and did not present the composer at his best.

The Berlioz "King Lear" overture was added to a program already too long, although it was enjoyed by the audience. Rabaud has proven himself a fine musician and conductor, and doubtless his following will soon grow to the proportions enjoyed formerly by the Boston Orchestra.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The third Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night. Henri Rabaud, the organization's new conductor, reinforced the very favorable impression created by him last month, and was again accorded whole-hearted demonstrations of applause. Under his scintillant baton, the playing of this famous orchestra is regaining, with rapid strides, that superiority of tone quality and perfection of ensemble that have long distinguished their performance. M. Rabaud is authoritative; his beat is well marked, decisive and elastic as required, and he furthermore possesses a personality that dominates the situation. at all times.

By the arrangement of last night's programme the hearer had an opportunity of noting the progress in the art and science of orchestration during the past half-century. The two purely instrumental numbers heard were Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony and Maurice Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole.' The former was composed in 1868, the latter in 1907. Despite the wide interval of time between the creation of these two works there is nevertheless a notable resemblance between their respective content. Both touch on the exotic side, to the exclusion of the spiritual, the appeal of each relying on a purely physical basis. The "Antar" symphony is old-fashioned, everything comes out too clearly, it is absolutely barren of intellectual details (such as the contrapuntal figurations, manipulations and counter melodies as are met in the symphonies of Brahms). At the period of composition Rimsky-Korsakoff's orchestral combinations no doubt seemed remarkable, and his harmonies, even at this day, still bear that stamp of melancholic charm peculiar to the Russian musical mind. "Antar" should properly be called a suite. It is no more symphonic than is a grape fruit.

There is no community of theme between the separate movements, the composer rather contenting himself with the bodily reintroduction of the Antar theme itself in the different sections of his work. As a whole, it is far inferior to its composer's masterpiece, "Scherezade."

Ravel's "Rapsodie." is a twentieth century musical expression. Its scoring utilizes every modern function of the orchestra from piccolo to sarrusophone, from kettledrums to cymbals, triangle to tambourine and castanets, gong to xylophone, and celesta to two harps. This huge instrumental apparatus is governed by Ravel for the purpose of delineating in tone the colorful gayety and passionate abandon of the Spanish malaguena and habanera (dance forms both), and the picturization of carnival scenes. It is impressionistic to a high degree, dazzling, bewildering. Like Debussy, Ravel interweaves short motives and themes, is a disciple of the whole tone scale theory, indulges in free use of chromatics and unexpected modulations. Ravel lacks Debussy's mastery, however. There is not, in his work, the same grand conception or authenticity of mood. This "Rapsodie," at its best, is but a weak copy of the greater Frenchman's "Iberia." Both put one in mind of the fleecy canvases of Zuloaga. The more one hears of Ravel, the more one marvels over Debussy.

Last night's soloist was Frederic Fradkin, youthful concert master of the orchestra. His offering was Mendelssohn's violin concerto, thankfully placed between the two other numbers, as exemplifying the virtues of lucid classical form and melodic beauty. Mr. Fradkin's performance was interesting; he plays with command and authorativeness. Possesses a smooth facility of technic, clear and true intonation, and is, withal, very scholarly in interpretation. His elucidation of the opening movement was masterly, but in the "Andante con moto" movement there was an absence of the luscious tone so requisite to its best expression. The finale, while brilliantly played, was nevertheless taken as too rapid a tempo, thereby sacrificing some of the formal structural figurework and patterns, also original bowings. These latter were replaced by the substitution of the player's own, which fell short in gracefulness and desired effect. Mr. Fradkin was supported by an admirable accompaniment. Orchestra and soloist played as one man.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
JAN 10 1919

BOSTON BAND PLAYS D'INDY TRILOGY

"Wallenstein" Leads Program of Unfamiliar Music at Carnegie Hall Concert.

The new viewpoint at the conductor's desk of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, represented by Henri Rabaud, was dully distinguishable in the music selected for performance last evening in Carnegie Hall. A program such as this, if presented some few years since, would have uplifted some eyebrows, not so much because of its unteutonism (as a fact, it very largely reflected the spirit of Schiller, Schumann and Wagner), but because of its very miscellaneous trivialities.

One sought in vain for any unity of collective purpose or disparate contrast. It was all a helter-skelter of didactic, if unfamiliar, music, put together, seemingly, on much the same theory that the small boy employs for filling his pockets. Mr. Rabaud led off with Vincent d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," followed this with Frederic S. Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," and then proceeded to a sixteenth century suite arranged by the conductor himself from a Virginal of the time of Queen Elizabeth. Berlioz's overture, "King Lear," concluded the evening.

The "Wallenstein" pieces—one of which, "Wallenstein's Camp," recently played here by the orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire, appears to be a favorite with the French routiniers—are youthful d'Indy. They reveal him very strongly under the influence of Teutonic romanticism. The loves of the Piccolomini, Max and Thekla, and Wallenstein's tragic end are bas's for the other two portions of the trilogy, all of which, in one evening, impose on the auditor a somewhat strained tribute to the musically grown up d'Indy. But Mr. Rabaud and his men played this infiltration of Schumann and Wagner with devotion and certainly with enjoyment. One admired the one and subscribed mildly to the other.

Mature Converse proved considerably less interesting than immature d'Indy. The American's "Mystic Trumpeter' is also literary in its inspiration, stemming from Walt Whitman, the good, gray bourgeois, and the music, like its parent, has the bourgeois aspect stamped upon it, heroics seen through the prism of the commonplace.

Mr. Converse, indeed, has that apparently inalienable quality of the New England school, a dullness somnolent, deadly and huge. Poor Whitman, with his commonplace and hackneyed phrases, his sputtering and breathless agitation and his literary ignorance of music (summed up here in an inability to distinguish a trumpet from a cornet) at least was poet enough to create a mood. Mr. Converse translated him into maundering orchestral tone that outdid his failings and left his inspiration undone.

After this one expected a rift in the pall from Mr. Rabaud's resurrection of the seventeenth century music. The encyclopedic Philip Hale presented the history of these four tunes in his program notes. They have been gathered from the so-called Fitzwilliam Virginal Book of the Elizabethan era, and two of them are ascribed to Giles Farnaby, these being decidedly the best of the four. But none of them is more than a trifle and even in their continent orchestral dress they led one to the conviction that routine existed also in good Queen Bess's time.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.

TIMES
New York City
JAN 10 19

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

Two Orchestral Concerts.

New York enjoyed two orchestral concerts of artistic magnitude yesterday afternoon and evening at Carnegie Hall. Our own Symphony Society repeated the splendid program it presented last Saturday evening at the matinée: Tschaikovsky's ripest symphony, his fifth, the Euryanthe overture, Weber, some subtle harmonic trifles by Maurice of the Ravel tribe, and the E flat concerto of Liszt, with giant Josef Hofmann at the keyboard. With his accustomed sense of the fitness of things, Mr. Walter Damrosch played the sublime funeral march from the Heroic Symphony of Beethoven in memory of Theodore Roosevelt, a fitting tribute to the manes of a heroic man. The musical taste of Mr. Roosevelt was cultivated and he also loved a good old-fashioned tune, wnether hymn or reel. He once told us that the last act full of fireworks of the Valkyrs always affected him as the most grandiose vision in all opera; he also entertained a profound reverence for Beethoven, but for latter-day composers he had little patience.

"I am not a man of the pavements," he wrote us in 1915, and his simple open-air soul couldn't abide the tortured tonalities and tortuous weavings of the new men in music. Some day a book should be written about Theodore Roosevelt as lover of the seven arts, and it would open the eyes of those who knew him only as a statesman, soldier, and naturalist. His versatility was astounding and his judgments not always rash. Consider his introduction to the poetical works of George Cabot Lodge, a young man of genius, gone before he had matured, a son of Senator Henry Cabot Lodge. We heartily commend Mr. Damrosch's pious and artistic commemoration of a truly great American and one of the few whose greatness was not political pinchbeck. We hope other orchestral conductors will do likewise.

The Boston Symphony.

In the evening Mr. Henri Rabaud played an interesting program, which consisted of Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein's Trilogy," Opus 12, (after the dramatic poem of Schiller); "The Mystic Trumpeter," orchestral fantasy by Frederick Shepherd Converse, (after the poem by Walt Whitman); a Suite of the sixteenth century, by Farnaby and anonymous English composers, arranged by Henri Rabaud, and the overture to "King Lear," by Berlioz; altogether an unusual collocation, yet none the less diverting. The D'Indy music is beginning to date. It was "modern" years ago. It is no longer. The composer's "Istar" is of finer fibre and fabric; it is also a later work than the Trilogy, which was begun in 1873, and first heard here in 1888 at Steinway Hall, under the baton of Anton Seidl, who probably produced it because of its Wagnerisms. There are many.

In his program notes Philip Hale tells us Mr. Rabaud arranged three orchestral suites for the incidental music to "The Merchant of Venice," (at the Theatre Antoine, Paris, 1916-17, Lucien Népoly's version). The stage music was found in Fitzwilliam's Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth, (who always harped on her Virginal;) "one of several MS. collections of clavier and arrangements for the clavier which were brought together in Elizabethan times. Mr. Rabaud has orchestrated the Suites for concert use, using instruments that are not anachronistic." It was the third Suite that was given on this occasion; it is in five movements.

"The Mystic Trumpeter" was first heard here at Carnegie Hall on April 2, 1906. The composer is a Massachusetts man, and despite his New England blood there is not ink ice-water in his score. Indeed, as music it is artistically superior to the music of the Camden poet, whose centenary we are to celebrate next May. However, the Whitmaniacs will demur at this assertion, so we withdraw it—temporarily; but what will the Wagnerites say? The mixture of Whitman and Wagner is about half and half, not forgetting a dash of the other Richard—Strauss is his last name. Mr. Converse is a master of his material. His orchestral hues are gorgeous. But the hands are the hands of Converse and the voice is the voice of Richard I. of Baireuth.

The old English Suite was charming as Mr. Rabaud knows the secret of orchestral coloring. The tunes were jolly and sweet and melancholy, and they did not suggest in the least their archaic origin, owing to the rich, even exotic, scoring; the Andante was a possible exception, yet the strings were too luscious, even lascivious, in quality for the quaint message they conveyed. And then came a blast from Berlioz, and all these Jerry-built musical walls of Jericho crumbled. The master spoke!

EVENING
New York City
NVI

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When Dr. Muck was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there was much growling at his programmes, which often lacked plan and contrast. It is to be hoped that his successor, M. Rabaud, will prove more satisfactory in that respect, and there is reason to think he will. But last night's programme for the second evening concert of the Boston organization was not a model. There should be on every programme at least one acknowledged masterwork, but on this occasion there was none. Berlioz's "King Lear" overture, which closed the list, is one of his weakest works, while D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, which opened it, is utterly uninspired, and even the splendid performance M. Rabaud insured it could make it interesting in spots only. Apart from the weakness of its thematic raw material it suffers from belonging to the kind of programme music which can only be followed by perusing an analysis of it while the music is reeled off, and even then only with difficulty. Vincent d'Indy is a great musical scholar, but he is not a genius in any of his works, least of all in the early ones. The best thing about the trilogy is the orchestration.

A detail which attracts one's attention is that the score calls for eight harps (three were used last night), thus exceeding the number called for in the rainbow scene in "Rhinegold"; but whereas Wagner with his six harps, playing each its own part, produces iridescent effects of ethereal splendor, D'Indy's intentions, so far as results go, might have been achieved with a guitar or two.

The Wallenstein trilogy was not a novelty here; nor was the second number on the programme, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Frederick Shepherd Converse, composed on Walt Whitman's poem. This, too, is programme music of the wrong kind (the right kind is exemplified by Liszt's "Tasso" and "Mazeppa," or the "Danse Macabre" and "Phaeton" of Saint-Saëns, which need no elaborate guide, but only a brief hint as to the story). Mr. Converse's thematic raw material also is weak; but his orchestral painting is singularly attractive even in these coloristic days.

The most entertaining number on the programme was a suite of sixteenth-century pieces arranged by M. Rabaud himself from music found in a virginal book of Queen Elizabeth. These were first used in connection with a French version of "The Merchant of Venice" produced in Paris in 1916-17. Two of them are by Giles Farnaby; the others, anonymous. In arranging them, M. Rabaud succeeded in giving them a modern dress without altering their archaic spirit. It is for achievements like that that Henri Rabaud has recently been elected a member of L'Institut de France—the highest honor that can be conferred on a French musician.

EVENING VORLD
New York City
JAN 10 1919

Rabaud Leads Boston Players In Novel Works

By Sylvester Rawling.

HENRI RABAUD, the new French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is no slave to convention. The programme he presented at Carnegie Hall last night was refreshing as well as novel. But it was more than that. It compelled respect by its worth. It began with D'Indy's "Wallenstein," a trilogy based upon Schiller's poem, an ingenious and skilfully orchestrated work that falls short of genius, but is always interesting. The first movement deals with Wallenstein's camp, the second with Max and Thelka (the Piccolomini), the best of the three, and the last with the death of Wallenstein.

After that came our own Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," an orchestral fantasy based upon the poem by Walt Whitman, an interesting as well as a scholarly composition. Next there was an English suite of the sixteenth century by Farnaby and anonymous English composers, arranged by Mr. Rabaud from music found in a virginal book of Queen Elizabeth. A bit too modernly, sophisticated, perhaps, Mr. Rabaud made it, but it breathed of healthy country life, joyous, happy, free and tuneful, calling up memories of Purcell and the Morris dances.

At the end there was Berlioz's "King Lear" overture, not often heard nowadays.

Mr. Rabaud's individuality and effective mannerisms as a conductor were more apparent than at his first appearance.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT MAKES AUDIENCE APATHETIC

Soloist Mediocre and Schumann's Composition Needed Embellishment of Something More Substantial—Fradkin Listless Leader. M. Rabaud Only Redeemng Feature of Dull Program.

PROGRAM.

Shumann,
Symphonny No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120
I. Andante; Allegro.
II. Romanza.
III. Scherzo.
IV. Largo; Finale.
Played without pause.

Mendelssohn,
Concerto for Violin in E minor, Op. 64
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace.

Rabaur ..... "La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau)
Belioz ..... Overture, "King Lear," Op. 4
Soloist, Frederic Fradkin.

The third of the season's Boston Cymphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy last evening was dully planned and listlessly executed. A tiresome symphony and a mediocre soloist plunged the audience into a state of apathy from which M. Rabaud's own symphonic poem and the deft "King Lear" overture of Berlioz failed to arouse it.

In these days Schumann's D minor symphony is not strong enough meat for a musical feast. At least it needs to be surrounded with the spice and novelty of more substantial fare. To serve the Mendelssohn E minor concerto after it, is quite fatal to the digestion. So much flimsy sweetness must glut and cloy.

The concertmeister, Mr. Frederic Fradkin, made the concerto sound more tricky and insipid than it really is. He is possessed—like so many of his craft—with a facile technique, but little else. His tons is hard and tends to flatness. His phrasing is utterly commonplace.

M. Rabaud was most interesting in his reading of his own composition. Here the orchestral voices sang their truest and with the old perfect precision for which the Boston Symphony has been renowned. The climax of the poem was especially eloquent and emotionally broad. It was applauded with full appreciation.

The next Boston Symphony concert will be given on Wednesday evening, February 5.

B. F. G.

EVENING TELEGRAM
Philadelphia, Pa.
1919

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN THIRD CONCERT

Shows at Its Best in Rabaud's Own Composition; Concertmeister Fradkin the Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening before a large audience. It was the second of the series which Mr. Rabaud has conducted, and in it much was done to counteract the very favorable impression he produced at the preceding concert.

The concert opened with the Schumann Symphony No. 4, in D minor. It was rendered carelessly throughout, especially in its rhythm and in its dynamics, in strong contrast to the performance of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony a month ago, which was done beautifully in both these respects. The allegro following the introduction and the finale were taken at a speed which made clear intonation difficult and seriously impaired, if it did not utterly destroy, the poetic content of the work. Dynamically, the string parts, especially the first violins and the brass, were much too loud, completely obscuring throughout the work, the very important and beautiful middle voices. Orchestral detail seemed to be almost entirely lacking, or rather, indistinguishable. Rhythmically, the first violins were the chief offenders, as they seldom played their figures exactly together, a very important matter in themes so agitated and broken as the main ones of this symphony.

It is true that this work has comparatively little in the way of soft voicing or sustained tones, but last evening there was virtually none. The solo violin part in the romance was all but completely lost in the volume of tone from the rest of the orchestra, the pizzicato of the strings was hard and snappy, and the peculiar rhythmic character in the trio of the scherzo could hardly be distinguished, except at the close of the phrases. The entire work left the extraordinary impression for a concert of a really fine orchestra, that it had been insufficiently rehearsed.

The second number was the Mendelssohn Concerto for violin, played by the concertmeister of the orchestra, Mr. Frederick Fradkin. He showed a finished left-hand technique, excellent intonation and a tone of pleasing quality, though not large, but much of his fine technical playing was nullified by a seemingly uncontrollable inclination to run away from his accompaniment. The same lack of rhythmic unity that was heard in the symphony was apparent in the concerto, notably in the first and the last movements, where at times the soloist was a full half beat ahead of the orchestra. The whole concerto was taken at a very high rate of speed and the total impression of the work was that Mr. Fradkin was executing a tour de force of technical achievement rather than artistically interpreting a masterpiece of violin composition.

It was in Mr. Rabaud's own work, "La Procession Nocturne," that the orchestra showed, for the first time of the concert, the work of which it is really capable, in perfection of rhythm, tune, dynamic control and reserve. The composition is an early one and sustains the good opinion of Mr. Rabaud's ability as a composer that was formed here by his E minor symphony and the opera "Marouf."

As in both of these works, it shows that he is a master of the modern orchestra, that he is not afraid to write a coherent melody, and that on the whole he finds the harmonic scheme of the classical masters sufficient to express his musical thoughts. It is program music in every sense and follows with fidelity and sympathy the poem of Lenau, upon which it is based. If there be found in the music a certain monotony in tempo and darkness, both of thought and orchestration, it must be remembered that both of these characteristics appear throughout the poem, and the music could not be otherwise and remain true to the text. It is an excellent work and was splendidly performed.

The concert closed with the "King Lear" overture of Berlioz, which displayed the usual characteristics of the composer, of an enormous orchestral technique expended upon ideas of a grade not too high musically and somewhat bombastic both in thought and expression. It was played with force and vigor.

EVENING SUN
New York City

Music

Third Boston Concert.

Rabaud the composer made his first New York appearance (outside the Metropolitan Opera House) in Carnegie Hall last night when Rabaud the conductor led his Boston Symphony Orchestra in a playing of a sixteenth century suite by Farnaby and anonymous Englishmen. The modernizing was made by M. Rabaud himself, principally to be included in the all-Allies' celebration of victory in Boston, but the including of it in last night's programme was apt and graceful, for more than one reason. It was an evidence of the new leader's taste in selection and skill in editing and arranging. He has succeeded in making quite the correct, and only the correct, alterations, and the delicate and woody flavor of old Elizabethan songs is retained and enhanced.

The entire programme was quite distant from that sort which used to be characteristic of the Boston Orchestra. There is neither place nor reason here for a comparison of the programmes of last year and this or of the conducting afforded each of them. Mr. Rabaud is not and obviously does not wish to be an aggressive, steel fingered, strictly disciplining leader. Yet his beat is clear and strong, and summons as noble effects from the orchestra as Mr. Muck did. And in a more aristocratic, if not Napoleonic, manner.

The evening began with the "Wallenstein" trilogy of Vincent d'Indy. It is only of late, when we are being relieved of the eternal "Istar" variations and are listening to such works as the Mountaineer's Horn symphony and this programmatic trilogy, that d'Indy is having his just hearing in New York. "Wallenstein" could not help but follow Schiller, perforce; the movements take their names directly from the three plays, and the themes, though they never rise to a gross violence, are rife with siege, with intrigue, bitter love and bitterer tragedy to turn the poet's pages and illumine them with rare musical imagination.

Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter" (the first piece by an American which Mr. Rabaud has played here) would tax the musicianship of heaven's own band. The Bostonians were equal to its involved rigors, none the less, and gave it a playing of magnificent spiritedness. The Walt Whitman quotation upon which it is founded quite satisfactorily characterizes it; it is jumbled and rumbled and vengefully fragmentary, but against a background most often Wagnerian the trumpet blares a moody part. In the D'Indy trilogy it was the woodwinds which predominated—with that aristocratic modulation which good woodwinds always show; in the Converse it was the brass's turn.

The evening came to a close with the tremendous "King Lear" overture of Berlioz.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON CONCERT HAS FINE WAGNER FLAVOR

Orchestra Plays With Sweep and Fire; Concertmaster Is Soloist

TONE POEM PLEASES

Wagner has come back to the symphony concert programs. He has not come back in his own name or flying his rightful colors. But one of the finest tributes ever paid the memory of the Baireuth master was offered at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert of the season at the Academy of Music last night, when Conductor Rabaud offered his own symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," as the orchestral novelty of the evening.

The symphonic poem was the third number on the program, which began with Schumann's Fourth Symphony, introduced the young concertmaster of the orchestra as soloist in the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor, opus 64, for violin and orchestra, and, after the Rabaud work, concluded with the colorful and far from tragic "King Lear" overture of Berlioz.

The Rabaud tone poem is a musical setting for the poem by Nicolaus Lenau which pictures the unhappy Faust watching a religious procession thru the foggy depths on a murky spring evening. The instrumental scoring is a feast for the ears of those who are familiar with the Wagnerian works, and this is said without a hint of implied unkindness to M. Rabaud. The opening passages are rich in the atmosphere of the second act of "Tristan," and there is even a suggestion of the love motif, ever recurring in violins and wood wind. This is followed by passages which recall vividly the chorale from "Meistersinger" as well as the third act introduction from the same work, and toward the close the music which leads up to the processional in "Lohengrin" enchants the ear with its effulgent harmonies and swelling tread. Truly, a tonal feast for all admirers of the sage of Wahnfried.

The Mendelssohn concerto is a work of monumental technical difficulties. Only a violinist of assured virtuosity should essay its swift runs, its staccato bowing, its intricate arpeggios and double stoppings with sudden changes of melodic pace. It is distinctly to the credit of young Concertmaster Fradkin that he handled the work as well as he did. At the beginning his tone was far from robust, and, indeed, proved somewhat uneven throughout. But there were intervals of fine lyric quality, when his instrument sang with dulcet sweetness, and if his tone was not always full he fulfilled the technical requirements at all points.

The pleasing impression created by Mr. Rabaud on his first visit here a month ago was materially enhanced last night. His sincere and unaffected personality manifestly gets the utmost response from his men, and the fire and sweep with which they played the symphony revealed at the outset the great strides they have made in ease and precision of attack. The success of the concert was due in large measure to the fine spirit maintained by conductor and musicians.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THIRD CONCERT

With Rabaud and Fradkin, New Work Presented With Concertmaster as Soloist

Henri Rabaud, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Frederic Fradkin the concertmaster of the reorganized body, added materially to the pleasure of the program of the third concert of the orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, the one through the interpretation of his symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," and the other by his blithe and spirited reading of the Mendelssohn concerto for the violin in E minor. M. Rabaud, too, by arranging the Schumann symphony in D minor as the opening number, and as the prelude to the concerto, kept things of the same genre together, as it were, and, in a way, followed the same scheme, in that his own composition, so reflective of the French school twenty years ago, preceded the ever-familiar, if somewhat operatic overture to "King Lear," by Berlioz. Indeed, while the Berlioz music wears well after eighty-seven years, and on it rests so much that is modern in all the schools, it is quite evident that he saw the tragedy very much as if it had been "libretticized" for him by any one of the Gallischacks who "did that sort of thing." However, it has its place, and if the pace and dynamics were as varied or as swift as the other occasion, in time the conductor and the orchestra will get at the old swing and the old fury in the climaxes.

As for Fradkin, he is distinctly a real addition to the soloist group. Sure of himself, free and flexible and spontaneous in his bowing, with a delightful singing tone and a swiftness of execution that made the final allegro a real presto, he evidently believes that art, after all, is a matter of enjoyment and not to be taken too solemnly. And it was in this engaging, easy-going mood that he read the concerto, while in the more or less melting meditative passages in the symphonic poem his luscious solo work was a factor in the general impression of a serene and lofty beauty that inhered in the work from beginning to end. For in this work M. Rabaud never sacrifices anything to mere instrumental contrast; always there is a rich background of strings or of the wood wind to carry the melody and the poetic message and the march effects; and the choral as of pilgrims and the despair of Faust were all developed in scholarly manner that told of true French grace and true French sense of beauty that is not superficial. The symphony as read hugely pleased the audience, which was quite demonstrative, and it extended its favor to the soloist too and to the new work in no uncertain manner.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 1919

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Schumann's D Minor Symphony Feature of Last Night's Programme

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert for the present season at the Academy of Music last evening, when Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor formed the salient feature of an extremely interesting programme. This is the most brilliant and probably the most generally liked of the four works by the same composer in the class to which it belongs. Compact in form, symmetrical in design and replete with an appealing melody, it is also the most skillfully and effectively orchestrated of the four symphonies which Schumann wrote, and it is characterized by a conciseness of statement and a lucidity of expression by which that author's productions are not invariably distinguished. It was played last evening under Mr. Rabaud's intelligently appreciative and sympathetic direction, with a fine fluency and fire as to its allegro movements and with an appealing eloquence in the delivery of the exquisite melody of the Romanza.

Other numbers on the list were Berlioz's grandiose overture to "King Lear" and a Symphonic Poem by Mr. Rabaud, entitled "La Procession Nocturne," based on Lenau's verses, which had not previously been heard here and which made a distinctly favorable impression. It communicates with much richness of color, poignancy of feeling and significance of the sombre and and melodious beauty, the sentiment and significance of the sombre and highly imaginative poetry to which it is related, and transforms the poet's conception of the scenes which he describes into terms of sound with a sure touch and a true insight. Its composer avoids the error of an undue literalness and attempts no more than is compatible with the medium he employs, but his music is so vital, vivid, graphic and ingratiating that no receptive hearer can be insensible to its message. It had the advantage of an admirable interpretation and the audience showed itself greatly pleased.

The assisting artist of the occasion was Mr. Frederick Fradkin, the new concert master, who exhibited a beautiful quality of tone and a well developed technique in a masterly and highly emotional performance of Mendelssohn's violin concerto in E minor, a work which, although regarded by some as out of date and old-fashioned, remains one of the most grateful and effective things ever written for the instrument which it employs. It would be hard to find a lovelier theme than the one introduced in the andante, and the whole concerto is so tuneful and spontaneous that it is difficult to acquit those who disparage it of a pedantic affectation. It was certainly much enjoyed last evening. The next of these concerts will take place on Wednesday evening, February 5.

SUN
New York City.

LUNCHEONS GIVEN FOR 2 DEBUTANTES

Mrs. Kellogg and Mrs. Pynchon Entertain at Sherry's for Their Daughters.

Two luncheons were given yesterday at Sherry's for debutantes of the season. One of them was given by Mrs. Daniel Fiske Kellogg for her daughter, Miss Victorine Lee Kellogg. The guests included Mrs. Elliott Schuyler Phillips, Mrs. Howard Gray Park and the Misses Geraldine Graham, Lucile Baldwin, Katherine Slayback, Blossom Gray, Allen Gray, Edith McCoon, Emma Pea-

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

In the evening the Boston Symphony gave the third of its Thursday concerts. The program included D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy (after the dramatic poem of Schiller); Converse's Orchestral Fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter" (inspired by Walt Whitman's poem); a suite of old English music arranged by Mr. Rabaud for orchestra and played first at a performance of Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice," at the Theater Antoine in Paris, the season of 1916-1917, and the "King Lear" Overture of Berlioz.

D'Indy's triolgy is of his youth. Stout, straightforward music, yet scarcely of the inspiration of his later efforts. In its score are many pages of rich orchestral beauty and full-throated harmonies, but has not earlier neglect in our concert halls made this music to come, as did so much of Liszt's orchestral compositions, too late? The work was admirably played under Mr. Rabaud's direction. This French conductor has well maintained the beautiful traditions of the Boston Orchestra.

Converse found fitting and apt musical expression for Whitman's poem. The composition ranks with the best America has produced, and deserves kindlier treatment from our conductors. With the memory of so many poor American compositions in mind, compositions that we have heard this year, it is a source of wonder that the present work has not received more frequent proclamation on the part of those who announce with Gabriel's trumpet that they are the champions of American music. The Berlioz is not of that unequal composer's best.

The suite of Elizabethan music [illegible] ingratiatingly on ear and imagination. Mr. Rabaud's arrangement has been that of the scholar and keen student. No instrument that could be termed anachronistic has been used in the orchestral dress.

The Boston Orchestra plays again in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, and will be at the Academy of Music in this borough this evening. The Brooklyn program includes Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Symphony, Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, in which Frederic Fradkin, the orchestra's concertmaster, will be the soloist.

TRIBUTE TO T. R. AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Regular Programme Given With Tschaikowsky's Fifth Work.

RABAUD DIRECTS MUSIC

Boston Orchestra Is Heard in Evening at Carnegie Hall

In the same hall in the evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard once more under the direction of Henri Rabaud, lately become a member of the Institute of France. The programme embraced d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, Converse's orchestral fantasy "The Mystic Trumpeter," Berlioz's "King Lear" overture and a suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from old English virginal music by Giles Farnaby and some anonymous musicians.

D'Indy's three part tone poem on ideas taken from Schiller's poem has had a comfortable rest, and perhaps it will now have another. It is by no means important music, but it has rarely sounded as virile as it did last evening when Mr. Rabaud stirred its slumbrous depths with a touch of real enthusiasm. The orchestra awoke to the call and played the composition with pious faith.

Draught From Fountain.

Mr. Converse's draught from the fountain of Walt Whitman has also enjoyed a well earned repose. Mr. Rabaud showed that he had studied the score with devotion. It is a score that "sounds," too, as the musicians say, which is another way of communicating the fact that the orchestration is well made. And there are good moments in the composition. Mr. Converse is a composer of Bostonian inspiration and he thinks earnestly.

Mr. Rabaud's roast beef of old England followed happily the Boston roast duck. Foursquare tunes and sentimental journeys along the Thames alternated in delightful sequence in this pretty suite in which again the orchestra was touched by a master hand. The Bostonians will be heard again to-morrow afternoon.

New York City.

RABAUD SYMPHONY A DELIGHT TO EAR

Poem Discloses Composer as Deft Weaver of the Subtle Mood.

IS RESTFUL AND HUMAN

Boston Orchestra Gives Concert, Showing Piquant Contrast of Styles.

The third matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon brought with it a piquant contrast of styles. Henri Rabaud, the conductor, utilized Schumann's D minor sympathy as the prelude to his own symphonic poem entitled "La Procession Nocturne," suggested by Lenau. This was succeeded by Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," and Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 overture returned the audience to the young romanticists.

This public has not now to make the acquaintance of Mr. Rabaud as a composer for his opera "Marouf" is familiar, but after yesterday's delightful revelation we suspect that there is yet much to learn about him. The symphonic poem disclosed Rabaud as a deft weaver of the subtle mood. There was no moment of prodigious originality in the composition, but every moment was beautiful.

Melody of simple, sinuous line, harmony of full and opulent sonority and instrumentation so smothered in cunning that it seemed to be the unpremeditated chanting of the choirs were abundant. A lovely piece of writing, restful and human was the symphonic poem of Mr. Rabaud. It had none of the Oriental shimmer and gloss of "Marouf," but it had a brilliant luminosity of its own, grateful and ingratiating.

After it the "Spanish Rhapsody" of Ravel seemed to behave like those sabres celebrated by Kipling, because they "whinny snickered." We do not know what whinny snickering is, but its onomatopoetic clang suggests Ravel's travels in Spain. His translations were like a portrait of Mary Garden's Scotch Carmen by Monet or a statue of Richard Strauss's Bavarian Sancho Panza by Rodin. But it has pepper and salt, this rhapsody, and it whinny snickers amid the bosky groves along the Xenil and

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DISPROVES SLUR OF GERMANS

Although it has failed in its object, there is nothing wherein "German efficiency" has shown itself more efficient than in propaganda. Any means that could in any way forward the march of "Kultur" have been used, and "Kultur" means anything German, whether it be political, commercial, artistic or social.

The German absolutely believes in his superiority, and is surprised that other people do not acknowledge it. The average individual cannot be fully educated upon all subjects, and most people in this busy age have to rely upon what is told them by others who have specialized along certain lines.

The Kaiser read the Bible and found therein many words of wisdom, and not the least among them are these, "As a man thinketh, so is he." The German nation also appreciated this fact and their appreciation of it is responsible for all their propaganda.

Nothing is simpler than to publish false innuenda, and a nation can be corrupted through the subordination of newspapers or school text books. In many countries this has been done, perhaps to a greater extent here than anywhere.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

German cloth, cookery or cutlery, laws and logic, science and art, war or peace, all were pictured as being superior to all other, and no college was supposed to be complete unless it had one or more German professors among its teachers.

The focused educational energy of those experts was directed so as to powerfully influence the minds of those coming in contact with it in favor of everything German, to the belittlement even of their own country and themselves, so that before 1914, almost without exception, the conductors of the orchestras in our cities also were Germans.

An Italian or French conductor was hardly to be found, and as to American or English—that was an unheard of supposition. The war to a certain extent altered this. Several of the most prominent of the conductors and leaders were suspected of being spies and were interned, and others lost their lucrative positions from which Americans had been previously ousted.

This was the case with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, when first organized, contained a large proportion of American musicians. Under the successive reign of German conductors, the orchestra became more and more Teutonic, until it was looked upon as representative of German Kultur in all that pertained to music.

Since its reorganization, however, many native born American musicians have taken the places of enemy aliens, and a French conductor wields the baton of the notorious Dr. Muck.

SLUR IS UNTRUE

It has been a source of patriotic congratulation that the musical quality of the orchestra has been greatly improved, but as such a realization as this was, to the German mind, almost profane, a peculiarly fitting opportunity was afforded for the usual propaganda. It has taken the form of regrets regarding the deterioration of the orchestra, because of poor leadership, and because its ranks had been filled by cheap players from cafes, etc., all of which is pure assumption and wholly untrue.

The facts are that the conductor is of world-wide renown, the concert master a magnificent violinist, and a native of Troy, N. Y., while most of the addition to the personnel have been known as capable players in many of the best theatre orchestras in the country. Perhaps the intended slur conveyed in the reference to the "cafe players" is due to the fact that many of the imported men had held just such positions in their own country, and before coming to Boston had never played in a really decent orchestra, and were not possessed of any reputation outside their own immediate neighborhood.

But such is propaganda, whether relating to world politics or musical affairs, and it is well to inquire into the truth of such, before accepting it at its "face value," which is all the value it possesses.

From Nation
Address New York City
Date DEC 14 1918

Music

THE second Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first in New York under the conductorship of the new leader, Henri Rabaud, was disappointing and promising, if one concert can be both. The orchestra has been so thoroughly remade, one-third of its personnel and nationality having been changed, that its perfect unity and sensitive pliability have vanished, and for the time being the customary Boston audience will have to lean back and hear rough tone and rough attack, over-quick tempo, and noisy rush as substitutes for nuance and sure interpretation, and hope for better days to come. M. Rabaud made the impression of a careful student and interpreter, a classicist, perhaps the very man to build up a scattered group, though in changing the position of his violins separating the four first violins from the rest of the group—an old French plan, seeking to emphasize the best strings of the orchestra—he seems to use an outworn plan. He chose Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and it seemed as if the first movement revealed every weakness an orchestra could possess. The tempo was rushed, the violins blundered, and gloom settled on the listeners. However, the second and third movements were better, and in the last there were really beautiful moments. "La Jeunesse d'Hercule" of Saint-Säens, and a "Caprice" on Spanish themes by Rimsky-Korsakoff completed the programme. In the last composition Rimsky-Korsakoff has taken folk themes whose value and beauty lay in the personal interpretation of the singer or player, and has enlarged and spread through the vast orchestra the very personal music of instinctive people. The composer seemed to realize the difficulty of conveying, through the orchestra, the essence of the themes, and gave the first violin an opportunity for vivacious interpretative playing, beautifully done by the concertmeister. The last two compositions were well-handled and gave hopeful reassurance to a very friendly audience. W.

From TIMES
Address New York City
Date JAN 1 8 1919

From The Spur
Address New York City
Date JAN 1 1919

Henri Benjamin Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a tall and spare Frenchman who looks rather older than his forty-five years. And he seems very modest for a "star" conductor, if I may judge by seeing him at the Brooklyn Academy of Music not long ago, when, for the first time out of France, he heard his opera, "Marouf," given. Born in Paris in 1873, Rabaud comes by his musical bent naturally. His father, Hippolyte François Rabaud, who died in 1900, took the first 'cello prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1861 and was long the 'cello soloist of the orchestra of that institution. For fourteen years he was professor of the 'cello there. The great flutist, Vincent Joseph Dorus, was Rabaud's grandfather and on his mother's side also he was a grand-nephew of Julie Aimée Joseph Dorus-Gras, the singer. Rabaud studied composition with Massenet at the conservatory, where he carried off the first grand prix de Rome. After his four years in Rome he went to Vienna and in 1908 he became a conductor at the Paris Opéra, where he led "Lohengrin," and "Tristan und Isolde" that year. In 1914 he succeeded Paul Vidal as first conductor. He was made Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur the same year, when his "Marouf" was produced at the Opéra Comique.

From REPUBLICAN
Address Springfield, Mass.
Date JAN 14 1919

RABAUD TO DIRECT

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert Here Sunday Has Been Made a Member of L'Institute de France

Under the management of the Young Men's Christian association, the Boston symphony orchestra will give a concert at the Auditorium on Surday afternoon. The coming of this famous orchestra to Springfield is always an event of consequence to the music-loving people of this city, but on this occasion an added importance will be given by the advent of the newly appointed conductor-composer, Henri Rabaud.

For over a generation Henri Rabaud has been one of the most prominent figures in the musical life of

HENRI RABAUD

Noted Composer to Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra Here Sunday

Paris. The news has just come over the ocean of his election to the highest honor that France can confer, namely, membership of L'Institute de France. Part of the institute is the Academie des Beaux Arts, comprising five chambers for the various fine arts. Its membership is limited to 40 life members, the "Forty Immortals." Of these six are always composers, who are judges of the Prix de Rome. At present they are: Faure, Debois, Charpentier, Paladihle, Saint Saens and now Rabaud, who was elected on his merits as a composer. He is the only conductor to hold this honor.

Sometimes the Boston symphony orchestra is represented by only a part of its members, but on Sunday the full orchestra of 100 will appear at the Auditorium. The program will be published later. A few tickets may still be secured by early application to the Young Men's Christian association and the music stores.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 29 1918

At the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, there will be opportunity to hear the new American concertmaster, of twenty-six, Fredric Fradkin, as solo-

Mentioned in World

FREDERIC FRADKIN

ist, in the concerto which more than any other music has popularized and perpetuated the name of Mendelssohn. Another matter for interest will be the symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," the first of Mr. Rabaud's own works conducted by him in this country. New York's open-armed reception of Mr. Rabaud on December 5 more than confirmed Philadelphia's opinion of him. As to his marvelous precision and control over the men, his interpretative and emotional power, his results in tone, in massed and individual detail—these they found to glorify even the old standards of the orchestra. The symphony is to be Schumann's Fourth in D minor, and the final number Berlioz's high-spirited and colorful overture to "King Lear."

Established:

ALSATIAN

During Premi
Fam

HENRI RABAUD,
New Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Recently Elected One of the "Immortals" of the French Academy, Said to be the Only Director So Far to be So Honored.

From RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 15 1918

PROVING HIS WORTH

Henri Rabaud is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DISPROVES SLUR OF GERMANS

Although it has failed in its object, there is nothing wherein "German efficiency" has shown itself more efficient than in propaganda. Any means that could in any way forward the march of "Kultur" have been used, and "Kultur" means anything German, whether it be political, commercial, artistic or social.

The German absolutely believes in his superiority, and is surprised that other people do not acknowledge it. The average individual cannot be fully educated upon all subjects, and most people in this busy age have to rely upon what is told them by others who have specialized along certain lines.

The Kaiser read the Bible and found therein many words of wisdom, and not the least among them are these, "As a man thinketh, so is he." The German nation also appreciated this fact and their appreciation of it is responsible for all their propaganda.

Nothing is simpler than to publish false innuenda, and a nation can be corrupted through the subordination of newspapers or school text books. In many countries this has been done, perhaps to a greater extent here than anywhere.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

German cloth, cookery or cutlery, laws and logic, science and art, war or peace, all were pictured as being superior to all other, and no college was supposed to be complete unless it had one or more German professors among its teachers.

The focused educational energy of those experts was directed so as to powerfully influence the minds of those coming in contact with it in favor of everything German, to the belittlement even of their own country and themselves, so that before 1914, almost without exception, the conductors of the orchestras in our cities also were Germans.

An Italian or French conductor was hardly to be found, and as to American or English—that was an unheard of supposition. The war to a certain extent altered this. Several of the most prominent of the conductors and leaders were suspected of being spies and were interned, and others lost their lucrative positions from which Americans had been previously ousted.

This was the case with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, when first organized, contained a large proportion of American musicians. Under the successive reign of German conductors, the orchestra became more and more Teutonic, until it was looked upon as representative of German Kultur in all that pertained to music.

Since its reorganization, however, many native born American musicians have taken the places of enemy aliens, and a French conductor wields the baton of the notorious Dr. Muck.

SLUR IS UNTRUE

It has been a source of patriotic congratulation that the musical quality of the orchestra has been greatly improved, but as such a realization as this was, to the German mind, almost profane, a peculiarly fitting opportunity was afforded for the usual propaganda. It has taken the form of regrets regarding the deterioration of the orchestra, because of poor leadership, and because its ranks had been filled by cheap players from cafes, etc., all of which is pure assumption and wholly untrue.

The facts are that the conductor is of world-wide renown, the concert master a magnificent violinist, and a native of Troy, N. Y., while most of the addition to the personnel have been known as capable players in many of the best theatre orchestras in the country. Perhaps the intended slur conveyed in the reference to the "cafe players" is due to the fact that many of the imported men had held just such positions in their own country, and before coming to Boston had never played in a really decent orchestra, and were not possessed of any reputation outside their own immediate neighborhood.

But such is propaganda, whether relating to world politics or musical affairs, and it is well to inquire into the truth of such, before accepting it at its "face value," which is all the value it possesses.

From Nation

Address New York City

Date

Music

THE second Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first in New York under the conductorship of the new leader, Henri Rabaud, was disappointing and promising, if one concert can be both. The orchestra has been so thoroughly remade, one-third of its personnel and nationalities having been changed, that its perfect unity and sensitive pliability have vanished, and for the time being the customary Boston audience will have to lean back and hear rough tone and rough attack, over-quick tempo, and noisy rush as substitutes for nuance and sure interpretation, and hope for better days to come. M. Rabaud made the impression of a careful student and interpreter, a classicist, perhaps the very man to build up a scattered group, though in changing the position of his violins separating the four first violins from the rest of the group—an old French plan, seeking to emphasize the best strings of the orchestra—he seems to use an outworn plan. He chose Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and it seemed as if the first movement revealed every weakness an orchestra could possess. The tempo was rushed, the violins blundered, and gloom settled on the listeners. However, the second and third movements were better, and in the last there were really beautiful moments. "La Jeunesse d'Hercule" of Saint-Säens, and a "Caprice" on Spanish themes by Rimsky-Korsakoff completed the programme. In the last composition Rimsky-Korsakoff has taken folk themes whose value and beauty lay in the personal interpretation of the singer or player, and has enlarged and spread through the vast orchestra the very personal music of instinctive people. The composer seemed to realize the difficulty of conveying, through the orchestra, the essence of the themes, and gave the first violin an opportunity for vivacious interpretative playing, beautifully done by the concertmeister. The last two compositions were well-handled and gave hopeful reassurance to a very friendly audience. W.

From TIMES

Address New York City

Date

From The Spur

Address New York City

Date 1919

Henri Benjamin Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a tall and spare Frenchman who looks rather older than his forty-five years. And he seems very modest for a "star" conductor, if I may judge by seeing him at the Brooklyn Academy of Music not long ago, when, for the first time out of France, he heard his opera, "Marouf," given. Born in Paris in 1873, Rabaud comes by his musical bent naturally. His father, Hippolyte François Rabaud, who died in 1900, took the first 'cello prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1861 and was long the 'cello soloist of the orchestra of that institution. For fourteen years he was professor of the 'cello there. The great flutist, Vincent Joseph Dorus, was Rabaud's grandfather and on his mother's side also he was a grandnephew of Julie Aimée Joseph Dorus-Gras, the singer. Rabaud studied composition with Massenet at the conservatory, where he carried off the first grand prix de Rome. After his four years in Rome he went to Vienna and in 1908 he became a conductor at the Paris Opéra, where he led "Lohengrin," and "Tristan und Isolde" that year. In 1914 he succeeded Paul Vidal as first conductor. He was made Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur the same year, when his "Marouf" was produced at the Opéra Comique.

From REPUBLICAN

Address Springfield, Mass.

Date

RABAUD TO DIRECT

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert Here Sunday Has Been Made a Member of L'Institute de France

Under the management of the Young Men's Christian association, the Boston symphony orchestra will give a concert at the Auditorium on Surday afternoon. The coming of this famous orchestra to Springfield is always an event of consequence to the music-loving people of this city, but on this occasion an added importance will be given by the advent of the newly appointed conductor-composer, Henri Rabaud.

For over a generation Henri Rabaud has been one of the most prominent figures in the musical life of

HENRI RABAUD

Noted Composer to Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra Here Sunday

Paris. The news has just come over the ocean of his election to the highest honor that France can confer, namely, membership of L'Institute de France. Part of the institute is the Academie des Beaux Arts, comprising five chambers for the various fine arts. Its membership is limited to 40 life members, the "Forty Immortals." Of these six are always composers, who are judges of the Prix de Rome. At present they are: Faure, Debois, Charpentier, Paladihle, Saint Saens and now Rabaud, who was elected on his merits as a composer. He is the only conductor to hold this honor.

Sometimes the Boston symphony orchestra is represented by only a part of its members, but on Sunday the full orchestra of 100 will appear at the Auditorium. The program will be published later. A few tickets may still be secured by early application to the Young Men's Christian association and the music stores.

Established : 1884

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

C. 29 1918

At the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, there will be opportunity to hear the new American concertmaster, of twenty-six, Fredric Fradkin, as solo-

Mentioned in World

FREDERIC FRADKIN

ist, in the concerto which more than any other music has popularized and perpetuated the name of Mendelssohn. Another matter for interest will be the symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," the first of Mr. Rabaud's own works conducted by him in this country. New York's open-armed reception of Mr. Rabaud on December 5 more than confirmed Philadelphia's opinion of him. As to his marvelous precision and control over the men, his interpretative and emotional power, his results in tone, in massed and individual detail—these they found to glorify even the old standards of the orchestra. The symphony is to be Schumann's Fourth in D minor, and the final number Berlioz's high-spirited and colorful overture to "King Lear."

Established : 1884

ALSATIAN

During Premi Fam

HENRI RABAUD,
New Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Recently Elected One of the "Immortals" of the French Academy, Said to be the Only Director So Far to be So Honored.

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Da

PROVING HIS WORTH

Es 1884

Henri Rabaud is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The First Establishment ... Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES

Address: New York City

Date JAN 5 -

WHEN word came overseas of the election of Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a member of the Institute of France, the highest honor a musician can hold in his country, it was heartily celebrated in Boston. W. H. Brennan, who succeeded C. A. Ellis as manager, announced the news at a rehearsal last Tuesday in Symphony Hall. He asked George Longy, the first oboist, to conduct the "Marseillaise" in tribute, and the orchestra joined in a demonstration.

Secretary J. N. Burke, in a semi official note, remarks that "Under the Institute is the Academie des Beaux Arts, comprising five chambers for the various fine arts." The membership of the Academy is fixed at forty, and is for life—"the forty immortals," they are called.

There are always six musical composers, judges of the Prix de Rome. They are, at present, Saint-Saëns, Dubois, Paladilhe, Faure, Charpentier, and now Rabaud, replacing Widor, who in turn has become Secrétaire Perpétuel. Mr. Rabaud, elected on his merits as a composer, is the only orchestra conductor among the "immortals."

From EVENING SUN

Address New York City

Date JAN 4 - 1919

The Boston Symphony on Saturday afternoon plays Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," after Lenau's "Faust." Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagniole" and Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore,' No. 3. "La Procession Nocturne" was more than well received in Boston. Philip Hale wrote as follows (and the other critics were even more enthusiastic): "It shows the sensitive, impressionable nature of an accomplished musician, an imaginative composer whose technical skill allows him to create at once a mood, to maintain it without inducing monotony. The effects are gained by artfully simple means, a sober use of musical material, but the sobriety is not for a moment academic. . . . The audience was quick to appreciate the charm of the music and the perfection of the performance." THE LISTENER.

884

From EVENING SUN

Address New York City

Date JAN 4 - 1919

The programme for the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening will be D'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," after the dramatic poem of Schiller; Converse's orchestral fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter" of Walt Whitman, Berlioz's overture "King Lear" and a sixteenth century suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from music found in a Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth. The suite is an echo of a special pair of choral concerts held in Boston on the last two days of the year, "Celebrating the close of the year of victory" and devoted to music of thanksgiving and patriotism. With the allied national anthems, Franck's setting of Psalm CL., Verdi's Te Deum and other works, including the suite above mentioned, the event became a demonstration of large proportions.

884

84

Newspaper Cutting ... LIFE

From

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 1 - 1918

Henri Rabaud Sees His Own Opera.

Those in the newspaper "know" were aware before the performance began that Henri Rabaud, the composer of "Marouf," would be sitting in a certain orchestra stall, with Mrs. Pierre Monteux, the wife of the conductor of the evening, to see his opera for the first time on American soil. When he rose from his seat to step into the aisle to have a chat with Mr. Thomas L. Leeming he was quickly recognized by many who had heard him conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the same auditorium the previous evening and no time was lost in giving him a hearty round of applause. Later, as he walked up the aisle, he was again made to realize that he was a "lion." Tall, spare and just past forty-five, he is modesty itself—as well becomes a musician of such fine achievements. He inherits, it appears, his gifts as a musician. For Henri Benjamin Rabaud—to give him his full name—is the son of Hippolyte François Rabaud, long 'cello soloist of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, while one of his grandfathers was the distinguished flutist, Vincent Joseph Dorus.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC

FRADKIN AS SOLOIST.

Will Appear Here With the Boston Orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Symphony, of dramatic outline and streaming color, is to open the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 10. There will also be Ravel's more delicately wrought "Spanish Rhapsody," and Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master of twenty-six, will come forth as soloist in Mendelssohn's ever popular concerto for violin. Despite Mr. Fradkin's Russian parentage, his Parisian musical training, and his general European concert experience, one need talk to him only two minutes to recognize him as an American first and last. For he was born in Troy, N. Y., has long lived in this country, and toured through every corner of it as concert master for the Russian ballet with which he crossed the seas in 1915. He is the youngest concert master the Boston Symphony has had since the youthful days of Franz Kneisel, was the first American violinist to win a first prize at the Conservatoire in Paris, and the first to be presented with an instrument by the French government.

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

JAN 5 1919

COMING EVENTS

More venerable concert masters than Mr. Fredric Fradkin, who is to play Mendelssohn's violin concerto as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, often incline to be a little pompous, but Mr. Fradkin, with his twenty-six years, knows not the adjective. To talk to him off-stage is to be impressed with two traits—exuberant enthusiasm and affability. You also recognize him for an American, whom Russian parentage, French training, and a cosmopolitan career have made versatile rather than foreign. He was born in Troy, N. Y. He studied under several violinists here and in France, but to Remy he claims he owes the best of his technical foundations. At the Paris Conservatoire he was the first American violinist to take the first prize, awarded to him by such august judges as Faure, Colonne, Vidal, D'Ambrosio, Thibaud and Lalo. The French Government also presented him with a fine instrument, which he cherishes as second only to his "Strad." With this brave start he became concertmaster and soloist under Pennequin, and the following season he made a tremendous furore as soloist at Monte Carlo, where he was invited to play before King Albert of Monaco. But if the public was satisfied with the youth of eighteen, Fradkin was not satisfied with himself. He gave up all engagements and went post-haste to Brussels and Ysaye. Then, in 1911, he came to New York and played as the last soloist with the Philharmonic under Mahler. He then went to London and played under Landon Ronald in Birmingham. Thence to the Weiner-Conzert Verein in Vienna as concertmaster and soloist. Thence to the Russian Ballet as their concertmaster, and he crossed the seas once more when they came to this country in 1915.

The other numbers for the concert will be Schuman's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after Lenau, and Berlioz's overture, "King Lear."

* * *

From HERALD

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

At the Boston Symphony Concert in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 7th, there will be an opportunity to hear the new American concertmaster of twenty-six, Fredric Fradkin, who is to play the solo part in the concerto which more than any other music has popularized the name of Mendelssohn. Although Mr. Fradkin's parents were Russian, although he studied in Paris and played everywhere, still he was born in Troy, New York, and has lived here most of his life, and one need only talk to him two minutes to recognize him as an American first and last. He was the first American violinist to take a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire, was presented with a fine instrument by the French government, studied with Remy and Ysaye, played principally in Paris, Brussels and Vienna, and came to his country as concert master for the Russian Ballet in 1915.

From EVENING STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

DEC 29 1918

Boston Symphony, January 7.

At the Boston Eymphony concert in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 7, the new concert master, Frederic Fradkin, is to play the solo part in the concerto of Mendelssohn. Although Mr. Fradkin's parents were Russian, he was born in Troy, N. Y., and has lived here most of his life. He was the first American violinist to take a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire and was presented with a fine instrument by the French government. He came to this country as concert master for the Russian ballet in 1915.

Taking the place of a symphony on the program will be D'Indy's "Wallenstein," a trilogy after Schiller's three plays, the episodes depicting the "brouhaha" of camp life, the thwarted loves of the "piccolomini" and Wallenstein's death. Converse's orchestral fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter," of Walt Whitman, will be the third number.

884

From EVENING STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Seldom has the Boston Symphony Orchestra given a more colorful program, one that was so suggestive of that orchestra's famous "pop" concerts in Boston, than that at the National Theater Tuesday. The numbers included "The Mystic Trumpeter," an orchestral fantasy based on Walt Whitman's poem of the same name, the Wallenstein trilogy, which D'Indy wrote after the dramatic poem of Schiller, and the soloist, Frederic Fradkin, was brilliant in playing Mendelssohn's concerto for violin in E minor, opus 64.

"The Mystic Trumpeter," suggestive of howling winds and trumpet calls almost to the point of imitation, with a medley of revolutionary war songs in its concluding part, is the work of a young New England composer, Frederick S. Converse. It held forth promise of new fields for symphony concerts in the work of American composers.

Fradkin's playing was spirited and rich in feeling. Especially noteworthy for technical facility was his playing of the blithesome allegretto non troppo of the Mendelssohn concerto.

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor, who already has enlisted the enthusiasm of Washington audiences, added to his prestige by his poetic reading of the Wallenstein trilogy. The third part of this work, suggested by the death of Wallenstein, was particularly sonorous and impressive.

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

DEC 28 1918

BOSTON SYMPHONY

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to play in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 8, first went to New York under its new conductor, the eminent Parisian, Henri Rabaud, that city (which crowns itself the final judge of all musicians) heartily indorsed the verdict of all the cities which had previously heard him. With one accord the critics praised his flawless precision and masterly control, his emotional power and interpretive authority, and the marvelous tonal results, concerted and individual, which he elicited from his men.

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

DEC 29 1918

884

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

DEC 28 1918

VIOLINIST WILL BE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

FREDERIC FRADKIN

The American violinist who is concert master of the Boston Symphony. He will be the soloist at the concert to be given in the Lyric Wednesday evening, January 8, when he will play the Mendelssohn violin concerto in E minor, Op. 64.

From SUN

Address: Baltimore,

JAN 5 - 19

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

JAN 1919

Melodies From Music's Sphere

By J. Norris Hering.

There is a bold theory suggested by one Baltimorean, close to musical affairs, that the chief reason patronage in Baltimore of the three concerts so far given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has decreased so materially since that orchestra's recent vicissitudes following a refusal to play the Star-Spangled Banner, is that there are German sympathizers in Baltimore who are boycotting the new orchestra to show their disapproval of its condition and of the former organization's reorganization and separation from it of its former conductor and his consequent absence from public life.

It is startling but the theory has been given other verbal expression; and, although it may seem unlikely at first, two assertions in other connections during the past year—sometime before the armistice was signed—suggest possibility of its truth. One of these was a published news dispatch which said Baltimore was one of several United States' cities which some Germans abroad had classified as a "German" city. The other is the statement from a United States' governmental source that Baltimore, for awhile, recently, was classified by it as "the second city in sedition" in this country, with "Boston" as first."

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRESSES

Lyric Concert Shows Advance Over the Last One; Fradkin Special Soloist.

A symphony, concerto and two suites comprise the program of the third Baltimore concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, at the Lyric Theater last night. Frederic Fradkin, violinist, young American concertmaster of the orchestra, was the special soloist. The audience appeared smaller than at the last concert.

Perceptible advance in unification has been achieved by this organization since its last appearance in Baltimore, a few weeks ago, and the degree of response to its conductor is greater. Leads, principal phrases and dynamics—judged by last night's performance—need to be brought out still more to produce the best effect, and, judging from the progress made already, this may be done. The concert contained much of interest, especially the Suite of the XVI. Century, by Giles Farnaby and anonymous English composers, arranged by Mr. Rabaud, and Ravel's brilliant, sonorous, modern Rapsodie Espagnole. Schumann's Fourth Symphony was the first work

HENRI RABAUD HARD AT WORK TRYING TO MASTER ENGLIS

HENRI RABAUD, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities, has been variously remarked upon. Our city proclaimed him in headlines "The Foch Among Conductors," by virtue of his disciplined generalship. More than one compared him to Chief Justice Hughes—until he began to conduct. But these remarks are rather superficial. His beard does not make him look older than his 45 years if you regard him closely. It rather adorns his comely features, sensitive, quickly responsive, finely shaped, aristocratic. If his erect carriage and his high forehead should bespeak the dry academician (which they do not), his bright and keen glance would quickly deny it. But a conductor's personality is clearest, of course, in his work, and Mr. Rabaud, responding to Beethoven's elation or Rimsky-Korsakoff's flaring colors, is like a delicately responsive musical instrument, where precision and fire are magically blended for the highest results.

With all his versatility, Mr. Rabaud is Gallic in the best sense of the word—also in the matter of language; when he landed in this country he could scarcely speak a word of English. He likes America, at least would like to like it if he had time to look around him, but what little time his arduous daily duties leave him is absorbed by perusing the scores of our own composers and learning our language.

He not only left his family behind him in Paris, he left a very distinguished career there. His father was a celebrated 'cellist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. His grandaunt was the famous singer, Mme. Dorus-Gros. He is a graduate of the Conservatoire, where he studied composition under Masse and in 1894 he won the Grand Prix Rome. For the four years following studied at the Villa Medici, where organized a series of concerts, doing same in Vienna next year, for the pose of acquainting those cities with temporary French music.

For 20 years he has been one of most prominent figures in the mus and artistic life of Paris. He has larly been a leading conductor at Opera and the Opera Comique, and often conducted at the Concerts moureux, Colonne, Monteux and servatoire. But his success as a poser is a rare thing, even among greatest of conductors. This se there has been played the piquant bian Nights opera "Marouf" of the ropolitan repertory, "La Procession turne" in San Francisco, Boston, York and Philadelphia; his Sec Symphony in Chicago. And all the works have been played in previ years in our cities.

The First Engaging ... Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES

Address: New York City

Date

WHEN word came overseas of the election of Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a member of the Institute of France, the highest honor a musician can hold in his country, it was heartily celebrated in Boston. W. H. Brennan, who succeeded C. A. Ellis as manager, announced the news at a rehearsal last Tuesday in Symphony Hall. He asked George Longy, the first oboist, to conduct the "Marseillaise" in tribute, and the orchestra joined in a demonstration. Secretary J. N. Burke, in a semi official note, remarks that "Under the Institute is the Academie des Beaux Arts, comprising five chambers for the various fine arts." The membership of the Academy is fixed at forty, and is for life—"the forty immortals," they are called.

There are always six musical composers, judges of the Prix de Rome. They are, at present, Saint-Saëns, Dubois, Paladilhe, Faure, Charpentier, and now Rabaud, replacing Widor, who in turn has become Secrétaire Perpétuel. Mr. Rabaud, elected on his merits as a composer, is the only orchestra conductor among the "immortals."

From EVENING SUN

Address New York City

Date JAN 4 1919

The Boston Symphony on Saturday afternoon plays Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," after Lenau's "Faust." Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagniole" and Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore,' No. 3. "La Procession Nocturne" was more than well received in Boston. Philip Hale wrote as follows (and the other critics were even more enthusiastic): "It shows the sensitive, impressionable nature of an accomplished musician, an imaginative composer whose technical skill allows him to create at once a mood, to maintain it without inducing monotony. The effects are gained by artfully simple means, a sober use of musical material, but the sobriety is not for a moment academic. . . . The audience was quick to appreciate the charm of the music and the perfection of the performance." THE LISTENER.

From EVENING SUN

Address New York City

Date

The programme for the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening will be D'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," after the dramatic poem of Schiller; Converse's orchestral fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter" of Walt Whitman, Berlioz's overture "King Lear" and a sixteenth century suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from music found in a Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth. The suite is an echo of a special pair of choral concerts held in Boston on the last two days of the year, "Celebrating the close of the year of victory" and devoted to music of thanksgiving and patriotism. With the allied national anthems, Franck's setting of Psalm CL., Verdi's Te Deum and other works, including the suite above mentioned, the event became a demonstration of large proportions.

Newspaper Cu... LIFE

From

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

Henri Rabaud Sees His Own Opera.

Those in the newspaper "know" were aware before the performance began that Henri Rabaud, the composer of "Marouf," would be sitting in a certain orchestra stall, with Mrs. Pierre Monteux, the wife of the conductor of the evening, to see his opera for the first time on American soil. When he rose from his seat to step into the aisle to have a chat with Mr. Thomas L. Leeming he was quickly recognized by many who had heard him conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the same auditorium the previous evening and no time was lost in giving him a hearty round of applause. Later, as he walked up the aisle, he was again made to realize that he was a "lion." Tall, spare and just past forty-five, he is modesty itself—as well becomes a musician of such fine achievements. He inherits, it appears, his gifts as a musician. For Henri Benjamin Rabaud—to give him his full name—is the son of Hippolyte François Rabaud, long 'cello soloist of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, while one of his grandfathers was the distinguished flutist, Vincent Joseph Dorus.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

FRADKIN AS SOLOIST.

Will Appear Here With the Boston Orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Symphony, of dramatic outline and streaming color, is to open the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 10. There will also be Ravel's more delicately wrought "Spanish Rhapsody," and Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master of twenty-six, will come forth as soloist in Mendelssohn's ever popular concerto for violin. Despite Mr. Fradkin's Russian parentage, his Parisian musical training, and his general European concert experience, one need talk to him only two minutes to recognize him as an American first and last. For he was born in Troy, N. Y., has long lived in this country, and toured through every corner of it as concert master for the Russian ballet with which he crossed the seas in 1915. He is the youngest concert master the Boston Symphony has had since the youthful days of Franz Kneisel, was the first American violinist to win a first prize at the Conservatoire in Paris, and the first to be presented with an instrument by the French government.

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

COMING EVENTS

More venerable concert masters than Mr. Fredric Fradkin, who is to play Mendelssohn's violin concerto as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, often incline to be a little pompous, but Mr. Fradkin, with his twenty-six years, knows not the adjective. To talk to him off-stage is to be impressed with two traits—exuberant enthusiasm and affability. You also recognize him for an American, whom Russian parentage, French training, and a cosmopolitan career have made versatile rather than foreign. He was born in Troy, N. Y. He studied under several violinists here and in France, but to Remy he claims he owes the best of his technical foundations. At the Paris Conservatoire he was the first American violinist to take the first prize, awarded to him by such august judges as Faure, Colonne, Vidal, D'Ambrosio, Thibaud and Lalo. The French Government also presented him with a fine instrument, which he cherishes as second only to his "Strad." With this brave start he became concertmaster and soloist under Pennequin, and the following season he made a tremendous furore as soloist at Monte Carlo, where he was invited to play before King Albert of Monaco. But if the public was satisfied with the youth of eighteen, Fradkin was not satisfied with himself. He gave up all engagements and went post-haste to Brussels and Ysaye. Then, in 1911, he came to New York and played as the last soloist with the Philharmonic under Mahler. He then went to London and played under Landon Ronald in Birmingham. Thence to the Weiner-Conzert Verein in Vienna as concertmaster and soloist. Thence to the Russian Ballet as their concertmaster, and he crossed the seas once more when they came to this country in 1915.

The other numbers for the concert will be Schuman's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after Lenau, and Berlioz's overture, "King Lear."

* * *

From HERALD

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

At the Boston Symphony Concert in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 7th, there will be an opportunity to hear the new American concertmaster of twenty-six, Fredric Fradkin, who is to play the solo part in the concerto which more than any other music has popularized the name of Mendelssohn. Although Mr. Fradkin's parents were Russian, although he studied in Paris and played everywhere, still he was born in Troy, New York, and has lived here most of his life, and one need only talk to him two minutes to recognize him as an American first and last. He was the first American violinist to take a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire, was presented with a fine instrument by the French government, studied with Remy and Ysaye, played principally in Paris, Brussels and Vienna, and came to his country as concert master for the Russian Ballet in 1915.

From EVENING STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony, January 7.

At the Boston Eymphony concert in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 7, the new concert master, Frederic Fradkin, is to play the solo part in the concerto of Mendelssohn. Although Mr. Fradkin's parents were Russian, he was born in Troy, N. Y., and has lived here most of his life. He was the first American violinist to take a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire and was presented with a fine instrument by the French government. He came to this country as concert master for the Russian ballet in 1915.

Taking the place of a symphony on the program will be D'Indy's "Wallenstein," a trilogy after Schiller's three plays, the episodes depicting the "brouhaha" of camp life, the thwarted loves of the "piccolomini" and Wallenstein's death. Converse's orchestral fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter," of Walt Whitman, will be the third number.

From EVENING STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Seldom has the Boston Symphony Orchestra given a more colorful program, one that was so suggestive of that orchestra's famous "pop" concerts in Boston, than that at the National Theater Tuesday. The numbers included "The Mystic Trumpeter," an orchestral fantasy based on Walt Whitman's poem of the same name, the Wallenstein trilogy, which D'Indy wrote after the dramatic poem of Schiller, and the soloist, Frederic Fradkin, was brilliant in playing Mendelssohn's concerto for violin in E minor, opus 64.

"The Mystic Trumpeter," suggestive of howling winds and trumpet calls almost to the point of imitation, with a medley of revolutionary war songs in its concluding part, is the work of a young New England composer, Frederick S. Converse. It held forth promise of new fields for symphony concerts in the work of American composers.

Fradkin's playing was spirited and rich in feeling. Especially noteworthy for technical facility was his playing of the blithesome allegretto non troppo of the Mendelssohn concerto.

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor, who already has enlisted the enthusiasm of Washington audiences, added to his prestige by his poetic reading of the Wallenstein trilogy. The third part of this work, suggested by the death of Wallenstein, was particularly sonorous and impressive.

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to play in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 8, first went to New York under its new conductor, the eminent Parisian, Henri Rabaud, that city (which crowns itself the final judge of all musicians) heartily indorsed the verdict of all the cities which had previously heard him. With one accord the critics praised his flawless precision and masterly control, his emotional power and interpretive authority, and the marvelous tonal results, concerted and individual, which he elicited from his men.

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

FREDRIC FRADKIN CONCERT MASTER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LYRIC JAN 8TH

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

VIOLINIST WILL BE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

FREDERIC FRADKIN

The American violinist who is concert master of the Boston Symphony. He will be the soloist at the concert to be given in the Lyric Wednesday evening, January 8, when he will play the Mendelssohn violin concerto in E minor, Op. 64.

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Melodies From Music's Sphere

By J. Norris Hering.

There is a bold theory suggested by one Baltimorean, close to musical affairs, that the chief reason patronage in Baltimore of the three concerts so far given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has decreased so materially since that orchestra's recent vicissitudes following a refusal to play the Star-Spangled Banner, is that there are German sympathizers in Baltimore who are boycotting the new orchestra to show their disapproval of its condition and of the former organization's reorganization and separation from it of its former conductor and his consequent absence from public life.

It is startling but the theory has been given other verbal expression; and, although it may seem unlikely at first, two assertions in other connections during the past year—sometime before the armistice was signed—suggest possibility of its truth. One of these was a published news dispatch which said Baltimore was one of several United States' cities which some Germans abroad had classified as a "German" city. The other is the statement from a United States' governmental source that Baltimore, for awhile, recently, was classified by it as "the second city in sedition" in this country, with "Boston" as first."

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRESSES

Lyric Concert Shows Advance Over the Last One; Fradkin Special Soloist.

A symphony, concerto and two suites comprise the program of the third Baltimore concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, at the Lyric Theater last night. Frederic Fradkin, violinist, young American concertmaster of the orchestra, was the special soloist. The audience appeared smaller than at the last concert.

Perceptible advance in unification has been achieved by this organization since its last appearance in Baltimore, a few weeks ago, and the degree of response to its conductor is greater. Leads, principal phrases and dynamics—judged by last night's performance—need to be brought out still more to produce the best effect, and, judging from the progress made already, this may be done. The concert contained much of interest, especially the Suite of the XVI. Century, by Giles Farnaby and anonymous English composers, arranged by Mr. Rabaud, and Ravel's brilliant, sonorous, modern Rapsodie Espagnole. Schumann's Fourth Symphony was the first work

HENRI RABAUD HARD AT WORK TRYING TO MASTER ENGLIS

HENRI RABAUD, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in va... cities, has been variously remarked ...on. Our city proclaimed him in head... "The Foch Among Conductors," by ...irtue of his disciplined generalship. More than one compared him to Chief Justice Hughes—until he began to conduct. But these remarks are rather superficial. His beard does not make him look older than his 45 years if you regard him closely. It rather adorns his comely features, sensitive, quickly responsive, finely shaped, aristocratic. If his erect carriage and his high forehead should bespeak the dry academician (which they do not), his bright and keen glance would quickly deny it. But a conductor's personality is clearest, of course, in his work, and Mr. Rabaud, responding to Beethoven's elation or Rimsky-Korsakoff's flaring colors, is like a delicately responsive musical instrument, where precision and fire are magically blended for the highest results.

With all his versatility, Mr. Rabaud is Gallic in the best sense of the word—also in the matter of language: when he landed in this country he could scarcely speak a word of English. He likes America, at least would like to like it if he had time to look around him, but what little time his arduous daily duties leave him is absorbed by perusing the scores of our own composers and learning our language.

He not only left his family behind him in Paris, he left a very distinguished career there. His father was a celebrated 'cellist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. His grandaunt was the famous singer, Mme. Dorus-Gros. He is a graduate of the Conservatoire, where he studied composition under Masse and in 1894 he won the Grand Pri... Rome. For the four years following studied at the Villa Medici, where organized a series of concerts, doing same in Vienna next year, for the ... pose of acquainting those cities with ... temporary French music.

For 20 years he has been one of most prominent figures in the mus... and artistic life of Paris. He has r... larly been a leading conductor at Opera and the Opera Comique, and often conducted at the Concerts ... moureux, Colonne, Monteux and ... servatoire. But his success as a ... poser is a rare thing, even among greatest of conductors. This se... there has been played the piquant ... bian Nights opera "Marouf" of the M... ropolitan repertory, "La Procession N... turne" in San Francisco, Boston, N... York and Philadelphia; his Seco... Symphony in Chicago. And all th... works have been played in previ... years in our cities.

The First Existing ... Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES

Address: New York City

Date

WHEN word came overseas of the election of Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a member of the Institute of France, the highest honor a musician can hold in his country, it was heartily celebrated in Boston. W. H. Brennan, who succeeded C. A. Ellis as manager, announced the news at a rehearsal last Tuesday in Symphony Hall. He asked George Longy, the first oboist, to conduct the "Marseillaise" in tribute, and the orchestra joined in a demonstration.

Secretary J. N. Burke, in a semi-official note, remarks that "Under the Institute is the Academie des Beaux Arts, comprising five chambers for the various fine arts." The membership of the Academy is fixed at forty, and is for life—"the forty immortals," they are called.

There are always six musical composers. Judges of the Prix de Rome. They are, at present, Saint-Saëns, Dubois, Paladilhe, Faure, Charpentier, and now Rabaud, replacing Widor, who in turn has become Secrétaire Perpétuel. Mr. Rabaud, elected on his merits as a composer, is the only orchestra conductor among the "immortals."

From EVENING SUN

Address New York City

Date JAN 4 1919

The Boston Symphony on Saturday afternoon plays Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," after Lenau's "Faust." Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagniole" and Beethoven's Overture "Leonore,' No. 3. "La Procession Nocturne" was more than well received in Boston. Philip Hale wrote as follows (and the other critics were even more enthusiastic): "It shows the sensitive, impressionable nature of an accomplished musician, an imaginative composer whose technical skill allows him to create at once a mood, to maintain it without inducing monotony. The effects are gained by artfully simple means, a sober use of musical material, but the sobriety is not for a moment academic. . . . The audience was quick to appreciate the charm of the music and the perfection of the performance." THE LISTENER.

From EVENING SUN

Address New York City

The programme for the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening will be D'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," after the dramatic poem of Schiller; Converse's orchestral fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter" of Walt Whitman, Berlioz's overture "King Lear" and a sixteenth century suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from music found in a Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth. The suite is an echo of a special pair of choral concerts held in Boston on the last two days of the year, "Celebrating the close of the year of victory" and devoted to music of thanksgiving and patriotism. With the allied national anthems, Franck's setting of Psalm CL., Verdi's Te Deum and other works, including the suite above mentioned, the event became a demonstration of large proportions.

Newspaper Cu... Bureau

From LIFE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1910

Henri Rabaud Sees His Own Opera.

Those in the newspaper "know" were aware before the performance began that Henri Rabaud, the composer of "Marouf," would be sitting in a certain orchestra stall, with Mrs. Pierre Monteux, the wife of the conductor of the evening, to see his opera for the first time on American soil. When he rose from his seat to step into the aisle to have a chat with Mr. Thomas L. Leeming he was quickly recognized by many who had heard him conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the same auditorium the previous evening and no time was lost in giving him a hearty round of applause. Later, as he walked up the aisle, he was again made to realize that he was a "lion." Tall, spare and just past forty-five, he is modesty itself—as well becomes a musician of such fine achievements. He inherits, it appears, his gifts as a musician. For Henri Benjamin Rabaud—to give him his full name—is the son of Hippolyte François Rabaud, long 'cello soloist of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, while one of his grandfathers was the distinguished flutist, Vincent Joseph Dorus.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

FRADKIN AS SOLOIST.

Will Appear Here With the Boston Orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Symphony, of dramatic outline and streaming color, is to open the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 10. There will also be Ravel's more delicately wrought "Spanish Rhapsody," and Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master of twenty-six, will come forth as soloist in Mendelssohn's ever popular concerto for violin. Despite Mr. Fradkin's Russian parentage, his Parisian musical training, and his general European concert experience, one need talk to him only two minutes to recognize him as an American first and last. For he was born in Troy, N. Y., has long lived in this country, and toured through every corner of it as concert master for the Russian ballet with which he crossed the seas in 1915. He is the youngest concert master the Boston Symphony has had since the youthful days of Franz Kneisel, was the first American violinist to win a first prize at the Conservatoire in Paris, and the first to be presented with an instrument by the French government.

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

COMING EVENTS

More venerable concert masters than Mr. Fredric Fradkin, who is to play Mendelssohn's violin concerto as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, often incline to be a little pompous, but Mr. Fradkin, with his twenty-six years, knows not the adjective. To talk to him off-stage is to be impressed with two traits—exuberant enthusiasm and affability. You also recognize him for an American, whom Russian parentage, French training, and a cosmopolitan career have made versatile rather than foreign. He was born in Troy, N. Y. He studied under several violinists here and in France, but to Remy he claims he owes the best of his technical foundations. At the Paris Conservatoire he was the first American violinist to take the first prize, awarded to him by such august judges as Faure, Colonne, Vidal, D'Ambrosio, Thibaud and Lalo. The French Government also presented him with a fine instrument, which he cherishes as second only to his "Strad." With this brave start he became concertmaster and soloist under Pennequin, and the following season he made a tremendous furore as soloist at Monte Carlo, where he was invited to play before King Albert of Monaco. But if the public was satisfied with the youth of eighteen, Fradkin was not satisfied with himself. He gave up all engagements and went post-haste to Brussels and Ysaye. Then, in 1911, he came to New York and played as the last soloist with the Philharmonic under Mahler. He then went to London and played under Landon Ronald in Birmingham. Thence to the Weiner-Conzert Verein in Vienna as concertmaster and soloist. Thence to the Russian Ballet as their concertmaster, and he crossed the seas once more when they came to this country in 1915.

The other numbers for the concert will be Schuman's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after Lenau, and Berlioz's overture, "King Lear."

* * *

From HERALD

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

At the Boston Symphony Concert in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 7th, there will be an opportunity to hear the new American concertmaster of twenty-six, Fredric Fradkin, who is to play the solo part in the concerto which more than any other music has popularized the name of Mendelssohn. Although Mr. Fradkin's parents were Russian, although he studied in Paris and played everywhere, still he was born in Troy, New York, and has lived here most of his life, and one need only talk to him two minutes to recognize him as an American first and last. He was the first American violinist to take a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire, was presented with a fine instrument by the French government, studied with Remy and Ysaye, played principally in Paris, Brussels and Vienna, and came to his country as concert master for the Russian Ballet in 1915.

From EVENING STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony, January 7.

At the Boston Eymphony concert in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 7, the new concert master, Frederic Fradkin, is to play the solo part in the concerto of Mendelssohn. Although Mr. Fradkin's parents were Russian, he was born in Troy, N. Y., and has lived here most of his life. He was the first American violinist to take a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire and was presented with a fine instrument by the French government. He came to this country as concert master for the Russian ballet in 1915.

Taking the place of a symphony on the program will be D'Indy's "Wallenstein," a trilogy after Schiller's three plays, the episodes depicting the "brouhaha" of camp life, the thwarted loves of the "piccolomini" and Wallenstein's death. Converse's orchestral fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter," of Walt Whitman, will be the third number.

From EVENING STAR

Address Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Seldom has the Boston Symphony Orchestra given a more colorful program, one that was so suggestive of that orchestra's famous "pop" concerts in Boston, than that at the National Theater Tuesday. The numbers included "The Mystic Trumpeter," an orchestral fantasy based on Walt Whitman's poem of the same name, the Wallenstein trilogy, which D'Indy wrote after the dramatic poem of Schiller, and the soloist, Frederic Fradkin, was brilliant in playing Mendelssohn's concerto for violin in E minor, opus 64.

"The Mystic Trumpeter," suggestive of howling winds and trumpet calls almost to the point of imitation, with a medley of revolutionary war songs in its concluding part, is the work of a young New England composer, Frederick S. Converse. It held forth promise of new fields for symphony concerts in the work of American composers.

Fradkin's playing was spirited and rich in feeling. Especially noteworthy for technical facility was his playing of the blithesome allegretto non troppo of the Mendelssohn concerto.

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor, who already has enlisted the enthusiasm of Washington audiences, added to his prestige by his poetic reading of the Wallenstein trilogy. The third part of this work, suggested by the death of Wallenstein, was particularly sonorous and impressive.

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to play in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 8, first went to New York under its new conductor, the eminent Parisian, Henri Rabaud, that city (which crowns itself the final judge of all musicians) heartily indorsed the verdict of all the cities which had previously heard him. With one accord the critics praised his flawless precision and masterly control, his emotional power and interpretive authority, and the marvelous tonal results, concerted and individual, which he elicited from his men.

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

VIOLINIST WILL BE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

FREDERIC FRADKIN

The American violinist who is concert master of the Boston Symphony. He will be the soloist at the concert to be given in the Lyric Wednesday evening, January 8, when he will play the Mendelssohn violin concerto in E minor, Op. 64.

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Melodies From Music's Sphere

By J. Norris Hering.

There is a bold theory suggested by one Baltimorean, close to musical affairs, that the chief reason patronage in Baltimore of the three concerts so far given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has decreased so materially since that orchestra's recent vicissitudes following a refusal to play the Star-Spangled Banner, is that there are German sympathizers in Baltimore who are boycotting the new orchestra to show their disapproval of its condition and of the former organization's reorganization and separation from it of its former conductor and his consequent absence from public life.

It is startling but the theory has been given other verbal expression; and, although it may seem unlikely at first, two assertions in other connections during the past year—sometime before the armistice was signed—suggest possibility of its truth. One of these was a published news dispatch which said Baltimore was one of several United States' cities which some Germans abroad had classified as a "German" city. The other is the statement from a United States' governmental source that Baltimore, for awhile, recently, was classified by it as "the second city in sedition" in this country, with "Boston" as "first."

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRESSES

Lyric Concert Shows Advance Over the Last One; Fradkin Special Soloist.

A symphony, concerto and two suites comprise the program of the third Baltimore concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, at the Lyric Theater last night. Frederic Fradkin, violinist, young American concertmaster of the orchestra, was the special soloist. The audience appeared smaller than at the last concert.

Perceptible advance in unification has been achieved by this organization since its last appearance in Baltimore, a few weeks ago, and the degree of response to its conductor is greater. Leads, principal phrases and dynamics—judged by last night's performance—need to be brought out still more to produce the best effect, and, judging from the progress made already, this may be done. The concert contained much of interest, especially the Suite of the XVI. Century, by Giles Farnaby and anonymous English composers, arranged by Mr. Rabaud, and Ravel's brilliant, sonorous, modern Rapsodie Espagnole. Schumann's Fourth Symphony was the first work

HENRI RABAUD HARD AT WORK TRYING TO MASTER ENGLISH

HENRI RABAUD, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities, has been variously remarked upon. Our city proclaimed him in headlines "The Foch Among Conductors," by virtue of his disciplined generalship. More than one compared him to Chief Justice Hughes—until he began to conduct. But these remarks are rather superficial. His beard does not make him look older than his 45 years if you regard him closely. It rather adorns his comely features, sensitive, quickly responsive, finely shaped, aristocratic. If his erect carriage and his high forehead should bespeak the dry academician (which they do not), his bright and keen glance would quickly deny it. But a conductor's personality is clearest, of course, in his work, and Mr. Rabaud, responding to Beethoven's elation or Rimsky-Korsakoff's flaring colors, is like a delicately responsive musical instrument, where precision and fire are magically blended for the highest results.

With all his versatility, Mr. Rabaud is Gallic in the best sense of the word—also in the matter of language; when he landed in this country he could scarcely speak a word of English. He likes America, at least would like to like it if he had time to look around him, but what little time his arduous daily duties leave him is absorbed by perusing the scores of our own composers and learning our language.

He—not only left his family behind him in Paris, he left a very distinguished career there. His father was a celebrated 'cellist and teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. His grandaunt was the famous singer, Mme. Dorus-Gros. He is a graduate of the Conservatoire, where he studied composition under Masse and in 1894 he won the Grand Prix Rome. For the four years following studied at the Villa Medici, where organized a series of concerts, doing same in Vienna next year, for the pose of acquainting those cities with temporary French music.

For 20 years he has been one of most prominent figures in the mus and artistic life of Paris. He has larly been a leading conductor at Opera and the Opera Comique, and often conducted at the Concerts moureux, Colonne, Monteux and servatoire. But his success as a poser is a rare thing, even among greatest of conductors. This se there has been played the piquant bian Nights opera "Marouf" of the ropolitan repertory, "La Procession turne" in San Francisco, Boston, York and Philadelphia; his Seco Symphony in Chicago. And all th works have been played in previ years in our cities.

EAGLE

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 11 1919

85

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the Academy of Music last evening the third of its Brooklyn series of concerts. Probably because no soloist of acknowledged distinction had been announced for the program the audience was smaller than usual, but what it lacked in size was compensated for in the enthusiasm with which it greeted Mr. Rabaud and his men. The program held but three numbers—Rimsky-Korsakoff's Second Symphony, "Antar"; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor and Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnol. The soloist in the concerto was Frederic Fradkin, the young American concert-master who succeeded Anton Witek in that capacity when the orchestra was reorganized last summer.

During the month that has elapsed since the orchestra's last visit to the Academy, Mr. Rabaud has accomplished much toward welding its component parts into a flexible, expressive instrument. The string sections played last evening with greater purity of tone, with finer precision of attack and unanimity of utterance, with more subtlety of nuance and shading. Last evening the conductor was able to build crescendi and diminuendi with well-nigh perfect gradation. And with this increased virtuosity remained the lustrous beauty of tone that elicited the criticism of a month ago that the sensuous and colorful values of this particular choir carried a more potent appeal than did those of the band assembled under Dr. Muck.

Where a month ago Mr. Rabaud revealed himself primarily as a conductor with keen perception of design—such was the nature of the program—last evening in two of the three numbers on the program he furnished convincing evidence of a sympathetic feeling for color and color values. This, however, was to be expected, for the score of his opera, "Marouf," is surcharged with the glittering, shimmering hues of the Orient. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Symphony is rarely heard, more the pity. Though written when the composer was serving his apprenticeship as a naval officer in the service of the Czar, it is far removed from the experiences through which the young composer was passing; instead, it breathes the spirit of the East, is redolent of the perfumes of Araby and the spices of the Orient. Admitting the freedom of form, Rimsky-Korsakoff in the revision called it an Oriental Suite and based it upon a version of the Arabic tale as told by the Russian poet Sennkowsky. The music foreshadows much that came later from this master-craftsman of the Russian school, prefigures that Orientalism that is more familiar to American audiences in the "Scheherezade" Suite and the opera "Le Coq d'Or."

From a Russian picture of Arabia to a Frenchman's of Spain is the leap from the "Antar" to Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole." The first and last movements, entitled "Prelude a la Nuit" and "Feria" (the Fair), respectively, are purely and simply Ravel's impressions of Spanish life, but between the two lie two other movements in which the composer derives his rhythmic basis from the use of two folk dances, the "Habanera" and the "Malaguena." Little need is there at the present time to enter into discussion regarding the former, as every one knows the "Habanera" is originally of West Indian negro origin, but by its association with Spain practically of indigenous nature. The score provides full opportunity to the composer for the expresison of his remarkable handling of the orchestral palette. A brilliant orchestral texture, bright-hued and sombre as the moment demands.

In these two works of wide differentiation in form and color the orchestra proved itself capable of the nicest modulations, of the finest delicacy of nuance, of the subtlest distinctions of light and shade, while Mr. Rabaud revealed himself once more as a master of euphony and tone-painting.

Mr. Fradkin last evening was more than an able concert-master. He gave an excellent reading to Mendelssohn's familiar concerto. He draws a tone that, while small, is remarkably pure and even, and his technical skill was equal to the burden of this composition which Mendelssohn wrote for his friend the violinist David. The nervousness which marred to some extent the outline of the beginning of the first movement soon passed. From then on soloist and orchestra united in a clear-cut and musicianly exposition of the work. The final movement did not move along at so fast a pace as at the hands of certain other violinists who have played the work in New York of recent weeks, but last evening's tempo had much of authority in the concerto's traditions. Both soloist and conductor were recalled many times after the third movement.

EVENING GLOBE

New York City

JAN 13 1919

Music.

The Boston Symphony Again—Other Music.

To begin the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon Mr. Rabaud chose the fourth symphony of Schumann, a welcome relief from the Tchaikovsky epidemic prevalent in New York. The four movements of this symphony were played without a pause, as the composer desired. They were played also in the romantic spirit appropriate to Schumann, with fine sympathy, and with such effect on the audience that Mr. Rabaud responded to the applause that followed the performance by summoning his men to rise and acknowledge it with him.

The programme continued with the conductor's own "Procession nocturne" (after the verses of Lenau), Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. In spite of the instrumental beauty and the poetic atmosphere of the opening part of Mr. Rabaud's tone poem, considering the eminent conductor as composer, I still prefer him in the oriental fantasy of his opera "Marouf." The audience, after hearing "La Procession nocturne," recalled the conductor-composer to bow twice.

To us outlanders, at least, the greatest Spanish composers are Chabrier, Debussy, Laparra, Ravel, and perhaps Zandonai, four Frenchmen and one Italian! Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" deserves to stand with Chabrier's "España" and Debussy's "Iberia" as an evocation of Spain in music. The Frenchman, greedy of the colors, the rhythms, the bewitching half Moorish melody of the Iberian peninsula, has recalled his own joy of them in tones that are an irresistible evocation, and a little of a madness, to the intrigued and fortunate listener.

The rhapsody was set forth in gorgeous fashion on Saturday. The whimsicality and the provocation of its rhythms, the fire that smoulders and of a sudden scorches, were all there, thanks to the remarkable band and the unerring baton of Mr. Rabaud, who presided at the revels like some necromancer of high benevolence and devilish cunning. It is impossible to doubt that the vast audience rejoiced greatly. A delighted cackle from out the dimness of the house, filling the brief pause after the first movement of the rhapsody, was a compliment not to be overestimated on a day when every egg of the harmless, necessary hen was quite as precious as any golden spheroid ever laid in fable by unappreciated goose.

EVENING MAIL

ss: New York City

JAN 13 1919

SATURDAY SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

THREE orchestras played Saturday morning, afternoon and evening.

First, the New York Symphony gave one of its delectable concerts for the opening mind of young people and children, with Mr. Damrosch explaining with crystal-clear "whys," and the orchestra playing "Fingal's Cave," the andante from Schumann's Fourth Symphony, and the "Sylvia" ballet suite. Mr. Tinlot played the air from Saint-Saens' "Deluge."

At Carnegie Hall a few hours later the second concert of the Boston Symphony found Mr. Rabaud happily cast for the leading role in his own "La Procession Nocturne," Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole," the Schumann Fourth Symphony and the Beethoven overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

In his own composition, Mr. Rabaud gave somber depth to the forest in which the brooding Faust stood at night while the procession of the white-robed faithful passed. But he also lighted his music with the flaming torches of the innocents: he knows how to make an orchestra tell a story, a well-constructed, interesting tale, without any suspense, nor any doubt as to the happy ending.

But when the tambourines and strings caught up Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody, with its pagan witchery, its passionate, exotic rhythms, its clicking of dance-maddened feet, there was a nervous, excited stir in the big audience. It is just an impression of Spain that Ravel throws so vividly across the screen, something spangled and luxurious, and something sordid and crude.

MORNING TELEGRAPH

New York City

JAN 12 1919

TWO SYMPHONIES AT CARNEGIE HALL

Boston Orchestra at Matinee and Philharmonic Society at Night Delight Fine Audiences.

MISCHA LEVITZKI THE SOLOIST

Damrosch Gives Concert With Educational Discourse to Morning Crowd of Children.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

Another eventful program signalized the third matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, when a greatly interested audience expressed its profound admiration for a noble playing of Schumann's Fourth Symphony (D minor) and for the overture to "Leonore," but which became quite spiritedly demonstrative over the less familiar and far more exhilarating Symphonic Poem by Henri Rabaud and the Ravel Rhapsodie Espagnol, of which the Malaguena continues to be the most delightful dance fantasy of any orchestral library. The much-rewritten Schumann Symphony taxed none of the mechanical resources of the smoothly proficient orchestra, and Conductor Rabaud gave it an intensely spirited and intelligent reading, but in spite of a capital projection of the four movements, played without pause, the workmanlike efforts of the band did not convey any more sequential symmtery or musical "reasonableness" to the work than Schumann put, or failed to put, into it.

The conductor's own Symphonic Poem, based on Lenau's metrical legend of Faust and his nocturnal wanderings, proved an interesting and most commendable musical adventure for the audience, most of whom had probably never heard it and who derived satisfaction from a first acquaintance with the new French conductor's Gallic musical interpretation of a turgid Teutonic swarm of poetic imagery. The prevalent figures of "La Procession Nocturne" are characteristically French, ornate, gracile, alert and dramatic, and M. Rabaud elicited amazingly gorgeous passages from the glorious horn and reed choirs for which the composition is generously scored and in which the Boston orchestra is richest.

Ravel's Spanish Rhapsodie.

Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnol," played with great emotional freedom and grand elan, was the happiest adventure of the program, the delightful instrumental conversations and exchanges of the prelude a la unit chal enging the unbounded admiration of the listener. It was played with nimble and indicative emphases, without discursiveness or vague lapses, leaping into the wonderful Spanish fandango riot of the Malaguena with irrepressible spirit and abounding color. The intricacies of this composition offered no obstacles to the Bostonians, and the rhythmic loveliness of the alternating figures invariably rode high and gay above the ingenious ramifications of the accompaniment. The wonderful uses of the woodwinds, harp and the syncopations for the c arinets in the Habanera were fully exploited by Conductor Rabaud, the suite ending with the Feria, a fittingly antic, colorful and imaginative movement emininely suited to the bonny spirit and innate enthusiasm of Rabaud and his men. The concert closed with a notably splendid playing of Beethoven's "Leo

MORNING TELEGRAPH

ress: New York City

Boston Symphony Returns.

D'Indy's "Wallenstein," a trilogy inspired by the dramas of Schiller, will head the next Boston Symphony program to be played in Carnegia Hall on Thursday evening, January 9. Most "early works" are putty to the master's mold—Boston found this to be one of the rare few which shine with steadfast individuality and self-sufficient beauty through its various "influences." Boston also found its vivid ardor the more delightful for tinges of Wagner and Schumann.

and Mr. Rabaud's reading one of his finest so far. The work depicts the "brouhaha" of Wallenstein's camp, the thwarted loves of the "Piccolomini" and the general's tragic death. Also for Thursday is listed the first native work of Mr. Rabaud's choice—Converse's Orchestral Fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter" of Walt Whitman, of high aspirations, startling and triumphant; a suite arranged by Rabaud from English 16th century music, found in the Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth; finally, Berlioz's Overture, "King Lear."

For Saturday afternoon, January 11, the symphony will be Schumann's Fourth in D minor. For the rest, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," after Lenau's "Faust," which has been played in Boston and San Francisco this season, Revel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," and Beethoven's Overture to Leonora No. 3.

Monday? Feb 3? Herald Jan. 29

MUSIC AND MUSICIA

NEW QUALITY IN THE SYMP ORCHESTRA

Clear Tokens of Progress in Recent certs—Mr. Heifetz Again in Rip and Diversified Powers — The Vio and His Hearers — Another Ha Proves His Merits as Operatic Sin Mr. Loeffler's New Quartet Soon t Heard in Boston—Miss Novaes to R

To frequenters of the Symphony certs, it is pleasure to hea new orchestra gradually rega the qualities of the old. The not to be rewon in a week or a m many of them depend not only upon ti dividual quality of the players, ho high, but upon the conscious and sub scious fusion of one with another, of with choir, under mutual work and as tion, under a single, familiar guidance this time, Mr. Rabaud feels his orch while his orchestra feels him and fee self. Hence the progress standing cle the concert of Saturday evening in lightness and the brightness of tone grace of rhythm, the fluidity of mov with which the orchestra played Scherzo of Brahms's symphony. I also the elastic precision with whi made every turn and transition in abrupt Finale of Mr. Rakhmaninov's certo. A week before it disclosed like ity in d'Indy's changeful "Symphony Mountain Song"; while at the same certs in Franck's "Symphonic Variati euphonies between the piano and th chestra fell upon the ear nearly as sm ly and richly as of old.

Wherever the strings are concerne new mettle of the second violins pr them; but at moments the violon still play somewhat sluggishly as th waiting by ever so little one upon and To summon the string choir to vig also to tempt it toward a rude rigidi tone, but from week to week it more more escapes this pitfall and moves ward the warm, sensuous, pliant that should be the goal. With reason Rabaud seeks the power of the choir, occasionally to the detrimen richness and mellowness, but the retur the exiles to the seats of the horn already bettering this fault. Similarly new blood among the wood-winds is a the advantage of music and audie After a first flute past his prime came other not yet ripened to it; now in Laurent succeeds a third in the noo his powers. Nor is the presence of Speyer without stimulating influence his fellow-players of the oboe and the E lish horn, perhaps a little prone to si the comfortable seats of self-contentm In fine, nearly every recent change of sonnel stands justified by a present come that the future bids fair to fu Orchestras are indeed much more hu than proverbial Romes, but by that token they are not brought to perfec in a day.

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE.

Henri Rabaud

The question has been raised: "Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season?"

This question should be answered publicly as soon as possible by the trustees of the orchestra, if they wish the confidence and the financial support of those interested in music and those possessed with civic pride.

The answer is easy: that is, if Mr. Rabaud will accept a second term.

Mr. Babaud has shown himself an accomplished musician. This was expected, for he was known here as a composer before he visited Boston. He is now recognized here, in other American cities, as in those of Europe, as an admirable conductor. His sensitive, refined, poetic nature has been revealed through his interpretation of orchestral compositions; furthermore, when the music made the demand, he has shown compelling virility—virility without the taint of coarseness—dash and amazing brilliance. Catholic in the selection of programs, he is the sympathetic interpreter of the various schools, ancient and modern. No conductor in the past years of this orchestra has equalled him in his reading of Beethoven and Bach; while the modern romanticists and the members of the ultra-modern French school have found in him an appreciative, imaginative soul. Respected, admired as conductor and man by the audiences, he is held in affectionate regard by the players, who gladly obey and second him.

To make a change would be folly; the change might be disastrous. Who is there to fill his place?

Surely no one wishes a conductor that has been under the suspicion of siding with Germany, of sneering at the United States, of snarling, biting the hand that had fed him and is still feeding him. No one wishes a conductor that would attempt the Germanization of orchestra, programs, public taste. Names of eminent foreign conductors have been mentioned, but their success as leaders of a hundred concerts would be a doubtful quantity, even if after long parleying, they should condescendingly accept. Delays are dangerous. Any one asked to subscribe wishes to know what he is to receive in return for the subscription.

Mr. Rabaud was not anxious to leave Paris. No Parisian leaves that city without a sigh. He came here as a representative of French musical art, also as a patriot grateful to this country, encouraged, if not urged, by his government; not as one lured by American dollars. France could not have sent a more worthy and ingratiating representative. Having received from her the highest honors she can award a musician, he is here, a celebrated composer, a conductor of the first rank, a man of pure artistic purposes, a gentleman in the old and most significant meaning of the word.

EVENING WORLD

New York City

JAN 13 1919

Henri Rabaud started the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon with Schumann's fourth symphony. This he followed with his own "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after Lenau. Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole," and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3 completed the programme, which was admirably presented. Mr. Rabaud grows in favor.

884

ING JOURNAL

New York City

JAN 13 1919

It would be most agreeable to ascribe the quality of the significant to Henri Rabaud's piece, "La Procession Nocturne," based on the St. John's Eve episode in Lenau's "Faust" and presented by the composer at the Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall; but Mr. Rabaud's chief claim to the gratitude of his listeners at that concert was a performance of Maurice Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," unworthily neglected by conductors hereabouts. It holds more of the genuine Spain than "Carmen," just as does Debussy's "Iberia," and it was excellently played by the men from Boston.

Beginning to be noted the concert of and Mr. Damrosch

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 11 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the Academy of Music last evening the third of its Brooklyn series of concerts. Probably because no soloist of acknowledged distinction had been announced for the program the audience was smaller than usual, but what it lacked in size was compensated for in the enthusiasm with which it greeted Mr. Rabaud and his men. The program held but three numbers—Rimsky-Korsakoff's Second Symphony, "Antar"; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor and Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnol. The soloist in the concerto was Frederic Fradkin, the young American concert-master who succeeded Anton Witek in that capacity when the orchestra was reorganized last summer.

During the month that has elapsed since the orchestra's last visit to the Academy, Mr. Rabaud has accomplished much toward welding its component parts into a flexible, expressive instrument. The string sections played last evening with greater purity of tone, with finer precision of attack and unanimity of utterance, with more subtlety of nuance and shading. Last evening the conductor was able to build crescendi and diminuendi with well-nigh perfect gradation. And with this increased virtuosity remained the lustrous beauty of tone that elicited the criticism of a month ago that the sensuous and colorful values of this particular choir carried a more potent appeal than did those of the band assembled under Dr. Muck.

Where a month ago Mr. Rabaud revealed himself primarily as a conductor with keen perception of design—such was the nature of the program—last evening in two of the three numbers on the program he furnished convincing evidence of a sympathetic feeling for color and color values. This, however, was to be expected, for the score of his opera, "Marouf," is surcharged with the glittering, shimmering hues of the Orient. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Symphony is rarely heard, more the pity. Though written when the composer was serving his apprenticeship as a naval officer in the service of the Czar, it is far removed from the experiences through which the young composer was passing; instead, it breathes the spirit of the East, is redolent of the perfumes of Araby and the spices of the Orient. Admitting the freedom of form, Rimsky-Korsakoff in the revision called it an Oriental Suite and based it upon a version of the Arabic tale as told by the Russian poet Sennkowsky. The music foreshadows much that came later from this master-craftsman of the Russian school, prefigures that Orientalism that is more familiar to American audiences in the "Scheherezade" Suite and the opera "Le Coq d'Or."

From a Russian picture of Arabia to a Frenchman's of Spain is the leap from the "Antar" to Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole." The first and last movements, entitled "Prelude a la Nuit" and "Feria" (the Fair), respectively, are purely and simply Ravel's impressions of Spanish life, but between the two lie two other movements in which the composer derives his rhythmic basis from the use of two folk dances, the "Habanera" and the "Malaguena." Little need is there at the present time to enter into discussion regarding the former, as every one knows the "Habanera" is originally of West Indian negro origin, but by its association with Spain practically of indigenous nature. The score provides full opportunity to the composer for the expresison of his remarkable handling of the orchestral palette. A brilliant orchestral texture, bright-hued and sombre as the moment demands.

In these two works of wide differentiation in form and color the orchestra proved itself capable of the nicest modulations, of the finest delicacy of nuance, of the subtlest distinctions of light and shade, while Mr. Rabaud revealed himself once more as a master of euphony and tone-painting.

Mr. Fradkin last evening was more than an able concert-master. He gave an excellent reading to Mendelssohn's familiar concerto. He draws a tone that, while small, is remarkably pure and even, and his technical skill was equal to the burden of this composition which Mendelssohn wrote for his friend the violinist David. The nervousness which marred to some extent the outline of the beginning of the first movement soon passed. From then on soloist and orchestra united in a clear-cut and musicianly exposition of the work. The final movement did not move along at so fast a pace as at the hands of certain other violinists who have played the work in New York of recent weeks, but last evening's tempo had much of authority in the concerto's traditions. Both soloist and conductor were recalled many times after the third movement.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York City
JAN 12 1919

TWO SYMPHONIES AT CARNEGIE HALL

Boston Orchestra at Matinee and Philharmonic Society at Night Delight Fine Audiences.

MISCHA LEVITZKI THE SOLOIST

Damrosch Gives Concert With Educational Discourse to Morning Crowd of Children.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

Another eventful program signalized the third matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, when a greatly interested audience expressed its profound admiration for a noble playing of Schumann's Fourth Symphony (D minor) and for the overture to "Leonore," but which became quite spiritedly demonstrative over the less familiar and far more exhilarating Symphonic Poem by Henri Rabaud and the Ravel Rhapsodie Espagnol, of which the Malaguena continues to be the most delightful dance fantasy of any orchestral library. The much-rewritten Schumann Symphony taxed none of the mechanical resources of the smoothly proficient orchestra, and Conductor Rabaud gave it an intensely spirited and intelligent reading, but in spite of a capital projection of the four movements, played without pause, the workmanlike efforts of the band did not convey any more sequential symmtery or musical "reasonableness" to the work than Schumann put, or failed to put, into it.

The conductor's own Symphonic Poem, based on Lenau's metrical legend of Faust and his nocturnal wanderings, proved an interesting and most commendable musical adventure for the audience, most of whom had probably never heard it and who derived satisfaction from a first acquaintance with the new French conductor's Gallic musical interpretation of a turgid Teutonic swarm of poetic imagery. The prevalent figures of "La Procession Nocturne" are characteristically French, ornate, gracile, alert and dramatic, and M. Rabaud elicited amazingly gorgeous passages from the glorious horn and reed choirs for which the composition is generously scored and in which the Boston orchestra is richest.

Ravel's Spanish Rhapsodie.

Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnol," played with great emotional freedom and grand elan, was the happiest adventure of the program, the delightful instrumental conversations and exchanges of the prelude a la unit chal enging the unbounded admiration of the listener. It was played with nimble and indicative emphases, without discursiveness or vague lapses, leaping into the wonderful Spanish fandango riot of the Malaguena with irrepressible spirit and abounding color. The intricacies of this composition offered no obstacles to the Bostonians, and the rhythmic loveliness of the alternating figures invariably rode high and gay above the ingenious ramifications of the accompaniment. The wonderful uses of the woodwinds, harp and the syncopations for the c'arinets in the Habanera were fully exploited by Conductor Rabaud, the suite ending with the Feria, a fittingly antic, colorful and imaginative movement emininely suited to the bonny spirit and innate enthusiasm of Rabaud and his men. The concert closed with a notably splendid playing of Beethoven's "Leo-

MUSIC AND MUSICIA
NEW QUALITY IN THE SYMP
ORCHESTRA

Clear Tokens of Progress in Recent certs—Mr. Heifetz Again in Rip and Diversified Powers — The Vio and His Hearers — Another Ha Proves His Merits as Operatic Sin
Mr. Loeffler's New Quartet Soon t
Heard in Boston—Miss Novaes to R

To frequenters of the Symphony certs, it is pleasure to hea new orchestra gradually rega the qualities of the old. The not to be rewon in a week or a m
many of them depend not only upon t dividual quality of the players, ho high, but upon the conscious and sub scious fusion of one with another, of with choir, under mutual work and ass tion, under a single, familiar guidance this time, Mr. Rabaud feels his orch while his orchestra feels him and fee self. Hence the progress standing cle the concert of Saturday evening i lightness and the brightness of tone grace of rhythm, the fluidity of mov with which the orchestra played Scherzo of Brahms's symphony. I also the elastic precision with whi made every turn and transition in abrupt Finale of Mr. Rakhmaninov's certo. A week before it disclosed like ity in d'Indy's changeful "Symphony Mountain Song"; while at the same certs in Franck's "Symphonic Variati euphonies between the piano and th chestra fell upon the ear nearly as sm ly and richly as of old.

Wherever the strings are concerne new mettle of the second violins p them; but at moments the violon still play somewhat sluggishly as th waiting by ever so little one upon an
To summon the string choir to vig also to tempt it toward a rude rigidi tone, but from week to week it more more escapes this pitfall and moves ward the warm, sensuous, pliant that should be the goal. With reason Rabaud seeks the power of the choir, occasionally to the detrimen richness and mellowness, but the retur the exiles to the seats of the horn already bettering this fault. Similarly new blood among the wood-winds is a the advantage of music and audi
After a first flute past his prime came other not yet ripened to it; now in Laurent succeeds a third in the noo his powers. Nor is the presence of Speyer without stimulating influence his fellow-players of the oboe and the lish horn, perhaps a little prone to si
the comfortable seats of self-contentm
In fine, nearly every recent change of sonnel stands justified by a present come that the future bids fair to fu Orchestras are indeed much more hu than proverbial Romes, but by that token they are not brought to perfec in a day.

As the World Wags
By PHILIP HALE.

Henri Rabaud

The question has been raised: "Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season?"

This question should be answered publicly as soon as possible by the trustees of the orchestra, if they wish the confidence and the financial support of those interested in music and those possessed with civic pride.

The answer is easy: that is, if Mr. Rabaud will accept a second term.

Mr. Babaud has shown himself an accomplished musician. This was expected, for he was known here as a composer before he visited Boston. He is now recognized here, in other American cities, as in those of Europe, as an admirable conductor. His sensitive, refined, poetic nature has been revealed through his interpretation of orchestral compositions; furthermore, when the music made the demand, he has shown compelling virility—virility without the taint of coarseness—dash and amazing brilliance. Catholic in the selection of programs, he is the sympathetic interpreter of the various schools, ancient and modern. No conductor in the past years of this orchestra has equalled him in his reading of Beethoven and Bach; while the modern romanticists and the members of the ultra-modern French school have found in him an appreciative, imaginative soul. Respected, admired as conductor and man by the audiences, he is held in affectionate regard by the players, who gladly obey and second him.

To make a change would be folly; the change might be disastrous. Who is there to fill his place?

Surely no one wishes a conductor that has been under the suspicion of siding with Germany, of sneering at the United States, of snarling, biting the hand that had fed him and is still feeding him. No one wishes a conductor that would attempt the Germanization of orchestra, programs, public taste. Names of eminent foreign conductors have been mentioned, but their success as leaders of a hundred concerts would be a doubtful quantity, even if after long parleying, they should condescendingly accept. Delays are dangerous. Any one asked to subscribe wishes to know what he is to receive in return for the subscription.

Mr. Rabaud was not anxious to leave Paris. No Parisian leaves that city without a sigh. He came here as a representative of French musical art, also as a patriot grateful to this country, encouraged, if not urged, by his government; not as one lured by American dollars. France could not have sent a more worthy and ingratiating representative. Having received from her the highest honors she can award a musician, he is here, a celebrated composer, a conductor of the first rank, a man of pure artistic purposes, a gentleman in the old and most significant meaning of the word.

EVENING MAIL
New York City

SATURDAY SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

THREE orchestras played Saturday morning, afternoon and evening. First, the New York Symphony gave one of its delectable concerts for the opening mind of young people and children, with Mr. Damrosch explaining with crystal-clear "whys," and the orchestra playing "Fingal's Cave," the andante from Schumann's Fourth Symphony, and the "Sylvia" ballet suite. Mr. Tinlot played the air from Saint-Saens' "Deluge."

At Carnegie Hall a few hours later the second concert of the Boston Symphony found Mr. Rabaud happily cast for the leading role in his own "La Procession Nocturne," Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole," the Schumann Fourth Symphony and the Beethoven overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

In his own composition, Mr. Rabaud gave somber depth to the forest in which the brooding Faust stood at night while the procession of the white-robed faithful passed. But he also lighted his music with the flaming torches of the innocents: he knows how to make an orchestra tell a story, a well-constructed, interesting tale, without any suspense, nor any doubt as to the happy ending.

But when the tambourines and strings caught up Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody, with its pagan witchery, its passionate, exotic rhythms, its clicking of dance-maddened feet, there was a nervous, excited stir in the big audience. It is just an impression of Spain that Ravel throws so vividly across the screen, something spangled and luxurious, and something sordid and crude.

Music.

The Boston Symphony Again—Other Music.

To begin the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon Mr. Rabaud chose the fourth symphony of Schumann, a welcome relief from the Tchaikovsky epidemic prevalent in New York. The four movements of this symphony were played without a pause, as the composer desired. They were played also in the romantic spirit appropriate to Schumann, with fine sympathy, and with such effect on the audience that Mr. Rabaud responded to the applause that followed the performance by summoning his men to rise and acknowledge it with him.

The programme continued with the conductor's own "Procession nocturne" (after the verses of Lenau), Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. In spite of the instrumental beauty and the poetic atmosphere of the opening part of Mr. Rabaud's tone poem, considering the eminent conductor as composer, I still prefer him in the oriental fantasy of his opera "Marouf." The audience, after hearing "La Procession nocturne," recalled the conductor-composer to bow twice.

To us outlanders, at least, the greatest Spanish composers are Chabrier, Debussy, Laparra, Ravel, and perhaps Zandonai, four Frenchmen and one Italian! Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" deserves to stand with Chabrier's "España" and Debussy's "Iberia" as an evocation of Spain in music. The Frenchman, greedy of the colors, the rhythms, the bewitching half Moorish melody of the Iberian peninsula, has recalled his own joy of them in tones that are an irresistible evocation, and a little of a madness, to the intrigued and fortunate listener.

The rhapsody was set forth in gorgeous fashion on Saturday. The whimsicality and the provocation of its rhythms, the fire that smoulders and of a sudden scorches, were all there, thanks to the remarkable band and the unerring baton of Mr. Rabaud, who presided at the revels like some necromancer of high benevolence and devilish cunning. It is impossible to doubt that the vast audience rejoiced greatly. A delighted cackle from out the dimness of the house, filling the brief pause after the first movement of the rhapsody, was a compliment not to be overestimated on a day when every egg of the harmless, necessary hen was quite as precious as any golden spheroid ever laid in fable by unappreciated goose.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York City

Boston Symphony Returns.

D'Indy's "Wallenstein," a trilogy inspired by the dramas of Schiller, will head the next Boston Symphony program to be played in Carnegia Hall on Thursday evening, January 9. Most "early works" are putty to the master's mold—Boston found this to be one of the rare few which shine with steadfast individuality and self-sufficient beauty through its various "influences." Boston also found its vivid ardor the more delightful for tinges of Wagner and Schumann, and Mr. Rabaud's reading one of his finest so far. The work depicts the "brouhaha" of Wallenstein's camp, the thwarted loves of the "Piccolomini" and the general's tragic death. Also for Thursday is listed the first native work of Mr. Rabaud's choice—Converse's Orchestral Fantasy on "The Mystic Trumpeter" of Walt Whitman, of high aspirations, startling and triumphant; a suite arranged by Rabaud from English 16th century music, found in the Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth; finally, Berlioz's Overture, "King Lear."

For Saturday afternoon, January 11, the symphony will be Schumann's Fourth in D minor. For the rest, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," after Lenau's "Faust," which has been played in Boston and San Francisco this season, Revel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," and Beethoven's Overture to Leonora No. 3.

EVENING WORLD
New York City

Henri Rabaud started the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon with Schumann's fourth symphony. This he followed with his own "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after Lenau. Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole," and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3 completed the programme, which was admirably presented. Mr. Rabaud grows in favor.

884

ING JOURNAL
New York City

It would be most agreeable to ascribe the quality of the significant to Henri Rabaud's piece, "La Procession Nocturne," based on the St. John's Eve episode in Lenau's "Faust" and presented by the composer at the Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall; but Mr. Rabaud's chief claim to the gratitude of his listeners at that concert was a performance of Maurice Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," unworthily neglected by conductors hereabouts. It holds more of the genuine Spain than "Carmen," just as does Debussy's "Iberia," and it was excellently played by the men from Boston.

Remains to be noted the concert of Symphony and M. Ermack

From JOURNAL
Address Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 1 9 1914
Est. 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY STIRS ENTHUSIASM

Receives Hearty Welcome at Second Concert of Season.

HAROLD BAUER IS SOLOIST

Works by Schubert and Beethoven Are Orchestral Features, While Famous Pianist Scores Success in Saint-Saens' Concerto. — Large Audience Greets Players.

Enthusiasm was the dominant note at Infantry Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played here for the second time this season. And for the second time in Providence this magnificent band of musicians played the national anthem with wonderful breadth and grandeur. It was an inspiring beginning of an unusually fine concert.

For this performance Conductor Rabaud provided a programme of rich musical fare, presenting two symphonies, and, between them, a piano concerto with Harold Bauer as soloist. The Schubert Unfinished Symphony in B-minor and the Beethoven Symphony in F-major were the concert's opening and closing numbers, and Mr. Bauer chose Saint-Saen's brilliant C-minor concerto.

After the uplifting patriotic beginning the audience settled down for the enjoyment of Schubert's finest orchestral work. In no other composer's symphonic writing do we hear a more delightful and spontaneous outpouring of music than in this highly original work. Unlike other great composers of his time, Schubert did not achieve particular immediate success in the symphonic field. In fact, for the most part his earlier works of this kind do not compare in beauty, individuality and interest with this unfinished one in B-minor and his symphony in C-major. In these, in a style borrowed from no other composer, and in a manner expressing the traits so beautifully promised in his songs and lesser writings, he reaches the heights of refinement and beauty.

M. Rabaud, with that keen perception and spirituality which semed to inhere in the nature of the cultivated French musician, led his orchestra through the symphony's two movements with delightful result. The second movement, in particular, created an atmosphere of musical enchantment. The constant interruptions of wood-wind and horns seemed voices, mysterious, remote, while the strings sang ethereal accompaniment. The pure beauty of this movement held the audience enthralled. One might have heard the proverbial pin drop. The perfection of its performance was fully realized by one and all and a storm of applause greeted the conductor and players at its conclusion, M. Rabaud returning several times in acknowledgment.

Harold Bauer, coming to Providence after an all-too-long absence, gave a magnificent performance of the Saint-Saens concerto. This artist, one of the few great pianists of the present day, is a player who dignifies and ennobles whatever composition he elects to present. Indeed, there are few, if any, pianists of to-day who combine so many essentials to greatness as he. Absolute self mastery, poise and breadth of vision are the things which immediately impress the listener.

His position in the front rank of the giants of the keyboard is due, not to the possession in extraordinary degree of any single quality, either technique, temperament, musicianship or interpretive ability. These are all his in full measure and all are dominated by a towering intellect. What wonder, then, that the brilliant Saint-Saens concerto was made a vital, glowing tone picture which not only ravished the ear, but was an intellectual treat for the musician as well. As a rule, piano concertos with orchestra are not particularly grateful medium for an artist, owing to the solo part being submerged to a great extent in the ensemble. More than usual opportunity is given in the Saint-Saens C-minor for the player to show to advantage and Mr. Bauer electrified his audience by the beauty and nobility of his tone, his brilliance and, above all, his breadth of conception. Runs light as air or thunderous effects, which, however, never degenerate into mere noise, are but the servants of a masterful and artistic mind. Such playing never fails of proper appreciation and Mr. Bauer was recalled again and again.

Beethoven's Symphony in F-major, No. 8, concluded the programme. The composer is said to have called it "a little symphony in F." It is joyful in character and shows the great master in his gayest mood. The second movement, the Allegretto scherzando, is supposed to be based on a three voice round which was sung in honor of Malzel, the inventor of the metronome, at a farewell dinner given to Beethoven as he was about to leave Vienna in 1812. It is humorous in effect and its character bears out the story. The prevailing musical lightheartedness of the symphony was reflected by M. Rabaud's skilful interpretation, and the men responded to his decisive beat with splendid unanimity. The audience was a large one, an increase in attendance over that at the first concert being noted.

...OTHER PICTURES OF INTEREST

ALFRED CORTOT, THE FIRST AMONG FRENCH PIANISTS, WHO CAME TO THIS COUNTRY WITH THE "CONSERVATOIRE" ORCHESTRA, AND PLAYED WITH THEM AND IN HIS OWN RECITALS. IN EUROPE, M. CORTOT IS KNOWN AS MUCH MORE THAN A PIANIST. HE HAS STAGED AND CONDUCTED WAGNER, ORGANIZED CHORAL CONCERTS ON A LARGE SCALE, POPULAR CONCERTS, CONCERTS FOR THE INTRODUCTION OF NEW MUSIC, AND CONDUCTED THEM ALL WITH GREAT SUCCESS.

Alfred Cortot, pianist.

Alfred Cortot, soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, made a marked impression upon the country when he came from his native France with the Conservatoire Orchestra, playing with them, and in his own recitals. He is known in Europe as a great deal more than the first pianist of France. He conducted at Bayreuth, and then, in Paris, staged and conducted unforgettable performances of "Tristan" and "Gotterdammerung." He also organized and conducted some choral concerts on a large scale, with such works as Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," Liszt's "St. Elizabeth," Brahm's Requiem, "Parsifal," in choral version, and a special concert series for introducing new and worthy music. He formed a notable trio with Thibaud and Casals. When the war came, Mr. Cortot offered his full services to his country, playing to the soldiers and teaching them, founding a society for the aid of musicians and actors suffering from the war.

At the coming concerts Mr. Cortot is to play Franck's "Variations Symphoniques" and d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." The other numbers will be Hadley's Symphonic Fantasia (first time at these concerts) and J. S. Bach's suite in D major, No. 3.

NEW ITALIAN MUSIC

...STINGUISHED AS PIANIST AND AS LEADER IN FRANCE

ALFRED CORTOT

The Parisian pianist, who made a profound impression here earlier in the winter with Mr. Messager's orchestra, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts next week. In Paris he is a well-known figure in the music world. He is a pianist of note. He has staged and conducted the Wagner music dramas, organized choral concerts, popular concerts and special concerts devoted to new music of worth. His war services consisted of collecting funds, teaching soldiers and arranging concerts at military hospitals. His one performance in Boston was so successful that the management of the Boston Orchestra immediately invited him to play with the local organization.

...ed with ... say it makes a good tag.

The police are endeavoring to find a way to stop the sale of Jamaica ginger ... stores should have been warned to cut out the practice.

GIVES BEETHOVEN'S FIFTH SYMPHONY

Never before since assuming the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has Mr. Rabaud aroused such enthusiasm as attended his reading of Beethoven's symphony in C minor at yesterday afternoon's concert. The large audience not only applauded enthusiastically at every opportunity, but recalled Mr. Rabaud to the stage at its close until he called upon the players to rise in their places and share in the tribute. It was a brilliant performance well worthy of ranking with the orchestra's best.

Miss Mabel Garrison, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera House, the soloist of the concert, scored more noticeably with Edgar Stillman Kelley's "A California Idyl," than with her Mozart selection. The Kelley number is more within her present abilities.

Saint-Saens's symphonic poem "Phaeton" and Lalo's rhapsody ... completed ... program.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18,

CALIFORNIA IDYL OFFERED AT SYMPHONY

Work's Chief Value Is as Soprano Display Piece

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Henri Rabaud, conductor; Mabel Garrison, soprano, soloist. Eleventh concert of the season. The program:—

Beethoven—Symphony, No. 5, in C minor.
Mozart—Recitative, "Mia Speranza Adorata."
Saint-Saens—"Phaeton."
Kelley—"A California Idyl."
Lalo—Rhapsody in A minor.

Coloratura sopranos have bemoaned, especially of late, the scarcity of music for their style of singing. Blamed for singing "Ernani, Involami," "Caro Nome," "Proch's Variations" and the like, they place the blame on the present day composer, who writes practically nothing for coloratura soprano. Not long ago one of the leading composers of the day showed the writer five letters from five distinguished soprano singers, all asking for a coloratura composition for their programs. Possibly the extreme scarcity ... such ornate music recommended ... man Kelley's composition to Miss Garrison. The song is a musical setting of a rather long love poem by Charles Kelley. The narration of the song, which is written for high soprano, is broken by the introduction at one place of vocal fireworks, runs, etc. The song is ended so to give the soprano a chance to sing a florid passage and end on an applause getting high note.

The music has little to recommend it save as a vehicle for the display of a high- flexible voice. It is not distinguished in subject matter; it is heavily orchestrated.

Miss Garrisons' voice is a delightful one, a voice that just misses being really distinguished. Unlike many of her coloratura sisters her voice has neither edge, whiteness, nor metallic harshness. Lacking these most undesirable qualities it also lacks one desirable quality in a voice that sings the coloratura roles: brilliancy. At no time when we have heard Miss Garrison, and, barring yesterday, we have heard her only a few times in opera, has her voice possessed the brilliancy, the sparkle, the dazzling diamond beauty which have distinguished the voices of her great predecessors at the Metropolitan Opera House. The chief lovliness of her voice is its silken quality, its lyrice beauty, which it keeps both in all its tessitura and in most elaborate passages. The voice is not a large one. There is just a hint that it has not reached its full maturity, in size, even at this late hour of its development.

The Saint-Saens "Phaeton" was brilliantly played. This program music with its anapestic, rhythmic galloping of the horses that drag the sun through the heavens, its striking Phaeton theme, its furious drive through the skies and the crashing thunderbolt, stirred an audience lulled by a very Mozartian recitative.

The symphony, the very brain of Beethoven, was superbly read and superbly played. The ponderings of the musician, his happiness, his dejection and his visions were all given a glowing, a tragic, but never a merely theatrical reading. There was long applause after the symphony. Mr. Rabaud justly insisted that the members of the orchestra should share the applause with him.

From JOURNAL
Address Providence, R. I.
Date
Est 884

86

BOSTON SYMPHONY STIRS ENTHUSIASM

Receives Hearty Welcome at Second Concert of Season.

HAROLD BAUER IS SOLOIST

Works by Schubert and Beethoven Are Orchestral Features, While Famous Pianist Scores Success in Saint-Saens' Concerto. — Large Audience Greets Players.

Enthusiasm was the dominant note at Infantry Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played here for the second time this season. And for the second time in Providence this magnificent band of musicians played the national anthem with wonderful breadth and grandeur. It was an inspiring beginning of an unusually fine concert.

For this performance Conductor Rabaud provided a programme of rich musical fare, presenting two symphonies, and, between them, a piano concerto with Harold Bauer as soloist. The Schubert Unfinished Symphony in B-minor and the Beethoven Symphony in F-major were the concert's opening and closing numbers, and Mr. Bauer chose Saint-Saen's brilliant C-minor concerto.

After the uplifting patriotic beginning the audience settled down for the enjoyment of Schubert's finest orchestral work. In no other composer's symphonic writing do we hear a more delightful and spontaneous outpouring of music than in this highly original work. Unlike other great composers of his time, Schubert did not achieve particular immediate success in the symphonic field. In fact, for the most part his earlier works of this kind do not compare in beauty, individuality and interest with this unfinished one in B-minor and his symphony in C-major. In these, in a style borrowed from no other composer, and in a manner expressing the traits so beautifully promised in his songs and lesser writings, he reaches the heights of refinement and beauty.

M. Rabaud, with that keen perception and spirituality which semed to inhere in the nature of the cultivated French musician, led his orchestra through the symphony's two movements with delightful result. The second movement, in particular, created an atmosphere of musical enchantment. The constant interruptions of wood-wind and horns seemed voices, mysterious, remote, while the strings sang ethereal accompaniment. The pure beauty of this movement held the audience enthralled. One might have heard the proverbial pin drop. The perfection of its performance was fully realized by one and all and a storm of applause greeted the conductor and players at its conclusion, M. Rabaud returning several times in acknowledgment.

Harold Bauer, coming to Providence after an all-too-long absence, gave a magnificent performance of the Saint-Saens concerto. This artist, one of the few great pianists of the present day, is a player who dignifies and ennobles whatever composition he elects to present. Indeed, there are few, if any, pianists of to-day who combine so many essentials to greatness as he. Absolute self mastery, poise and breadth of vision are the things which immediately impress the listener.

His position in the front rank of the giants of the keyboard is due, not to the possession in extraordinary degree of any single quality, either technique, temperament, musicianship or interpretive ability. These are all his in full measure and all are dominated by a towering intellect. What wonder, then, that the brilliant Saint-Saens concerto was made a vital, glowing tone picture which not only ravished the ear, but was an intellectual treat for the musician as well. As a rule, piano concertos with orchestra are not particularly grateful medium for an artist, owing to the solo part being submerged to a great extent in the ensemble. More than usual opportunity is given in the Saint-Saens C-minor for the player to show to advantage and Mr. Bauer electrified his audience by the beauty and nobility of his tone, his brilliance and, above all, his breadth of conception. Runs light as air or thunderous effects, which, however, never degenerate into mere noise, are but the servants of a masterful and artistic mind. Such playing never fails of proper appreciation and Mr. Bauer was recalled again and again.

Beethoven's Symphony in F-major, No. 8, concluded the programme. The composer is said to have called it "a little symphony in F." It is joyful in character and shows the great master in his gayest mood. The second movement, the Allegretto scherzando, is supposed to be based on a three voice round which was sung in honor of Malzel, the inventor of the metronome, at a farewell dinner given to Beethoven as he was about to leave Vienna in 1812. It is humorous in effect and its character bears out the story. The prevailing musical lightheartedness of the symphony was reflected by M. Rabaud's skilful interpretation, and the men responded to his decisive beat with splendid unanimity. The audience was a large one, an increase in attendance over that at the first concert being noted.

...ON

...OTHER PICTURES OF INTEREST

ALFRED CORTOT, THE FIRST AMONG FRENCH PIANISTS, WHO CAME TO THIS COUNTRY WITH THE "CONSERVATOIRE" ORCHESTRA, AND PLAYED WITH THEM AND IN HIS OWN RECITALS. IN EUROPE, M. CORTOT IS KNOWN AS MUCH MORE THAN A PIANIST. HE HAS STAGED AND CONDUCTED WAGNER, ORGANIZED CHORAL CONCERTS ON A LARGE SCALE, POPULAR CONCERTS, CONCERTS FOR THE INTRODUCTION OF NEW MUSIC, AND CONDUCTED THEM ALL WITH GREAT SUCCESS.

Alfred Cortot, pianist.

Alfred Cortot, soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, made a marked impression upon the country when he came from his native France with the Conservatoire Orchestra, playing with them, and in his own recitals. He is known in Europe as a great deal more than the first pianist of France. He conducted at Bayreuth, and then, in Paris, staged and conducted unforgettable performances of "Tristan" and "Gotterdammerung." He also organized and conducted some choral concerts on a large scale, with such works as Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," Liszt's "St. Elizabeth," Brahm's Requiem, "Parsifal," in choral version, and a special concert series for introducing new and worthy music. He formed a notable trio with Thibaud and Casals. When the war came, Mr. Cortot offered his full services to his country, playing to the soldiers and teaching them, founding a society for the aid of musicians and actors suffering from the war.

At the coming concerts Mr. Cortot is to play Franck's "Variations Symphoniques" and d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." The other numbers will be Hadley's Symphonic Fantasia (first time at these concerts) and J. S. Bach's suite in D major, No. 3.

...STINGUISHED AS PIANIST AND AS LEADER IN FRANCE

ALFRED CORTOT

The Parisian pianist, who made a profound impression here earlier in the winter with Mr. Messager's orchestra, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts next week. In Paris he is a well-known figure in the music world. He is a pianist of the Wagner music dramas, organized choral concerts, popular concerts and special concerts devoted to new music of worth. His war services consisted of collecting funds, teaching soldiers and arranging concerts at military hospitals. His one performance in Boston was so successful that the management of the Boston Orchestra immediately invited him to play with the local organization.

...ITY CIR...

...ports yet.

...ined with ... say it makes a good jag.

The police are endeavoring to find a way to stop the sale of Jamaica ginger ... stores ... have been warned to cut out the practice.

GIVES BEETHOVEN'S FIFTH SYMPHONY

Never before since assuming the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has Mr. Rabaud aroused such enthusiasm as attended his reading of Beethoven's symphony in C minor at yesterday afternoon's concert. The large audience not only applauded enthusiastically at every opportunity, but recalled Mr. Rabaud to the stage at its close until he called upon the players to rise in their places and share in the tribute. It was a brilliant performance well worthy of ranking with the orchestra's best.

Miss Mabel Garrison, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera House, the soloist of the concert, scored more noticeably with Edgar Stillman Kelley's "A California Idyl," than with her Mozart selection. The Kelley number is more within her present abilities.

Saint-Saens's symphonic poem "Phaeton" and Lalo's rhapsody ... completed ...

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18,

...AIM ...ILL ...S

CALIFORNIA IDYL OFFERED AT SYMPHONY

Work's Chief Value Is as Soprano Display Piece

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Henri Rabaud, conductor; Mabel Garrison, soprano, soloist. Eleventh concert of the season. The program:—

Beethoven—Symphony, No. 5, in C minor.
Mozart—Recitative, "Mia Speranza Adorata."
Saint-Saens—"Phaeton."
Kelley—"A California Idyl."
Lalo—Rhapsody in A minor.

Coloratura sopranos have bemoaned, especially of late, the scarcity of music for their style of singing. Blamed for singing "Ernani, Involami," "Caro Nome," "Proch's Variations" and the like, they place the blame on the present day composer, who writes practically nothing for coloratura soprano. Not long ago one of the leading composers of the day showed the writer five letters from five distinguished soprano singers, all asking for a coloratura composition for their programs. Possibly the extreme scarcity ...

NEW ITALIAN MUSIC

...ornate music recom... man Kelley's composition to Miss ... rison. The song is a musical setting of a rather long love poem by Charles Kelley. The narration of the song, which is written for high soprano, is broken by the introduction at one place of vocal fireworks, runs, etc. The song is ended so to give the soprano a chance to sing a florid passage and end on an applause getting high note.

The music has little to recommend it save as a vehicle for the display of a high- flexible voice. It is not distinguished in subject matter; it ... heavily orchestrated.

Miss Garrisons' voice is a delightful one, a voice that just misses being really distinguished. Unlike many of her coloratura sisters her voice has neither edge, whiteness, nor metallic harshness. Lacking these most undesirable qualities it also lacks one desirable quality in a voice that sings the coloratura roles: brilliancy. At no time when we have heard Miss Garrison, and, barring yesterday, we have heard her only a few times in opera, has her voice possessed the brilliancy, the sparkle, the dazzling diamond beauty which have distinguished the voices of her great predecessors at the Metropolitan Opera House. The chief lovliness of her voice is its silken quality, its lyrice beauty, which it keeps both in all its tessitura and in most elaborate passages. The voice is not a large one. There is just a hint that it has not reached its full maturity, in size, even at this late hour of its development.

The Saint-Saens "Phaeton" was brilliantly played. This program music with its anapestic, rhythmic galloping of the horses that drag the sun through the heavens, its striking Phaeton theme, its furious drive through the skies and the crashing thunderbolt, stirred an audience lulled by a very Mozartian recitative.

The symphony, the very brain of Beethoven, was superbly read and superbly played. The ponderings of the musician, his happiness, his dejection and his visions were all given a glowing, a tragic, but never a merely theatrical reading. There was long applause after the symphony. Mr. Rabaud justly insisted that the members of the orchestra should share the applause with him.

DI...

From JOURNAL
Address Providence, R. I.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY STIRS ENTHUSIASM

Receives Hearty Welcome at Second Concert of Season.

HAROLD BAUER IS SOLOIST

Works by Schubert and Beethoven Are Orchestral Features, While Famous Pianist Scores Success in Saint-Saens' Concerto. — Large Audience Greets Players.

Enthusiasm was the dominant note at Infantry Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played here for the second time this season. And for the second time in Providence this magnificent band of musicians played the national anthem with wonderful breadth and grandeur. It was an inspiring beginning of an unusually fine concert.

For this performance Conductor Rabaud provided a programme of rich musical fare, presenting two symphonies, and, between them, a piano concerto with Harold Bauer as soloist. The Schubert Unfinished Symphony in B-minor and the Beethoven Symphony in F-major were the concert's opening and closing numbers, and Mr. Bauer chose Saint-Saen's brilliant C-minor concerto.

After the uplifting patriotic beginning the audience settled down for the enjoyment of Schubert's finest orchestral work. In no other composer's symphonic writing do we hear a more delightful and spontaneous outpouring of music than in this highly original work. Unlike other great composers of his time, Schubert did not achieve particular immediate success in the symphonic field. In fact, for the most part his earlier works of this kind do not compare in beauty, individuality and interest with this unfinished one in B-minor and his symphony in C-major. In these, in a style borrowed from no other composer, and in a manner expressing the traits so beautifully promised in his songs and lesser writings, he reaches the heights of refinement and beauty.

M. Rabaud, with that keen perception and spirituality which semed to inhere in the nature of the cultivated French musician, led his orchestra through the symphony's two movements with delightful result. The second movement, in particular, created an atmosphere of musical enchantment. The constant interruptions of wood-wind and horns seemed voices, mysterious, remote, while the strings sang ethereal accompaniment. The pure beauty of this movement held the audience enthralled. One might have heard the proverbial pin drop. The perfection of its performance was fully realized by one and all and a storm of applause greeted the conductor and players at its conclusion, M. Rabaud returning several times in acknowledgment.

Harold Bauer, coming to Providence after an all-too-long absence, gave a magnificent performance of the Saint-Saens concerto. This artist, one of the few great pianists of the present day, is a player who dignifies and ennobles whatever composition he elects to present. Indeed, there are few, if any, pianists of to-day who combine so many essentials to greatness as he. Absolute self mastery, poise and breadth of vision are the things which immediately impress the listener.

His position in the front rank of the giants of the keyboard is due, not to the possession in extraordinary degree of any single quality, either technique, temperament, musicianship or interpretive ability. These are all his in full measure and all are dominated by a towering intellect. What wonder, then, that the brilliant Saint-Saens concerto was made a vital, glowing tone picture which not only ravished the ear, but was an intellectual treat for the musician as well. As a rule, piano concertos with orchestra are not particularly grateful medium for an artist, owing to the solo part being submerged to a great extent in the ensemble. More than usual opportunity is given in the Saint-Saens C-minor to for the player to show to advantage and Mr. Bauer electrified his audience by the beauty and nobility of his tone, his brilliance and, above all, his breadth of conception. Runs light as air or thunderous effects, which, however, never degenerate into mere noise, are but the servants of a masterful and artistic mind. Such playing never fails of proper appreciation and Mr. Bauer was recalled again and again.

Beethoven's Symphony in F-major, No. 8, concluded the programme. The composer is said to have called it "a little symphony in F." It is joyful in character and shows the great master in his gayest mood. The second movement, the Allegretto scherzando, is supposed to be based on a three voice round which was sung in honor of Malzel, the inventor of the metronome, at a farewell dinner given to Beethoven as he was about to leave Vienna in 1812. It is humorous in effect and its character bears out the story. The prevailing musical lightheartedness of the symphony was reflected by M. Rabaud's skilful interpretation, and the men responded to his decisive beat with splendid unanimity. The audience was a large one, an increase in attendance over that at the first concert being noted.

ION

OTHER PICTURES OF INTEREST

ALFRED CORTOT, THE FIRST AMONG FRENCH PIANISTS, WHO CAME TO THIS COUNTRY WITH THE "CONSERVATOIRE" ORCHESTRA, AND PLAYED WITH THEM AND IN HIS OWN RECITALS. IN EUROPE, M. CORTOT IS KNOWN AS MUCH MORE THAN A PIANIST. HE HAS STAGED AND CONDUCTED WAGNER, ORGANIZED CHORAL CONCERTS ON A LARGE SCALE, POPULAR CONCERTS, CONCERTS FOR THE INTRODUCTION OF NEW MUSIC, AND CONDUCTED THEM ALL WITH GREAT SUCCESS.

Alfred Cortot, pianist.

Alfred Cortot, soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, made a marked impression upon the country when he came from his native France with the Conservatoire Orchestra, playing with them, and in his own recitals. He is known in Europe as a great deal more than the first pianist of France. He conducted at Bayreuth, and then, in Paris, staged and conducted unforgettable performances of "Tristan" and "Gotterdammerung." He also organized and conducted some choral concerts on a large scale, with such works as Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," Liszt's "St. Elizabeth," Brahm's Requiem, "Parsifal," in choral version, and a special concert series for introducing new and worthy music. He formed a notable trio with Thibaud and Casals. When the war came, Mr. Cortot offered his full services to his country, playing to the soldiers and teaching them, founding a society for the aid of musicians and actors suffering from the war.

At the coming concerts Mr. Cortot is to play Franck's "Variations Symphoniques" and d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." The other numbers will be Hadley's Symphonic Fantasia (first time at these concerts) and J. S. Bach's suite in D major, No. 3.

NEW ITALIAN MUSIC

ISTINGUISHED AS PIANIST AND AS LEADER IN FRANCE

ALFRED CORTOT

The Parisian pianist, who made a profound impression here earlier in the winter with Mr. Messager's orchestra, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts next week. In Paris he is a well-known figure in the music world. He is a pianist of the Wagner music dramas, organized choral concerts, popular concerts and special concerts devoted to new music of worth. His war services consisted of collecting funds, teaching soldiers and arranging concerts at military hospitals. His one performance in Boston was so successful that the management of the Boston Orchestra immediately invited him to play with the local organization.

GIVES BEETHOVEN'S FIFTH SYMPHONY

Never before since assuming the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has Mr. Rabaud aroused such enthusiasm as attended his reading of Beethoven's symphony in C minor at yesterday afternoon's concert. The large audience not only applauded enthusiastically at every opportunity, but recalled Mr. Rabaud to the stage at its close until he called upon the players to rise in their places and share in the tribute. It was a brilliant performance well worthy of ranking with the orchestra's best.

Miss Mabel Garrison, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera House, the soloist of the concert, scored more noticeably with Edgar Stillman Kelley's "A California Idyl," than with her Mozart selection. The Kelley number is more within her present abilities.

Saint-Saens's symphonic poem "Phaeton" and Lalo's rhapsody completed the program.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18,

CALIFORNIA IDYL OFFERED AT SYMPHONY

Work's Chief Value Is as Soprano Display Piece

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Henri Rabaud, conductor; Mabel Garrison, soprano, soloist. Eleventh concert of the season. The program:—

Beethoven—Symphony, No. 5, in C minor.
Mozart—Recitative, "Mia Speranza Adorata."
Saint-Saens—"Phaeton."
Kelley—"A California Idyl."
Lalo—Rhapsody in A minor.

Coloratura sopranos have bemoaned, especially of late, the scarcity of music for their style of singing. Blamed for singing "Ernani, Involami," "Caro Nome," "Proch's Variations" and the like, they place the blame on the present day composer, who writes practically nothing for coloratura soprano. Not long ago one of the leading composers of the day showed the writer five letters from five distinguished soprano singers, all asking for a coloratura composition for their programs. Possibly the extreme scarcity of such ornate music recommended man Kelley's composition to Miss Garrison. The song is a musical setting of a rather long love poem by Charles Kelley. The narration of the song, which is written for high soprano, is broken by the introduction at one place of vocal fireworks, runs, etc. The song is ended so to give the soprano a chance to sing a florid passage and end on an applause getting high note.

The music has little to recommend it save as a vehicle for the display of a high- flexible voice. It is not distinguished in subject matter; it is heavily orchestrated.

Miss Garrisons' voice is a delightful one, a voice that just misses being really distinguished. Unlike many of her coloratura sisters her voice has neither edge, whiteness, nor metallic harshness. Lacking these most undesirable qualities it also lacks one desirable quality in a voice that sings the coloratura roles: brilliancy. At no time when we have heard Miss Garrison, and, barring yesterday, we have heard her only a few times in opera, has her voice possessed the brilliancy, the sparkle, the dazzling diamond beauty which have distinguished the voices of her great predecessors at the Metropolitan Opera House. The chief lovliness of her voice is its silken quality, its lyrice beauty, which it keeps both in all its tessitura and in most elaborate passages. The voice is not a large one. There is just a hint that it has not reached its full maturity, in size, even at this late hour of its development.

The Saint-Saens "Phaeton" was brilliantly played. This program music with its anapestic, rhythmic galloping of the horses that drag the sun through the heavens, its striking Phaeton theme, its furious drive through the skies and the crashing thunderbolt, stirred an audience lulled by a very Mozartian recitative.

The symphony, the very brain of Beethoven, was superbly read and superbly played. The ponderings of the musician, his happiness, his dejection and his visions were all given a glowing, a tragic, but never a merely theatrical reading. There was long applause after the symphony. Mr. Rabaud justly insisted that the members of the orchestra should share the applause with him.

Symphony and Other Concerts

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. CORTOT SHINES OUT OF TWO NOTABLE PIECES

The Pianist in a Vivid Performance of Franck's Symphonic Variations and in Signal Share in d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air—Eloquent Music in Revealing and Stirring Voice—The Contrast of Other Numbers

As often of late at the Symphony Concerts, the "assisting artist," yesterday afternoon, again stimulated orchestra and conductor, engrossed and stirred the audience, did much to make the numbers in which he joined the distinctive and pleasurable items of the programme. In a sense newcomer, he was not altogether unknown to his hearers since he had played here, though to a different company, three months ago. Yet the Alfred Cortot who was then heard with the orchestra of the Conservatory in Paris in one of Saint-Saëns's concertos, was hardly the pianist who now bore signal part in Franck's Symphonic Variations and d'Indy's symphony "On a Mountain Song." With Mr. Cortot, as with many another, the better the medium, the better the deed. The polished surfaces, the brittle artifice of Saint-Saëns's concerto in C minor—the piece of last October—could only hint at the larger abilities, the finer powers evoked by Franck and d'Indy in music of warmer and deeper mettle. Beyond question, the Cortot of last autumn was an adroit technician, a pianist sensitive to color, alert to rhythm, with a keen ear for the interplay of the voice of his instrument with the voices of the orchestra—a personality withal wearing what certain youths were pleased to call a "romantic mask," animating Saint-Saëns's music by his own ardor of spirit, here and there in pace, inflection or detail setting his individual stamp upon it.

The Cortot of yesterday and of midwinter (as the calendar alleges) was again the masterful technician, keen to rhythm, multifold of color, but now less the virtuoso exhibiting these excellent capacities for their own sake than the musician employing them for the greater glory of the music in hand. Franck's Symphonic Variations are intrinsically a rhapsody for piano and orchestra in which only a pedantic hearer may take thought of the containing form. Once Franck has proposed his fecund motive, he begins to rhapsodize upon it in rich flow of imagination, in high ardor of creative spirit, as he was wont to extemporize in the organ loft of his church in Paris to the delight and the wonder of his hearers. He sets the piano to bright traceries upon the motive made melody and Mr. Cortot wrought them in shimmering lace-work of tone. He infuses into the piano his own zest of improvisation and Mr. Cortot then winged the music with an answering ardor of rhythm and progress. Or he bids the piano weave garlands of counterpoint about his motive—to fall from Mr. Cortot's fingers with fluid grace of line, with play of light and shade upon them as in glints of the composer's and the pianist's fancy. Once and again, Franck allots to the piano the songful voice, wrought by Mr. Cortot in rich contours, pellucid phrase and upspringing course. Toward the end come the measures in which, according to his wont, Franck seems to shower forth music in high exuberance and happy release of exultant spirit. Tossing motive back and forth between piano and orchestra, blending, parting, contrasting their voices, flinging modulation and ornament here, there and everywhere, he summons pianist, players and audience to share in his ecstasy as naïve of spirit as it is often adept in means. Out of Mr. Cortot's playing flashed these fine fires, in the warmth of his own spirit he heated them, while a skill that never failed lay hid beneath the glow of the achievement. Throughout the piece, pianist and composer set sparks as well to conductor or orchestra. For once these Symphonic Variations sounded as the manifold, multicolored, ardent rhapsody that they are. With intensive force Mr. Cortot's personality played upon music and performance. It was the personality of a penetrating and responsive musician, equally rich in romantic spirit, imparting skill, recreative imagination. Yet not a detail of performance seemed to evade his care; while nowhere did he thrust himself through the music. There was rhapsodic passion, as the music well warrants; there was also poise.

Romantic music, likewise, is d'Indy's symphonic fantasia upon the mountain air of the Cévennes—a song that even within the four walls of a concert-hall seems to sound from some distant height in an open country, calling with arresting voice to the dreamer of dreams, the seer of visions. Perhaps d'Indy heard it sung as Mr. Speyer, new and fortunate comer to the woodwind choir, played it yesterday; perhaps the composer's own prompting, like that of the virtuoso, added a little to the haunting quality. Upon it, as upon a generating motive, d'Indy writes a succession of orchestral variations, with the piano often as distinctive instrument of his band. If the hearer choose so to regard the piece, he may find in it much studious reflection, much expert workmanship in the transformations, manipulations, re-incarnations, that the mountain-song undergoes in the three divisions of the fantasia. He will be in the fashion and in accord with the conventional labels, if he so listens to the music. Yet often he will lose his way, unless he happens to be uncommonly acute in such listening, while at the end he will be as one who may not see the glories of the wood because he is so closely scrutinizing the trees.

No more than the rest of d'Indy's music do these variations justify such reduction to formal abstraction. Rather, each transformation of the song is prompted by clear mood, enriched with warm and various imagination. The like-minded listener may hear music in which the air is amplified, transfigured, glorified, gladdened. He may hear music again in which it becomes the voice of longing, calling afar and mysteriously as through mists. Or, yet again, it beats in the rhythms to which d'Indy sets it, shines in the colors in which he clothes it as though it sounded against bright expanse of mountain sky, as though it were borne upon mountain wind keen, fleet and strong. Or once more, the composer takes it as he might some cherished object and weaves harmonic and instrumental fancies upon it. More and more as the fantasia proceeds, the air seems to possess d'Indy, mind and heart, body and soul, until he must set himself free by some such demoniac exercism as that of the finale. Into reiterated, obstinate, blazing dance, tarantilla-like, he transforms this many-voiced song. The music spins in it; the music shouts it; the music flares with it. Nor is there end until the song, thus whipped and maddened, rushes away down the world.

When the song is one of mystery, of longing, d'Indy writes a music of beauty; when it clangs or whirls out of other measures in other moods, he writes a music of power. Everywhere also he writes in these variations a fecund and ingenious music, weaving itself from itself manifold though it be, the warmth of his heart, quickening as it were his inventiveness of mind, his skill of hand. To crown this fecundity, this skill, he sets within the fantasia a piano part, seemingly designed to play in light and shade upon the song and then to be the lash that, darting in and out of the music, whips the air into the whirl of the end. Through the first and the second division of the fantasia, Mr. Cortot played this part with an unerring sense of the color it was to thread into the music, with as flawless touch in the gaining of it. In the third division he and the song at his hands became energizing force to the performance, even as did his playing in Franck's Symphonic Variations. So in Mr. Cortot finesse and power, poise and ardor are in complement upon the music. Hardly less, however, had conductor and orchestra answered to d'Indy through the whole fantasia. As with the fifth symphony of Beethoven a week ago, Mr. Rabaud no longer heard with impersonal ear, saw no longer with the purely objective eye.

In all this, perhaps, there was passing enlightenment to those who take their cue from the scorners in good Parisian fashion of what passes there as 'official French music." D'Indy himself has spoken and written despitefully of it as the means to advancement in a withered and self-centred hierarchy; Debussy shot upon it many a shaft of wit; Ravel has not been sparing of scornful word; nearly every "light" of the younger Parisian generation mocks at it. Our younger generation on this side of the sea warms to music that these composers write, accepts their point of view of cognate matters. Yet here is Mr. Cortot, who is of the official hierarchy, giving clear proof of signal and individual qualities, while, as the Symphony Concerts of late have disclosed, not always does Mr. Rabaud conduct, as Ravel once put it, "with respect." And yet, and yet, there was cause for wonder why he should have included in his programme of yesterday, Mr. Hadley's Symphonic Fantasia, no more than a fluent, well-made, well-sounding piece according to the conventions of a post-Wagnerian day, and why he should have led through Bach's Suite in D major with so rigid a pace and rhythm, with so little shading and modulating of the interwoven voices. Mr. Hadley's fantasia is as routine music-making in kind as ever fell from any Parisian academic "hierarchy," while Bach played "with respect" is a Bach left lifeless and uncharactered. H. T. P.

CONCERT CALENDAR

Mr. Rakhmaninov With the Symphony Orchestra — Rabaud and Brahms — Mr. Hofmann in a Novel Programme—Miss Torpadie Returns—Mr. Heifetz and Mme. Gluck Anew—The Berkshire Quartet and Miss Christie, Pianist

With a symphony of Brahms on the programme of the Symphony Concerts for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Rabaud (as some will say) draws perilously near to the "modern" and unhallowed German composers. Yet, though Brahms did not die until 1897 and is reported to have spoken of the English without proper respect, the testiest of war-time censors of concerts has laid no "ban" upon his pieces. Therefore his second symphony, in D major—the most lyrical of the four—receives place again at the Symphony Concerts, and for the first time Bostonians may hear the voice that a conservative and objective French conductor draws from his music. The other major piece of a somewhat austere programme is Rakhmaninov's concerto in C minor for piano and orchestra in which the composer himself plays the solo part. The music, already heard here more than once, runs in grave and lofty vein, taxing the large perceptions as well as the technical dexterities of the pianist. Being such, it accords well with the new powers of Mr. Rakhmaninov as two of his own concerts have lately disclosed them here; while to all and sundry in the audiences of next week he will be one of the outstanding figures of the current musical year. For forepiece to the concerto and the symphony, Mr. Rabaud has set an orchestral interlude from Bruneau's opera, "Messidor," one of his earlier pieces of the theatres and written, of course, to a text by Zola.

Mr. Hofmann's Americans

Retu for 'th
phony set hi gramm seek pi posers, spirited enough and su and va stands
Introduc
"Restles
Interlude
Country
Clou

Roman Valse
"Birds
"Fire
Sonat

Some still mat pose Tog of v tige
co

noble pages.

There are rare moments when it seems the privilege of musicians to have brought into the very concert room the presence of the composer whom they invoke. Pianist and conductor, both Frenchmen, both well endowed by nature to perceive as to translate this score, touched it yesterday with reverent hands. Their labor was as one of love, celebrating also the glory of their elder colleague. In an age when aspiration daily jogs elbows with materialism, he cannot and will not often find such exponents in pianist, conductor or orchestra.

Mr Cortot was given such an ovation as few soloists receive from this audience. The manner of this young artist, far from that of the virtuoso, is rather of the man who would more happily honor the composer and his colleagues than himself.

D'Indy's Symphony for Orchestra and Pianoforte on a French Mountain Song was a fitting sequel. The plaintive air, given out by the English horn—marking the newly arriving Mr Speyer, an artist on his instrument—is one of the souvenirs taken by d'Indy from his Cevennes. Here is a folk melody, strange and haunting, as though escaping in purer mountain heights the baser alloy of earth, its people and their songs.

This is not music to be chosen by all. There is too much out of beaten paths. There are verbose, abstract passages to casual, perhaps even to studied hearing, but where are such pages as those of the last movement, when the spirit of this fugitive air, wild as the cry of an untamed bird, seems metamorphosed into incarnate rhythmic fury, catching in its clutches all who ever may have sung it, and whirling them in a demonaic spirit of the dance over precipice and abyss, peopled only by the echoes of its melody. In such superbly eloquent and realistic manner Mr Rabaud, Mr Cortot and the orchestra played it.

Henry Hadley's symphonic fantasia, composed in 1907, played in London and America, began the concert. It praises the composer in sustained vitality, musical significance and effective contrast of ideas over and beyond some of the music, which since has come from his pen.

Bach's suite in D major was played with the discrimination in its various movements, the beautiful air, the stately dances, which Mr Rabaud has shown in all schools, classic or modern.

FRENCH MUSIC SUPERBLY PLAYED

Mr Rabaud, conductor; Mr Cortot, pianist, both of imagination and sensibility, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its present state of virtuosity, unsurpassed, if equaled, lifted yesterday afternoon's concert above those of its series, although no one of them has passed without its own distinction.

Alfred Cortot had played earlier this season with the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, conducted by M Messager. He had revealed a marked talent but gave no such embodiment of his art as now. Frank's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra are not the type of show piece for the casual virtuoso. While there are high demands for pianistic skill, the chief essentials are the perception, understanding and spiritual powers of re-creation by the artist, his sense of the piano as an exalted instrument of the orchestra, the ensemble a mouthpiece for the ecstatic mysticism, the humanity, the childlike joy in the very breath of life which mark these

W. ALLEN SAYC

12TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Players Share Honors with Alfred Cortot, Who Is at the Piano

HADLEY'S FANTASIA SHOWS HIS FLUENCY

By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Hadley, Symphonic Fantasia, op. 46; Bach, Suite in D major, No. 3; Franck, Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra; d'Indy, Symphony for orchestra and piano on a French Mountain Song. Alfred Cortot was the pinaist. He played with this orchestra for the first time.

Mr. Hadley has such facility in composition and is so prolific that one imagines him seated at his desk, writing with both hands. Now it is a symphonic poem and now it is an opera; a cantata or a Symphony; some translation of a poem into orchestral music; chamber music, a song. Is it not possible that he thus does himself injustice? At present he reminds one of the man that fell into the deplorable habit of taking a drink between drinks. Mr. Hadley writes music between compositions. This symphonic fantasia, at least a dozen years old, played here yesterday for the first time, is a less ambitious work than his symphonic poems and symphonies that have been performed here. The orchestral music by him that we have heard was agreeable at the time. One recognized a certain technical skill, the ability to produce euphonious sounds by combinations and contrasts of instruments, but one failed to find individual invention. There was little or nothing that was remembered the next week. The music had not such decided flavor that one might have at once said: "This is by Hadley." Fluent music, but without marked characteristics. And so it is with this fantasia. Here and there the influence of Wagner is clearly shown, as in the fortissimo pages that open the main body of the composition; the Wagner of the earlier years. It is not surprising that Mr. Hadley, having studied, dwelt and conducted in Austria and Germany should have submitted to this influence. Few Americans, Germans, Frenchmen or Italians escaped it. There are some pleasant pages in this fantasia, but it is to be regretted that Mr. Hadley writes so easily and so much; that he seems to be contented with whatever comes into his head and rushes at once to his desk.

Bach's Suite gave pleasure, especially the famous Air, and the Gavottes; yet the Air, sung beautifully by the violins, was not so fully appreciated as on certain other occasions; or perhaps the pleasure of the audience was too deep for barbarous recognition by handclapping.

Mr. Cortot's eminence as a virtuoso-musician was at once appreciated here when he played Saint-Saens's fourth concerto with the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory three months ago. Yesterday instead of choosing some flamboyant piece to win plaudits easily by an individual tour de force, he selected two works in which the piano is one instrument of many: this is especially true of d'Indy's symphony. Nevertheless he excited not only the unbounded admiration of musicians, but engrossed the attention of the others in the audience and awakened the enthusiasm of even those whose first question in regard to a symphony concert is this: "Who is the soloist?" He displayed the finest musical intelligence served by a technical proficiency so pronounced that no one thought of it but took it as a matter of course. What an infinite variety of tonal beauty! One had hardly realized before this how musical an instrument the piano could be. The music itself was, indeed, worthy of his fingers, brain and soul. For in these compositions the mystical Franck and the "cerebral" Vincent d'Indy are romanticists in the modern significance of the word, without too great respect for formalism, worshippers, and at the same time priests, at the shrine of beauty. Performances like those of the Variations and the Symphony have been rare in the whole history of the orchestra. Mr. Cortot, whose unassumed modesty is ingratiating, was only just when he insisted that Mr. Rabaud should share with him in the applause; yet there were more than two artists on the stage; there was the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Bruneau, Entr'acte from "Messidor"; Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 2, C minor; Brahms, Symphony No. 2. Mr. Rachmaninoff will be the pianist.

GIVES TRAVELOGUE ON YANKS IN FRANCE

RG
tilated Sparta-a mob in the

Thea
Over

Symphony and Other Concerts

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. CORTOT SHINES OUT OF TWO NOTABLE PIECES

The Pianist in a Vivid Performance of Franck's Symphonic Variations and in Signal Share in d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air—Eloquent Music in Revealing and Stirring Voice—The Contrast of Other Numbers

As often of late at the Symphony Concerts, the "assisting artist," yesterday afternoon, again stimulated orchestra and conductor, engrossed and stirred the audience, did much to make the numbers in which he joined the distinctive and pleasurable items of the programme. In a sense newcomer, he was not altogether unknown to his hearers since he had played here, though to a different company, three months ago. Yet the Alfred Cortot who was then heard with the orchestra of the Conservatory in Paris in one of Saint-Saëns's concertos, was hardly the pianist who now bore signal part in Franck's Symphonic Variations and d'Indy's symphony "On a Mountain Song." With Mr. Cortot, as with many another, the better the medium, the better the deed. The polished surfaces, the brittle artifice of Saint-Saëns's concerto in C minor—the piece of last October—could only hint at the larger abilities, the finer powers evoked by Franck and d'Indy in music of warmer and deeper mettle. Beyond question, the Cortot of last autumn was an adroit technician, a pianist sensitive to color, alert to rhythm, with a keen ear for the interplay of the voice of his instrument with the voices of the orchestra—a personality withal wearing what certain youths were pleased to call a "romantic mask," animating Saint-Saëns's music by his own ardor of spirit, here and there in pace, inflection or detail setting his individual stamp upon it.

The Cortot of yesterday and of midwinter (as the calendar alleges) was again the masterful technician, keen to rhythm, multifold of color, but now less the virtuoso exhibiting these excellent capacities for their own sake than the musician employing them for the greater glory of the music in hand. Franck's Symphonic Variations are intrinsically a rhapsody for piano and orchestra in which only a pedantic hearer may take thought of the containing form. Once Franck has proposed his fecund motive, he begins to rhapsodize upon it in rich flow of imagination, in high ardor of creative spirit, as he was wont to extemporize in the organ loft of his church in Paris to the delight and the wonder of his hearers. He sets the piano to bright traceries upon the motive made melody and Mr. Cortot wrought them in shimmering lace-work of tone. He infuses into the piano his own zest of improvisation and Mr. Cortot then winged the music with an answering ardor of rhythm and progress. Or he bids the piano weave garlands of counterpoint about his motive—to fall from Mr. Cortot's fingers with fluid grace of line, with play of light and shade upon them as in glints of the composer's and the pianist's fancy. Once and again, Franck allots to the piano the songful voice, wrought by Mr. Cortot in rich contours, pellucid phrase and upspringing course. Toward the end come the measures in which, according to his wont. Franck seems to shower forth music in high exuberance and happy release of exultant spirit. Tossing motive back and forth between piano and orchestra, blending, parting, contrasting their voices, flinging modulation and ornament here, there and everywhere, he summons pianist, players and audience to share in his ecstasy as naïve of spirit as it is often adept in means. Out of Mr. Cortot's playing flashed these fine fires, in the warmth of his own spirit he heated them, while a skill that never failed lay hid beneath the glow of the achievement. Throughout the piece, pianist and composer set sparks as well to conductor or orchestra. For once these Symphonic Variations sounded as the manifold, multicolored, ardent rhapsody that they are. With intensive force Mr. Cortot's personality played upon music and performance. It was the personality of a penetrating and responsive musician, equally rich in romantic spirit, imparting skill, recreative imagination. Yet not a detail of performance seemed to evade his care; while nowhere did he thrust himself through the music. There was rhapsodic passion, as the music well warrants; there was also poise.

Romantic music, likewise, is d'Indy's symphonic fantasia upon the mountain air of the Cévennes—a song that even within the four walls of a concert-hall seems to sound from some distant height in an open country, calling with arresting voice to the dreamer of dreams, the seer of visions. Perhaps d'Indy heard it sung as Mr. Speyer, new and fortunate comer to the woodwind choir, played it yesterday; perhaps the composer's own prompting, like that of the virtuoso, added a little to the haunting quality. Upon it, as upon a generating motive, d'Indy writes a succession of orchestral variations, with the piano often as distinctive instrument of his band. If the hearer choose so to regard the piece, he may find in it much studious reflection, much expert workmanship in the transformations, manipulations, re-incarnations, that the mountain-song undergoes in the three divisions of the fantasia. He will be in the fashion and in accord with the conventional labels, if he so listens to the music. Yet often he will lose his way, unless he happens to be uncommonly acute in such listening, while at the end he will be as one who may not see the glories of the wood because he is so closely scrutinizing the trees.

No more than the rest of d'Indy's music do these variations justify such reduction to formal abstraction. Rather, each transformation of the song is prompted by clear mood, enriched with warm and various imagination. The like-minded listener may hear music in which the air is amplified, transfigured, glorified, gladdened. He may hear music again in which it becomes the voice of longing, calling afar and mysteriously as through mists. Or, yet again, it beats in the rhythms to which d'Indy sets it, shines in the colors in which he clothes it as though it sounded against bright expanse of mountain sky, as though it were borne upon mountain wind keen, fleet and strong. Or once more, the composer takes it as he might some cherished object and weaves harmonic and instrumental fancies upon it. More and more as the fantasia proceeds, the air seems to possess d'Indy, mind and heart, body and soul, until he must set himself free by some such demoniac exercism as that of the finale. Into reiterated, obstinate, blazing dance, tarantilla-like, he transforms this many-voiced song. The music spins in it; the music shouts it; the music flares with it. Nor is there end until the song, thus whipped and maddened, rushes away down the world.

When the song is one of mystery, of longing, d'Indy writes a music of beauty; when it clangs or whirls out of other measures in other moods, he writes a music of power. Everywhere also he writes in these variations a fecund and ingenious music, weaving itself from itself manifold though it be, the warmth of his heart, quickening as it were his inventiveness of mind, his skill of hand. To crown this fecundity, this skill, he sets within the fantasia a piano part, seemingly designed to play in light and shade upon the song and then to be the lash that, darting in and out of the music, whips the air into the whirl of the end. Through the first and the second division of the fantasia, Mr. Cortot played this part with an unerring sense of the color it was to thread into the music, with as flawless touch in the gaining of it. In the third division he and the song at his hands became energizing force to the performance, even as did his playing in Franck's Symphonic Variations. So in Mr. Cortot finesse and power, poise and ardor are in complement upon the music. Hardly less, however, had conductor and orchestra answered to d'Indy through the whole fantasia. As with the fifth symphony of Beethoven a week ago, Mr. Rabaud no longer heard with impersonal ear, saw no longer with the purely objective eye.

In all this, perhaps, there was passing enlightenment to those who take their cue from the scorners in good Parisian fashion of what passes there as 'official French music." D'Indy himself has spoken and written despitefully of it as the means to advancement in a withered and self-centred hierarchy; Debussy shot upon it many a shaft of wit; Ravel has not been sparing of scornful word; nearly every "light" of the younger Parisian generation mocks at it. Our younger generation on this side of the sea warms to music that these composers write, accepts their point of view of cognate matters. Yet here is Mr. Cortot, who is of the official hierarchy, giving clear proof of signal and individual qualities, while, as the Symphony Concerts of late have disclosed, not always does Mr. Rabaud conduct, as Ravel once put it, "with respect." And yet, and yet, there was cause for wonder why he should have included in his programme of yesterday, Mr. Hadley's Symphonic Fantasia, no more than a fluent, well-made, well-sounding piece according to the conventions of a post-Wagnerian day, and why he should have led through Bach's Suite in D major with so rigid a pace and rhythm, with so little shading and modulating of the interwoven voices. Mr. Hadley's fantasia is as routine music-making in kind as ever fell from any Parisian academic "hierarchy," while Bach played "with respect" is a Bach left lifeless and uncharactered. H. T. P.

CONCERT CALENDAR

Mr. Rakhmaninov With the Symphony Orchestra — Rabaud and Brahms — Mr. Hofmann in a Novel Programme—Miss Torpadie Returns—Mr. Heifetz and Mme. Gluck Anew—The Berkshire Quartet and Miss Christie, Pianist

With a symphony of Brahms on the programme of the Symphony Concerts for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Rabaud (as some will say) draws perilously near to the "modern" and unhallowed German composers. Yet, though Brahms did not die until 1897 and is reported to have spoken of the English without proper respect, the testiest of war-time censors of concerts has laid no "ban" upon his pieces. Therefore his second symphony, in D major—the most lyrical of the four—receives place again at the Symphony Concerts, and for the first time Bostonians may hear the voice that a conservative and objective French conductor draws from his music. The other major piece of a somewhat austere programme is Rakhmaninov's concerto in C minor for piano and orchestra in which the composer himself plays the solo part. The music, already heard here more than once, runs in grave and lofty vein, taxing the large perceptions as well as the technical dexterities of the pianist. Being such, it accords well with the new powers of Mr. Rakhmaninov as two of his own concerts have lately disclosed them here; while to all and sundry in the audiences of next week he will be one of the outstanding figures of the current musical year. For forepiece to the concerto and the symphony, Mr. Rabaud has set an orchestral interlude from Bruneau's opera, "Messidor," one of his earlier pieces of the theatres and written, of course, to a text by Zola.

Mr. Hofmann's Americans

Rett
for th
phony set hi gramm seek pi posers, spirited enough and su and va stands:
Introduc
"Restles
Interlude
Country
Cloud
Roman Valse
"Birds
"Fire
Sonat
Some still mat
pos
Tog of tige
co

There are rare moments when it seems the privilege of musicians to have brought into the very concert room the presence of the composer whom they invoke. Pianist and conductor, both Frenchmen, both well endowed by nature to perceive as to translate this score, touched it yesterday with reverent hands. Their labor was as one of love, celebrating also the glory of their elder colleague. In an age when aspiration daily jogs elbows with materialism, he cannot and will not often find such exponents in pianist, conductor or orchestra.

Mr Cortot was given such an ovation as few soloists receive from this audience. The manner of this young artist, far from that of the virtuoso, is rather of the man who would more happily honor the composer and his colleagues than himself.

D'Indy's Symphony for Orchestra and Pianoforte on a French Mountain Song was a fitting sequel. The plaintive air, given out by the English horn—marking the newly arriving Mr Speyer, an artist on his instrument—is one of the souvenirs taken by d'Indy from his Cevennes. Here is a folk melody, strange and haunting, as though escaping in purer mountain heights the baser alloy of earth, its people and their songs.

This is not music to be chosen by all. There is too much out of beaten paths. There are verbose, abstract passages to casual, perhaps even to studied hearing, but where are such pages as those of the last movement, when the spirit of this fugitive air, wild as the cry of an untamed bird, seems metamorphosed into incarnate rhythmic fury, catching in its clutches all who ever may have sung it, and whirling them in a demonaic spirit of the dance over precipice and abyss, peopled only by the echoes of its melody. In such superbly eloquent and realistic manner Mr Rabaud, Mr Cortot and the orchestra played it.

Henry Hadley's symphonic fantasia, composed in 1907, played in London and America, began the concert. It praises the composer in sustained vitality, musical significance and effective contrast of ideas over and beyond some of the music, which since has come from his pen.

Bach's suite in D major was played with the discrimination in its various movements, the beautiful air, the stately dances, which Mr Rabaud has shown in all schools, classic or modern.

FRENCH MUSIC SUPERBLY PLAYED

Mr Rabaud, conductor; Mr Cortot, pianist, both of imagination and sensibility, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its present state of virtuosity, unsurpassed, if equaled, lifted yesterday afternoon's concert above those of its series, although no one of them has passed without its own distinction.

Alfred Cortot had played earlier this season with the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, conducted by M Messager. He had revealed a marked talent but gave no such embodiment of his art as now. Frank's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra are not the type of show piece for the casual virtuoso. While there are high demands for pianistic skill, the chief essentials are the perception, understanding and spiritual powers of re-creation by the artist, his sense of the piano as an exalted instrument of the orchestra, the ensemble a mouthpiece for the ecstatic mysticism, the humanity, the childlike joy in the very breath of life which mark these

12TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Players Share Honors with Alfred Cortot, Who Is at the Piano

HADLEY'S FANTASIA SHOWS HIS FLUENCY

By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Hadley, Symphonic Fantasia, op. 46; Bach, Suite in D major, No. 3; Franck, Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra; d'Indy, Symphony for orchestra and piano on a French Mountain Song. Alfred Cortot was the pinaist. He played with this orchestra for the first time.

Mr. Hadley has such facility in composition and is so prolific that one imagines him seated at his desk, writing with both hands. Now it is a symphonic poem and now it is an opera; a cantata or a Symphony; some translation of a poem into orchestral music; chamber music, a song. Is it not possible that he thus does himself injustice? At present he reminds one of the man that fell into the deplorable habit of taking a drink between drinks. Mr. Hadley writes music between compositions. This symphonic fartasia, at least a dozen years old, played here yesterday for the first time, is a less ambitious work than his symphonic poems and symphonies that have been performed here. The orchestral music by him that we have heard was agreeable at the time. One recognized a certain technical skill, the ability to produce euphonious sounds by combinations and contrasts of instruments, but one failed to find individual invention. There was little or nothing that was remembered the next week. The music had not such decided flavor that one might have at once said: "This is by Hadley." Fluent music, but without marked characteristics. And so it is with this fantasia. Here and there the influence of Wagner is clearly shown, as in the fortissimo pages that open the main body of the composition: the Wagner of the earlier years. It is not surprising that Mr. Hadley, having studied, dwelt and conducted in Austria and Germany should have submitted to this influence. Few Americans, Germans, Frenchmen or Italians escaped it. There are some pleasant pages in this fantasia, but it is to be regretted that Mr. Hadley writes so easily and so much; that he seems to be contented with whatever comes into his head and rushes at once to his desk.

Bach's Suite gave pleasure, especially the famous Air, and the Gavottes; yet the Air, sung beautifully by the violins, was not so fully appreciated as on certain other occasions; or perhaps the pleasure of the audience was too deep for barbarous recognition by handclapping.

Mr. Cortot's eminence as a virtuoso-musician was at once appreciated here when he played Saint-Saens's fourth concerto with the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory three months ago. Yesterday instead of choosing some flamboyant piece to win plaudits easily by an individual tour de force, he selected two works in which the piano is one instrument of many: this is especially true of d'Indy's symphony. Nevertheless he excited not only the unbounded admiration of musicians, but engrossed the attention of the others in the audience and awakened the enthusiasm of even those whose first question in regard to a symphony concert is this: "Who is the soloist?" He displayed the finest musical intelligence served by a technical proficiency so pronounced that no one thought of it but took it as a matter of course. What an infinite variety of tonal beauty! One had hardly realized before this how musical an instrument the piano could be. The music itself was, indeed, worthy of his fingers, brain and soul. For in these compositions the mystical Franck and the "cerebral" Vincent d'Indy are romanticists in the modern significance of the word, without too great respect for formalism, worshippers, and at the same time priests, at the shrine of beauty. Performances like those of the Variations and the Symphony have been rare in the whole history of the orchestra. Mr. Cortot, whose unassumed modesty is ingratiating, was only just when he insisted that Mr. Rabaud should share with him in the applause; yet there were more than two artists on the stage; there was the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Bruneau, Entr'acte from "Messidor"; Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 2, C minor; Brahms, Symphony No. 2. Mr. Rachmaninoff will be the pianist.

GIVES TRAVELOGUE ON YANKS IN FRANCE

More of d'Indy's music was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its twelfth program, heard on the afternoon of Friday, Jan. 24, Mr. Alfred Cortot playing the piano part in the "Symphony on a French Mountain Song," Op. 25. Being closer akin to program music than is the string quartet, the moments of pure musical inspiration are fewer. Mr. Cortot submerged himself in the ranks of the players, and made no attempt to turn the symphony into a concerto. Mr. Rabaud, as is the case with all that he does, showed perfect familiarity with the score and a great anxiety to do justice to its poetry and beauty. Mr. Cortot's ability to exert just the right amount of force through his fingers at just the right instant to bring about the elasticity in a phrase that marks the true artist was in evidence in the César Franck symphonic variations. These found much favor with the audience, which gave the soloist long and loud applause. No pianist has been heard in Symphony Hall this year who can put more poetry into his tone than can Mr. Cortot. The program began with a symphonic fantasia, Op. 46, by Henry Hadley, heard for the first time at these concerts. The work suggests Wagnerian influence, but with a striving along approved lines for modernity. On the program was the Bach suite in D major, No. 3, which plentifully satisfied any yearnings for structural and melodic music.

Sunday af[illegible]

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be soloist at the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities instead of Mr. Arthur Rubinstein, who, unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagements. The schedule for the next two weeks runs as follows:

Worcester, Massachusetts, on Tuesday evening, Jan. 28. The soloist will be the American contralto, Mme. Merle Alcock.

Boston, Jan. 31 and Feb. 1. The soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff.

Washington New National Theatre, Monday afternoon, Feb. 3. Soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff.

Baltimore, Lyric Theater, Tuesday evening, Feb. 4. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

Philadelphia, Academy of Music, Wednesday evening, Feb. 5. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

New York, Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 6.

Brooklyn, Academy of Music, Friday evening, Feb. 7. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

New York, Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, Feb. 8.

1919

MORE PIANISM OF HIGH ORDER AT THE SYMPHONY

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Henri Rabaud, conductor; Alfred Cortot, pianist, soloist. Twelfth concert of the season, Symphony Hall. The program:—

J. S. Bach—Orchestral Suite in D major.
Franck—Symphonic Variations.
Hadley—Symphonic Fantasia.
D'Indy—Symphony on a Mountain Air.

Early in the fall this promised to be a violinistic year. Pianists, so the outlook seemed, were to be rare birds. Yet this has developed decidedly into a pianistic, rather than a violinistic, season. Of the fiddlers that great and glorious youth, Jascha Heifetz, is with us again. Mr. Rosen, much anticipated, came, but did not create the expected furore. Mr. Seidel, most eagerly anticipated of the younger violinists excepting Mr. Heifetz, has not appeared as yet. Other fiddlers seek non-Bostonianical fields and box offices. With the appearance of Mr. Cortot with the Conservatory, Paris, Orchestra, came the first of the pianistic surprises. The niceness, the clarity, the poetry of his playing, as well as his sufficient technique and obvious musicianship, made an immediate impression. There were requests on all sides that he play with the local orchestra. Then at a symphony concert Mr. Levitzki made a great success. With the light, popular Saint-Saens concerto he established himself as a favorite. Mr. Rachmaninoff then appeared out of the East. His playing, as well as his fame as a composer, made him at once the outstanding figure of the musical season. Now Mr. Cortot reappears this week as the soloist with the Boston orchestra and through the non-appearanec of Mr. Rubenstein, the announced soloist for next week, Mr. Rachmaninoff will have his opportunity to play with Mr. Rabaud's men next week. Add to these pianistic feats the brilliant playing of Mme. Leginska at a Sunday concert and the much anticipated playing of Miss Christie, a most talented pianist, in recital a little later in the winter, and a season, which promised little fine pianism, develops into a season of keyboard delights.

Cortot yesterday heights—as the impression he made when he played here with Mr. Messager. Appearing both in the Franck Variations and the D'Indy symphony, his art was seen in all its phases. The beauty of his tone was continuous. His sound musicianship never let him make the piano a solo instrument; he kept it, as it is intended in the D'Indy symphony, an integral part of the orchestra. There were times in the symphony when the Cortot tone was as delicate as that of the harps that play almost continuously through parts of the symphony with the piano. Rapid passages were played at great speed, but never blurred, never made muddy. To everything he brought a fine feeling that suggested the poet in all he did. At other times and in other places Mr. Cortot has been accused of exaggeration in rubato and caprices with tempi—certainly no accusations such as these can fairly be brought against his artistry yesterday. He is, as Boston finds him, that rare bird, a pianist with a wonderful touch, well nigh perfect technique and above and beyond all, a distinct personality.

Mr. Rabaud shared with him the honors of the "Mountain Symphony." While Mr. Rabaud has given notable performances of much greater music since his entree into Boston, he has done nothing that has pleased the rank and file of his audience more than this work. The symphony, almost a series of variations on a French mountain air with secondary themes, elaborate working-out, etc., demands absolute clarity. From the announcement of the theme, beautifully played on the English horn, to the brilliant final, defined as a kermis in the blaze of day, Mr. Rabaud's performance was clear as crystal.

There are many surprising combinations of instruments in the work. The instruments, the harps, the piano, the various wood winds, the French horn and the English horns were played with lovely quality. The balance of tone was always exactly right, the third movement was played with flaming beauty. No wonder that the audience remained in their places after the close of the concert and paid just respect to Mr. Cortot, to Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra for the virtuoso performance.

The Bach suits arranged for modern orchestra rather lacked archaic flavor, but formed a pleasing interlude between the rather thick Hadley Fantasia and the Franck variations. The air, which makes up the second movement, the most familiar of all Bach music, was played in a straightforward fashion, without applause getting, long drawn out sweetness.

The arrangement of this program prompts one to pause for a moment to comment of the excellence of Mr. Rabaud's programs. His music is worth hearing; his novelties are perhaps at time a concession to the demands for "something new" but necessary, the juxtaposition of his selections is excellent, his programs constantly stimulate the auditor without fatiguing him. He plays the Beethoven symphonies frequently, thank Heavens for that. He is hampered, as are all composers today, by having to choose from a limited repetoire-war necessity. Next week he puts his first Brahms on the Symphony program.

MASTER OF PIANO WITH SYMPHONY

Ideal Union of Great Band, Conductor and Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The ideal union of a great orchestra, a great conductor and a great soloist, and, to complete the effect, a programme admirably arranged, is seldom a fact, even in the affairs of the best regulated artistic organizations.

The concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, with Alfred Cortot, pianist, as soloist, was such an event, superlatively representative of the greatest traditions of these con-

MORE THAN A VIRTUOSO

Mr. Cortot took part in two performances, those of the Franck "Variations Symphonique" and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." In both these works the pianist is far more than a haranguing virtuoso. The piano is an element of the orchestra, important but organic.

In the D'Indy, it might be said, the piano is another orchestra, with a host of effects all its own, and only slightly inferior in capacities of tone-color and sonority to the hundred instruments which surround it. The pianist becomes less a soloist than a second conductor, whose authority is exceeded only by the man with the baton. In such circumstances the pianist can be either an indifferent performer, accustomed to musical routine, an executant intent on displaying his own gifts, or a great artist who subordinates himself completely to the music and thinks with the conductor as one man.

Two Masters of Art

Seldom in the history of these concerts has there been witnessed such union of spirit and intellect between two musicians of the first rank, and such superb mastery of every aspect of their art, as was shown by Mr. Rabaud and Mr. Cortot yesterday. Their performances were, indeed, historic. Mr. Rabaud we now know as a musician, and our admiration of him increases with every concert that he gives. An inspired student of his art, he inspires the orchestra, which not only obeys him and plays, but understands him and speaks.

Mr. Cortot is what a famous pianist should be, and seldom is—first of all a great musician, with a burning enthusiasm for his art, and, second, a virtuoso of extraordinary powers, for whom physical difficulties apparently do not exist. It may be said without exaggeration that although at least two performances of Franck's variations had been given in this city, the music was heard here yesterday for the first time.

New Beauties in Variations

It had not had its rightful aspect before. The poetic qualities of the composition, its development and finish of workmanship, had been realized, but we had not been permitted to perceive the strength and dramatic character of the music, as was revealed in the very first phrase of the strings, as interpreted by Mr. Rabaud. The revelation was overwhelming. We knew Franck as mystic, the secluded dreamer—these qualities are not wholly absent in the variations—but there were passages in which one thought of Michelangelo.

Most variations are separate fragments, loosely bound together into a whole. Franck's are not, and the continuity of the thought, the force and the germinative power of the composer's imagination were unforgettably demonstrated. The second variation was the inevitable consequence of the first, and so on. The momentum of the music and the performance was irresistable and exciting to the last degree.

D'Indy's Symphony

D'Indy's symphony on a "Mountain Air" is for the writer one of the most beautiful and brilliant compositions of a modern master. Conductor, pianist and orchestra surpassed themselves in its performance. Mr. Cortot, though he sat at the piano among the other instrumentalists, played as one who was at the same time immersed in his task and sufficiently far from it to understand equally the great outlines and the finest details of the composition. When the occasion arose, he led authoritatively, stating a theme or some important phrase of its development with as much breadth and conviction as though he had composed the music himself; at other times he supplied only tone color as a background for solo instrument, or again was virtually the conductor in setting the pace of a movement and sustaining it for measures as the basis of the orchestral performance. Technically his performance can only be called by an abused and misappropriated term, "colossal," or, if you like, "overwhelming." The skill, imagination, musicianship of all who took part were placed at the service of the composer, who would himself have rejoiced if he could have heard this performance of his music.

Hadley's Fantasia

Henry Hadley's "Symphonic Fantasia" op. 46, was played for the first time at these concerts. This is not one of Mr. Hadley's late compositions. It was published in 1907, and there had been performances of it before that time. We prefer this music to other compositions of Mr. Hadley which have come since it was completed. It has mood and the music is full of enthusiasm. The idiom is strongly tinctured with Wagnerianism. The orchestra is the big Wagnerian orchestra, which is used to the limit. The effect is full and brilliant. The composer liked to make his instruments sound, and did so with a youthful gusto which is contagious. It is sincere, direct writing, and as such gave much pleasure to the audience.

Not the least item of the concert was the suite of Bach in D major which contains the famous air known because of a violin transcription as the "Air for the G String." Again Mr. Rebaud showed his eclectism and not only his understanding but his enthusiasm for music of all schools. Witness the two-fisted vigor and swing of the overture, the serenity and classic outline of the famous air. This, indeed, was a concert long to remember.

RABAUD GIVES NOBLE READING

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Performed Faultlessly at Concert

MISS MABEL GARRISON PLEASES WITH VOICE

Her California Song, However, Draws Deeper ApplauseThan Mozart's Aria

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Beethoven, Fifth Symphony.
Mozart, Concert Aria, "Mia Speranza."
Soloist, Miss Mabel Garrison.
St. Saens, "Phaeton" Swmphonic Poem.
Kelley, "A California Idyl."
Miss Garrison.
Lalo, Rhapsody in A major.

The above was the program of the Friday and Saturday concerts. There may be a suspicion that we are getting a trifle too much of Beethoven and also St. Saens, but without going as far as the frightened conservatory student who, when the professor thundered "How many symphonies did Beethoven write?" trembled back "two, the fifth and the ninth," we can always welcome the fifth as one of the best of the nine. And on this occasion it became its own best excuse, for it received a reading and a performance that may rank among the best that we have heard. Too often conductors try with might and main to read something original and new into Beethoven—and fail.

M. Rabaud gave a reading that was in the noblest Beethoven school, without exaggeration, save that he dwelt somewhat long upon the great opening figure, and the finale was read with a glory of heroic triumph that aroused the entire audience.

BEETHOVEN AND CONTRABASSES.

We are always disposed to give the chief laurels of this work to the contrabasses, of which Beethoven was the liberator. Before his time they generally gave merely fundamental bass notes. At the very end of the fourth symphony Beethoven wrote a most difficult set of violin figures for these instruments. Weber satirized the proceeding most keenly in the musical press.

Poor Beethoven could only swear (he was a master in this branch of oratory) in return, but his real answer to the rival composer was in the fifth symphony, where we have the same instruments again introduced and the contrabasses giving a variation in the slow movement, telling a mysterious ghost story at the beginning of the scherzo, and playing a furiously difficult set of phrases in the trio of this movement.

The manner in which they played spoke well for their artistry and for M. Rabaud's drillmastership. The whole orchestra played famously. We remembered that we had this same symphony very well given by Messager and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra a few weeks ago, but we must decidedly give the palm to the reading of M. Rabaud and the playing of his orchestra.

The other two selections, although not new to Boston, were less familiar. St. Saens' "Phaeton" tells in music of what might befall a young man if he tries to run his father's aeroplane without having had any experience. One can watch the machine miss fire, dip, drive; we can hear the tank explode and the whole affair finally turn turtle. It is perfectly evident that Phaeton is driving without a license and ought never to have been allowed at the wheel.

MISS GARRISON PLEASES.

Seriously this is not a great work. It seemed the tamest portion of the concert, in spite of the fact that the interpretation left nothing to be desired. Coming after the exceptionally heroic and brilliant finale of the fifth symphony it seemed merely bombastic, and it is a comparatively easy matter to gallop horses in music with an anapaestic rhythm; it is one of the few things that program-music can unmistakably picture.

Miss Mabel Garrison won a success as soloist. She is a coloratura soprano of high register, sure intonation and great flexibility of voice. Mozart's concert aria, however, did not appeal greatly to the auditor. One does not thrill to the conventional "pena" and "pianto" and other agonies of the old-fashioned musical heroine. Edgar Stillman Kelley's California song came much nearer the modern heart. Not only was there great display of vocal technique here, but the orchestral part was finely developed. The voice was balanced against the fluate at times, as both Handel and Donizetti have done, and the new solo flute-player gave an excellent account of himself.

Mr. Kelley did not indulge in any modern ugliness, but united melodic beauty with vocal and orchestral display. The work ended on the heights, away up in alt, almost in altissimo, with a good climax. Miss Garrison was heartily applauded and recalled after both numbers, but one could note the spontaneity of the enthusiasm which followed the Kelley number.

LALO'S RHAPSODY.

Lalo's Rhapsody has not been heard here in a long time, so it was practically a novelty. It is derived from Norwegian inspiration and we like this Frenchman better in Norway than in Spain. The essence of the Springtanz and the Halling are both well caught up. The last movement is chiefly a Halling. We have been present at one of these dances north of Christiania, where, in a barn, the young men strove, to the wild scraping of fiddles and the yelling of excited maidens, to kick the overhanging rafters. The fiercely exuberant music brought back the scene, and it was played with a dash and heartiness that demands unstinted praise.

Therefore, M. Rabaud's triumphs were made at the beginning and end of the concert. Yet of course the very beginning was "The Star Spangled Banner," which we suppose will be reserved for especial occasions after the coming peace. Possibly they might begin the "Pop" concerts, at least in July, with the old tune, "How Dry I Am."

The rule about speaking only good of the dead also applies to Charity Concerts. But were it altogether lifted one could only praise Ephraim Zimbalist for his violin work at the concert in Symphony Hall last Monday in aid of the Jewish War Fund. Great violinists are rather crowding each other in Boston in recent days, yet even amidst the throng the work of Zimbalist demands especial record. It took place in Symphony Hall, but might have been held to better advantage in a smaller auditorium.

The full, rich tone of the artist was well displayed in the aria of the Goldmark concerto, and there was much brilliancy shown in David's arrangement of Corelli's "La Follia." Cesar Cui's "Orientale," given as an encore during the evening, seemed to awaken especial interest. If many more violin celebrities come to Boston they will be obliged to give recitals to each other.

More of d'Indy's music was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its twelfth program, heard on the afternoon of Friday, Jan. 24, Mr. Alfred Cortot playing the piano part in the "Symphony on a French Mountain Song," Op. 25. Being closer akin to program music than is the string quartet, the moments of pure musical inspiration are fewer. Mr. Cortot submerged himself in the ranks of the players, and made no attempt to turn the symphony into a concerto. Mr. Rabaud, as is the case with all that he does, showed perfect familiarity with the score and a great anxiety to do justice to its poetry and beauty. Mr. Cortot's ability to exert just the right amount of force through his fingers at just the right instant to bring about the elasticity in a phrase that marks the true artist was in evidence in the César Franck symphonic variations. These found much favor with the audience, which gave the soloist long and loud applause. No pianist has been heard in Symphony Hall this year who can put more poetry into his tone than can Mr. Cortot. The program began with a symphonic fantasia, Op. 46, by Henry Hadley, heard for the first time at these concerts. The work suggests Wagnerian influence, but with a striving along approved lines for modernity. On the program was the Bach suite in D major, No. 3, which plentifully satisfied any yearnings for structural and melodic music.

Sunday afternoons.

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be soloist at the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities instead of Mr. Arthur Rubinstein, who, unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagements. The schedule for the next two weeks runs as follows:

Worcester, Massachusetts, on Tuesday evening, Jan. 28. The soloist will be the American contralto, Mme. Merle Alcock.

Boston, Jan. 31 and Feb. 1. The soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff.

Washington New National Theater, Monday afternoon, Feb. 3. Soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff.

Baltimore, Lyric Theater, Tuesday evening, Feb. 4. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

Philadelphia, Academy of Music, Wednesday evening, Feb. 5. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

New York, Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 6.

Brooklyn, Academy of Music, Friday evening, Feb. 7. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

New York, Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, Feb. 8.

1919

MORE PIANISM OF HIGH ORDER AT THE SYMPHONY

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Henri Rabaud, conductor; Alfred Cortot, pianist, soloist. Twelfth concert of the season, Symphony Hall. The program:—

J. S. Bach—Orchestral Suite in D major.
Franck—Symphonic Variations.
Hadley—Symphonic Fantasia.
D'Indy—Symphony on a Mountain Air.

Early in the fall this promised to be a violinistic year. Pianists, so the outlook seemed, were to be rare birds. Yet this has developed decidedly into a pianistic, rather than a violinistic, season. Of the fiddlers that great and glorious youth, Jascha Heifetz, is with us again. Mr. Rosen, much anticipated, came, but did not create the expected furore. Mr. Seidel, most eagerly anticipated of the younger violinists excepting Mr. Heifetz, has not appeared as yet. Other fiddlers seek non-Bostonianical fields and box offices. With the appearance of Mr. Cortot with the Conservatory, Paris, Orchestra, came the first of the pianistic surprises. The niceness, the clarity, the poetry of his playing, as well as his sufficient technique and obvious musicianship, made an immediate impression. There were requests on all sides that he play with the local orchestra. Then at a symphony concert Mr. Levitzki made a great success. With the light, popular Saint-Saens concerto he established himself as a favorite. Mr. Rachmaninoff then appeared out of the East. His playing, as well as his fame as a composer, made him at once the outstanding figure of the musical season. Now Mr. Cortot reappears this week as the soloist with the Boston orchestra and through the non-appearanec of Mr. Rubenstein, the announced soloist for next week, Mr. Rachmaninoff will have his opportunity to play with Mr. Rabaud's men next week. Add to these pianistic feats the brilliant playing of Mme. Leginska at a Sunday concert and the much anticipated playing of Miss Christie, a most talented pianist, in recital a little later in the winter, and a season, which promised little fine pianism, develops into a season of keyboard delights.

Cortot yesterday heightened the impression he made when he played here with Mr. Messager. Appearing both in the Franck Variations and the D'Indy symphony, his art was seen in all its phases. The beauty of his tone was continuous. His sound musicianship never let him make the piano a solo instrument; he kept it, as it is intended in the D'Indy symphony, an integral part of the orchestra. There were times in the symphony when the Cortot tone was as delicate as that of the harps that play almost continuously through parts of the symphony with the piano. Rapid passages were played at great speed, but never blurred, never made muddy. To everything he brought a fine feeling that suggested the poet in all he did. At other times and in other places Mr. Cortot has been accused of exaggeration in rubato and caprices with tempi—certainly no accusations such as these can fairly be brought against his artistry yesterday. He is, as Boston finds him, that rare bird, a pianist with a wonderful touch, well nigh perfect technique and above and beyond all, a distinct personality.

